appeared more certainly then before, that they were a marvellous great multitude of People, by the length of time which they tooke to passe their way. For it is said, they were passing by his Campe six daies continually together. And as they came raking by the ROMANE Campe; they asked them in mockery, If they would write to send home any thing to their Wives; for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all passed and gone, and continued on their journey still, Marius also raised his Campe, and followed them fair and softly foot by foot, and ever kept hard at their taile as neare as he could, alwaies fortifying his Campe very well, and ever chusing strong places of situation and advantage to lodge in, that they might be safe in the night time. So they marched on in this fort, untill they came unto the City of AIX, from whence they had not far to goe, but they entred straight into the Mountaines of the Alpes: wherefore Marius prepared now to fight with them, and chose out a place that was very strong of situation to lodge his Campe in, howbeit there lacked Water. And they say he did it of purpose, to the end to quicken his mens courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and told him that they should stand in great danger to abide marvellous thirst if they lodged there. Whereunto he made answer: shewing them the River that ran hard by the Enemies Campe; saying withall, That they must goe thither and buy Drinke with their Blood. The Souldiers replied againe: And why then doe ye not leade us thither, whilst our Blood is yet moist? He gently answered them againe: Because the first thing we doe, we must fortifie our Campe. The Souldiers though they were angry with him, yet they obeyed him: but the slaves having neither Drinke for themselves, nor for their Cattell, gathered together a Troope of them, and went towards the River: some of them carrying Axes, other Hatchets, other Swords and Speares, with their Pots to carry Water, determining to fight with the Barbarous People, if otherwise they could not come by it. A few of the Barbarous People at the first fought with them, because the most part of their company were at Dinner, after they had bathed; and others were still in the Bathe washing themselves, finding in that place many Springs of hot naturall Bathes. Thus the ROMANE found many of the Barbarous People making merry, and taking their pleasure about these Bathes, for the great delight they tooke to consider the pleasantnesse of their pleasure about these Bathes, for the great delight they tooke to see one after another unto the place from whence the noise came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keepe the ROMANE Souldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their slaves should have bene slaine of the Barbarous People: and moreover, because the valiantest Souldiers of their Enemies, called the AMBRONS (who before had overcome Manlius and Cepio, two ROMANE Captaines with their Armies, and that made of themselves Thirty thousand fighting men) ran to Armes, being very heavy of their Bodies, as having filled their bellies well, but otherwise Valiant and couragious fellows, and more lively then they had wont to be, by reason of the Wine they had drunk; they ran not furiously to fight out of order, neither did they cry out confusedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noise with their harness all after one sort, they oft rehearsed their owne Name, AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS: which was, either to call one another of them, or else to feare the ROMANE with their Name onely. The ITALIANS also on the other side, being the first that came down to fight with them, were the LIGURIANS, dwelling upon the coast of GENOVA, who hearing this noise and cry of theirs, plainly understanding them: answered them againe with the like noise and cry, LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, saying, that it was the true surname of all their Nation. And so before they joyned together, this cry was redoubled many a time one either side: and the Captaines of both parts made their Souldiers cry out all together, contending for envy one against another; who should cry it loudest. This contention of crying, inflamed the Souldiers courages the more. Now the AMBRONS having the River to passe, were by this means put out of order, and before they could put themselves in Battell ray againe, after they had passed the River, the LIGURIANS ran with great fury to set upon the foremost: and after them, (to aid the LIGURIANS that had begun the charge) the ROMANE themselves fell also upon the AMBRONS, coming down from the places of advantage upon these Barbarous People, and compelled them by this means to turn their backs, and flye. So the greatest slaughter they made, fortunated upon the banke of the River, whereinto they thrust one another in such sort, that all the River ran bloud, being filled with dead Bodies. And they that could get over the River againe, and were on the other side, durst not gather together any more to stand to defence: so as the ROMANE slew them, and drave them into their Campe, even unto their carriage. Then their Women came out against them with Swords and Axes in their hands, grinding their teeth: and crying out for sorrow and anger, they charged awell upon their own People that fled, as upon them that chafed them: the one as Traitors, and the other as Enemies: Furthermore, they thrust themselves amongst them that fought, and strove by force to plucke the ROMANE Targets out of their hands, and tooke hold of their naked Swords bare handed, abiding with an invincible courage to be hacked and mangled with their Swords. And thus was the first Battell given (as they say) by the Rivers side, rather by chance unlooked for, then by any set purpose, or through the Generals counsell. Now the ROMANE after they had overcome the most part of the AMBRONS, retiring backe by reason the night had overtaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had given such an overthrow) sing Songs of Victory and Triumph, nor make good cheer in their Tents one with another, and least of all sleepe: (which is the best and sweetest refreshing for men that have fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, because their Campe was not entrenched and fortified, and because they knew also that there remained almost innumerable Thousands of Barbarous People, that had not yet fought: besides also, that the AMBRONS that had fled and escaped from the overthrow, did howle out all night with loud cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and sighs, but rather like wilde Beasts bellowing and roaring. So that the bellowing of such a great multitude of beastly People, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the Mountaines thereabouts and the running River to rebound againe of the sound and echo of their cries marvellously: by reason whereof, all the valley that lay betwene both, thundred to hear the horrible and fearful trembling. This made the ROMANS Souldiers afraid, and Marius himselfe in some doubt: because they looked to have bene fought withall the same night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithstanding, the Barbarous People did not assault them that night, nor the next day following, but onely prepared themselves unto Battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there were above the place where they were camped, certaine Caves and little Valleys covered with Wood: he secretly sent Claudius Marcellus thither with Three thousand Footmen well Armed, and commanded him to keepe close in ambush, untill he saw that the Barbarous People were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set upon their rereward. The residue of his Army, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed themselves. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the Field out of his Fort: where he put them in order of Battell, sending his Horsemen before to draw the Enemies out to skirmish. The TEUTONS seeing them come, had not the patience to tarry till the ROMANS were come down into the plaine to fight without advantage, but Arming themselves in haste, and in a rage, ran up the Hill to the ROMANS, where they stood in Battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, sent here and there unto the private Capitaines, charging them they should not stir, and onely to temporize and forbear, untill the Enemies came within a Stones cast of them: and that they should then throw their Darts at them, and afterwards drew their Swords, and repulse the Barbarous People with their Shields. For he did foresee, that when they should climb up against the Hill (upon the hanging whereof the ROMANS had set their Battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and ranks could stand close together to any effect or purpose: because they could not have sure footing, nor march assuredly, but would easily be thrown backward if they were never so little repulsed: by reason of the hanging of the Hill. Marius gave this order unto his folke, and therewithall was himselfe the first man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a Warriour, and as valiant a Souldier, as any man in all his Army: besides, not one amongst them all would venture further, and be more bold then himselfe. So when the ROMANS had resisted them, and staied them sodainly, going with fury to have won the Hill, perceiving themselves to be repulsed, they gave back by little and little, untill they came into the Field, and then began the foremost of them to gather together, and to put themselves in Battell ray upon the plaine, when sodainly they heard the noise and charging of them that they were in the taile of their Army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occasion when it was offered him, because that the noise of the first charge coming up against the Hills thereabouts, under the which he lay in ambush, gave him advertisement thereof: wherupon he caused his men presently to shew; and running with great cries, came to give a charge upon those which were in the taile of the Barbarous People, putting the hindmost to the Sword. They made their fellows whose backs were next unto them, to turne their faces, and so from man to man, till at the length in short time all their Battell began to waver in disorder: and they made no great resistance, when they saw they were so charged before and behind, but began straight to flye for life. The ROMANS following them hard at the heeles, killed and tooke Prisoners above a Hundred thousand of them, and tooke moreover their Carts, their Tents, and all their carriage. Which the whole Army by consent agreed to present unto Marius, excepting nothing, saving that which was imbezelled and conveyed away under hand. Now, though this was a marvellous Honourable and right Noble Present, yet they thought it not a recompence sufficient for that he had deserved, for the valour he had shewed of a famous Capitaine, in leading of his Army, and for the good order he kept in this Warre: so happy thought they themselves to have escaped so great a danger. Notwithstanding, some Writers doe not agree, that the spoile of the Barbarous People was given unto Marius: nor that there were also so great a number of men slaine as we have spoken of. But they say, that after this Battell, the MARSILIANS did inclose their Vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and consumed upon the Fields through the great raine that fell upon them the winter following, the ground waxed so fat, and did soake the grease so deepe in the same, that the summer following, they did beare an incredible quantity of all sorts of Fruits. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proved true, that the arable Land doth wax fat with such rottenesse or putrifaction. And it is said also, that ordinarily after great Battells, there falleth great store of raine. Either it is by meane of some God, that powring down pure Raine: Water, doth purifie, wash, and cleanse the ground, defiled and polluted with mans blood: or else it happeneth by naturall cause: for that the overthrow of so many dead bodies, and of the blood spilt, ingendreth a moist, grosse, and heavy vapor, which doth thicken the Ayre) that by nature is changeable, and easie to alter) from a very small or little beginning, unto an exceeding great change. After this Battell, Marius caused the harnesse and spoiles of the Barbarous People to be laid aside, that were left whole and faire to sight, to beautifie and enrich the Pompe of his Triumph. Then he caused the rest to be gathered together on a great heape, and laid upon a stack of Wood, to make a Noble Sacrifice unto the gods, all his Army being armed about him, crowned with Garlands of Triumph, and himselfe apparelled apparelled in a long Gowne of Purple, according to the custome of the ROMANS in such a case, and holding a Torch burning in both his hands, which he first lifted up unto Heaven. And as he was turning down the Torch to put fire to the stack of Wood, they saw some of his friends a good way off on Horse-backe, coming post unto him: then sodainly there was a great silence made of all the Assembly, every man desirous to hear what good Newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted off their Horses, they ran straight to embrace Marius, and brought him Newes that he was chosen Confull the fift time: and presented him the Letters sent him from ROMES confirming the same. And thus, this new joy falling out besides the Victory, the private Souldiers did shew the great joy and pleasure they tooke in both, with great shouts and Beating upon their harnesse: and the Capitaines also crownd Marius againe with new Garlands of Lawrell which they put about his head: and that done, he put fire under the stack of Wood, and ended his Sacrifice. But that which never suffereth men quietly to enjoy the good hap of any Victory clearly, but in this mortall Life doth ever mingle the ill with the good, be it either Fortune or spite of fatall destiny, or else the necessity of the naturall causes of earthly things: did shortly after this great joy bring Newes unto Marius, of his companion Catulus Lucilius the other Confull, who was like a Cloud in a fair bright day, and brought the City of ROMES againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went against the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keep the straights of the Mountaines, in hope to let the Barbarous People for passing: because that in so doing, he had bene compelled to divide his Army into many parts, and had weakened himselfe very much if he had taken that course: Wherefore coming a little on this side the Alpes towards ITALY, he planted himselfe upon the River of ATHESSIS, and built a Bridge upon it, so passe and repasse over his men when he would, and set up at either end of the Bridge two strong Forts well fortified, that he might more commodiously helpe the places on the other side of the River, if the Barbarous People by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the straights of the Mountaines. Now, these Barbarous People had such a glory in themselves, and disdained their Enemies so much, that more to shew their force and boldnesse, then of any necessity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they suffered it to snow upon them being stark naked, and did climb up to the top of the Mountaines, through great heapes of Ice and Snow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laid their long broad Targets under their Bodies, and lay along upon them, sliding down the steepe high Rockes, that had certaine hangings over of an infinite height. In the end, they came to the Campe neare unto the ROMANS by the Rivers side, and considered how they might passe it over: and began to fill it up, tearing down (like Giants) great Hills of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great Trees which they pulled up whole by the rootes, threw in great pieces of Rockes which they brake, and whole Towers of earth after them, to stop and breake the course of the River. But besides all this, they threw great Timber into the River, which being carried down the streame, came with such a force, and hit against the posts of the Bridge so violently, that they shaked the ROMANS Bridge marvellously. Whereupon many of the Souldiers of the great Campe were afraid, and forsaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfect good Capitaine shew, that he made lesse account of his own private Honour and elimation, then he did of the generall Honour of all his Souldiers. For, seeing that he could not perswade his men by any reason to tarry, and that in this feare they dislodged, in disorder against his will: he himselfe commanded the standard bearer of the Eagle to march on, and ran to the foremost that went their way, and marched himselfe before them all, to the intent that the shame of this retire should altogether light upon him, and not upon his Country: and that it might appeare the ROMANS did follow their Capitaine, and not flye away. The Barbarous People therefore assaulting the fort at the end of the Bridge of the River of ATHESSIS, tooke it, and all the men that were in it. And because the ROMANS defended it like valiant men, and had lustily ventured their lives to the death for defence of their Country: the Barbarous People let them goe upon composition, which they swore to keepe faithfully, by their Bull of Copper. This Bull afterwards was taken when they lost the Battell, and carried (as they say) into Catulus Lucilius Houfe, as the chiefest thing of the Victory. Furthermore, the Barbarous People finding the Country open without any defence, scattered here and there, and destroyed all where they came. Whereupon the ROMANS sent for Marius to ROMES to goe against them: and after he was arrived, every man thought he should have entered in Triumph, because also the Senate did grant it him very willingly. But he would no doe it, either because he would not deprive his Souldiers and the Capitaines that had fought under him, of any part of the Honour that was due unto them, they being absent: or because that he would warrant the People from the present danger they were in, by laying aside the glory of his former Victories, into the hands of the good Fortune of ROMES, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honourable and perfect confirmation of the second. Wherefore after he had made an Oration to the People and Senate, according to the time, he went his way immediately towards Catulus Lucilius, whose coming did comfort him much: and sent also for his Army that was yet in GALLIA beyond the Mountaines. And after his Army was come, he passed the River of PO, to keepe the Barbarous People from hurting ITALY on this side the Po. Now the CIMBRES still deferred to give Battell, because they looked for the TEUTONS, and said: that they marvelled much what they meant to tarry so long: either because they knew not indeed of their overthrow, or else for that they would not seeme to know it, because they handled them cruelly that brought the Newes of their deaths. At the length, they sent unto Marius to aske him Lands and Town sufficient to keepe them and their their Brethren. Marius asked their Ambassadors what Brethren they meant. They answered that they were the TEUTONS. Whereat they standers by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, saying: Care not for those Brethren, said he, for we have given them ground enough, which they will keepe for ever. These Ambassadors found his mocke straight, and began to revile and threaten him, that the CIMBRES should presently make him repent it, and the TEUTONS so soone as they arrived. Why, said Marius unto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honesty in you, if you should go your way and not salute them, since they are your Brethren. And as he spake these words, he commanded his men to bring him the Kings of the TEUTONS bound and chained, that had beene taken within the Mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQUANI. The CIMBRES understanding this by report of their Ambassadors, presently marched towards Marius, who stirred not at all, but onely fortified and kept his Campe. They say, that it was for this Battell that Marius first invented the new device he brought in for the Dart which the ROMANES were wont alwaies to throw against the Enemies at the first charge. For, before the staffe of the Dart was fastened unto the Iron, and the Iron unto the staffe, with two little Iron Pins that passed through the Wood: and then Marius left one of the Iron Pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a little thin Pin of Wood easie to be broken, in place of the same; making it craftily, to the end that when the Dart was thrown, and stuck in the Enemies Target, it should not stand right forward, but bow downwards towards the Iron, that the wooden Pin being broken, the staffe of the Dart should hang downwards, holding yet by the Iron Pin running quite through at the point. So Baerix King of the CIMBRES, coming neare to Marius Campe with a small number of Horsemen, sent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day and place for Battell, that they might try it out, who should be owners of the Countrey. Whereunto Marius made answer, that it was not the manner of the ROMANES to counsell with their Enemies, of the time and place when they should give Battell: but nevertheless, he would not sticke to pleasure the CIMBRES so much. And thus they agreed betwene them, that it should be the third day following, in the plaine of Veselles, which was very commodious for the Horsemen of the ROMANES: and also for the Barbarous People to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both Armies failed not to meet according to appointment, but appeared ranged in Battell, one before the other. Catulus Lucilius the other Consull, had in his Campe Twenty thousand and Three hundred Souldiers: and Marius had in his Campe Two and thirty thousand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the Battell, shutting in Catulus with his men in the midst; as Sylla writeth it, who was present at the same: saying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to overthrow his Enemies with the two wings of the Battell, to the end that the whole Victory should light upon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the midst should have no part thereof. For he could not so much as front the Enemy, because that commonly when the front of a Battell is of such a breadth, the two wings are ever stretched out before, and are made like the crescent of a Moon, where the middest is thickest and farthest in. And it is written also in other Stories, that Catulus himselfe accusing the malice of Marius, because he did so, spake it to excuse his owne dishonour. As for the CIMBRES, the Troopes of their Footemen coming out of their Forts leasurly, did put themselves into a Squadron, as broad as long, for in every side they occupied almost thirty Furlong: but their Horsemen, which were Fifteene thousand, marched before in sumptuous furniture. For they had Helmets on their heads fashioned like wilde Beasts necks, and strange Bevers or Buffes to the same, and ware on their Helmets great high blumes of Feathers, as they had beene wings: which to fight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good Curaces on their backs, and carried great white Targets before them: and for weapons offensive, every man had two Darts in his hand to bestow asfarre off, and when they came to hand strokes, they had great heavy Swords, which they fought withall neare hand. But at that time they did not march directly in ranke against the Army of the ROMANES, but turned a little on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMANES betwene them and their Footemen that were on the left hand. The ROMANES Captaines found their policy straight, but they could not keepe their Souldiers back: for there was one that cried, The Enemies fled, and immediately all the rest began to runne after. In the meane time, the Footemen of the Barbarous People that were like to a Sea before them, came forwards still: and then Marius, having washed his hands, and lifting them to heaven, promised and vowed a solmne Sacrifice unto the gods of an hundred Oxen. Catulus also made a vow, lifting up his hands to Heaven in like manner, that he would build a Temple unto Fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius having Sacrificed, when they shewed him the intrails of the Beasts Sacrificed, he cried out aloud, The Victory his mine. But when they came to give the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powered upon him by Gods justice, who turned his craft against himselfe, as Sylla writeth: for there rose very credibly a great dust, that both Armies lost the sight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the first that ranne to begin the charge, and having placed his men about him, missed to meet with his Enemies: and being passed beyond their Battell, wanded a great while up and down the Field, whilst the Barbarous People fought against Catulus. So that the greatest fury of the Battell was against Catulus and his Army: in the which Sylla writeth he was himselfe, and faith, that the heate and the Sun, which was full in the CIMBRES faces, did the ROMANES marvellous pleasure at that time. For the Barbarous People being very hard brought up to away with cold (because they were borne and bred in a cold Countrey, shadowed altogether with Woods and Trees, as we have said) were to the contrary rary very tender against the heate, and did melt with sweating against the Sun, and gaped straight for breath, putting their Targets before their faces: for it was also in the heart of Sommer, about the seven and twentieth day of the month of July that this Battell was given; and this dust also made the ROMANES the bolder, and kept them that they could not see the innumerable multitude of their Enemies farre from them. And every man running to set upon them that came against him, they were joyned together in fight, before that the sight of their Enemies could make them afraid. And furthermore, they were so good Souldiers, and so able to take paines, that how extreme soever the heate was, no man was seene sweate nor blow, though they ran at the first to set upon them: and this hath Catulus Lucilius himselfe left in writing unto the praise of his Souldiers. So were the most part of the Barbarous People, and specially of the best Souldiers, slaine in the Field. And because they should not open and breake their ranks, the foremost ranks were all tied and bound together with Girdles, Leather thongs, and long Chaines of Iron: and they that fled, were chased and followed into their Campe by the ROMANES, where they meet with horrible and fearful things to behold. For, their Wives being upon the top of their Carts, apparelled all in black, slew all those that fled, without regard of Persons: some their Fathers, other their Husbands or their Brethren, and strangling the little young Babes with their own hands, they cast them under the Cart wheeles, and betwene the Horse legs, and afterwards slew themselves. And they say, that there was a Woman hanged at the end of a Cart Ladder, having hanged up two of her Children by the necks at her heeles. And that the men also, for lacke of a Tree to hang themselves on, tied slipping Halters about their necks, unto the hornes and feete of the Oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwards with goades to make them sling and leape so long, that dragging them all about, and treading them under feet, at the length they killed them. Now though numbers were slaine by this meane, yet were there Threescore thousand of them taken Prisoners, and the number of them that were slaine, came to twice as many more. In this manner Marius Souldiers spoiled the Camp of the CIMBRES: but the spoiles of dead men that were slaine in the Field, with their Ensignes and Trumpets, were all brought (as it is said) unto Catulus Campe, which was a plaine Testimony to shew that Catulus and his Souldiers had won the Field. Strife rising thus betwene the Souldiers of both Campes about it: that the matter might be tried privately betwene them, they made the Ambassadors of PARMA their Arbitrators, who were by chance at that time in the Army. Catulus Lucilius Souldiers led the Ambassadors to the place where the overthrow was given, shewing them the Enemies bodies pierced through with their Pikes, which were easie to be knowne, because Catulus had made them grave their Name upon their Pikes. For all this, Marius went away with the Honour of this great Victory, as well for the first Battell he won alone, when he overthrew the TEUTONS and the AMBRONS, as for his great calling, having been Consull five times. And furthermore, the common People at ROME, called him the third founder of the City of ROME, thinking them selves now delivered from as great a danger, as before time they had beene from the ancient GAULES: And every man Feasting at home with his Wife and Children, offered the best dishes of Meate they had to Supper, unto the gods and unto Marius: and would needs have him alone to Triumph for both Victories. But he would not in any case, but Triumphed into the City with Catulus Lucilius, meaning to shew himselfe courteous and moderate in so great prosperity: and peradventure also fearing Catulus Souldiers, who were in readinesse and prepared (if Marius would have deprived their Captaine of that Honour) to let him also of his Triumph. And thus you see how he passed his fifth Consulship. After that, he made more earnest sute for the sixth Consulship, then ever any other did for his first: seeking the Peoples good wills by all the faire meanes he could to please them, humbling himselfe unto them, not onely more then became his Estate and calling, but directly also against his owne nature counterfeiting a courteous Popular manner, being cleane contrary to his disposition. His ambition made him timorous to deale in matters of the State concerning the City. For that courage and boldnesse which he had in Battell against the Enemy, he lost quite when he was in an Assembly of People in the City: and was easily put out of his bias, with the first blame or praise he heard given him. And though they report, that on a time when he made a Thousand CAMERINES free of the City of ROME, because they had done Valiant service in the Warres, that there were some that did accuse him, saying, that it was a thing done a gainst all Law: he answered them, that for the noise of the Armor, he could not hear the Law. Notwithstanding, it seemeth that indeed he was greatly afraid of the fury of the People in an Assembly of the City. For in time of Warres, he ever stood upon his reputation and Authority, knowing that they had need of him: but in Peace and civil Government, because he would rather be the chiefeest man then the honestest man, he would creepe into the Peoples bosomes to get their favour and good will. And thus through his evil behaviour, he brought all the Nobility generally to be his Enemies. But he feared nor mistrusted none so much, as he did Metellus, for the great unthankfull part he remembered he had plaid him: and the rather also, because he knew him to be a just and true dealing man, and one that was ever against these People-pleasers and flatterers. Marius therefore practised all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be banished ROME. Wherefore, to compass his intent, he fell in friendship with Glancia and one Staturninus, two of the most bold, most desperate, and most harebrained young men that were in all ROME, who had all the rabblement of Rogues and beggars, and such tumultuous People at their commandement: by whose meanes he made new Popular Lawes, and caused the Souldiers to be called home out of the Warres, and mingled them with the People of the City in common Assemblies, to trouble and vex Metellus. Moreover Rutilius, an

an honest and true Writer, (howbeit an Enemy unto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his sixth Consulship by corruption of Money, which he caused to be distributed amongst the Tribes of the People: and that he bought it for ready Money to put by Metellus, and to have Valerius Flaccus not for his fellow and companion in the Consulship, but rather for a Minister of his Will. There was never ROMANE to whom the People granted the Consulship six times, except it were unto Valerius Corvinus onely. But for him, they say that there was Five and forty yeares betweene his first Consulship and the last. Where Marius since the first yeare of his Consulship, continued five yeares together by good Fortune one after another. But in his last Consulship, he wanne himselfe great hate and malice, because he did many foule faults to please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his Competitor in the Tribuneship. Afterwards when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the People, he preferred a Law for distribution of the Lands among the common People, and unto that Law he had specially added one Article: that all the Lords of the Senate should come openly to sweare, that they should keepe and observe from point to point, that which the People by their voices should decree, and should not deny it in any jot. But Marius in open Senate, made as though he would withstand this Article: saying, that neither he nor any other Wife man of judgement would take this Oath: for said he, if the Law be evill, then they should doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to grant it, and not for their own good wills. But he spake not that, meaning to doe as he said: for it was but a bait he had laid for Metellus onely, which he could hardly escape. For, imagining that to tell a fine lye, was a piece of Vertue, and of a good wit: he was thoroughly resolved with himselfe, not to passe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the contrary also, knowing well enough that Metellus was a grave wise man, who esteemed that to be just and true (as Pindarus said) is the beginning and foundation of great Vertue: he thought he would overreach him, making him affirm before the Senate that he would not sweare, knowing also that the People would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwards to sweare. And so indeed it happened. For Metellus having assured them then that he would not sweare, the Senate brake up upon it. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators unto the Pulpit for Orations, to compell them to sweare before the People: Marius went thither to offer himselfe to sweare. Whereupon the People making silence, listened attentively to hear what he would say. But Marius not regarding his large promise and brags made before the Senate, said then, his neck was not so long that he would prejudice the Common-wealth in a matter of so great importance: but that he would sweare, and obey the Law, if it were a Law. This shifting subtilty he added to it, to cloke and cover his shame: and when he had said so, he tooke his Oath. The People seeing him sweare were marvellous glad, and praised him with clapping of their hands: but the Nobility hanging down their heads, were ashamed of him, and were marvellous angry in their hearts with him, that he had so cowardly and shamefully gone from his word. Thereupon all the Senate tooke their Oathes, one after another against their wills, because they were afraid of the People: saving Metellus, whom, neither Parents, nor friends perswasion and intreaty could once move to sweare, for any punishment that Saturninus had imposed upon them which refused to take the Oath, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would never yeeld unto it, offering to abide any paine, rather then to be brought to consent to a dishonest matter unbefitting his Estate. And thereupon went out of the Assembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to doe evill it was too easie a thing: and to doe good without danger, it was also a common matter: but to doe well with danger, that was the part of an honest and Vertuous man. Saturninus then commanded the Consuls by Edict of the People, that they should banish Metellus by sound of Trumpet, with special commandement, that no man should let him have Fire nor Water, nor lodge him privately nor openly. The common People, they were ready to have fallen upon him, and to have killed him: but the Noble men being offended for the injury they had offered him, gathered together about him to save him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus himselfe was so good a man, that he would not any civill diffention should rise for his sake: and therefore he absented himselfe from ROME, wherein he did like a wife man. For said he, either things will amend, and the People then repenting themselves of the wrong they have done me, will call me home againe; or else things standing as they do now, it shall be best for me to be furthest off. But for his travell in his exile, how much he was beloved and honoured, and how sweetly he passed his time studying Philosophy in the City of HYDRES, shall be declared more at large in his Life. Now on the other side, Marius to recompence the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driven to let him have his will in all things, did not foresee what an intollerable plague he brought unto the Common-wealth, giving the bridle to a desperate man, who every way, by force, by Sword and murder, plainly sought to usurpe Tyrannicall Power, with the utter destruction and subversion of the whole Common-wealth. And so bearing reverence on the one side unto the Nobility, and desiring on the other side to gratifie the common People: he played a shamefull part, and shewed himselfe a double dealing man. For one night the Nobility and chiefe Citizens coming to his House, to perswade him to bridle Saturninus in his insolency and boldnesse: at the selfe same time also Saturninus going thither to speake with him, he caused him to be let in at a back doore, the Noble men not being privy to his coming. And so Marius telling the Nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a loosnesse of his Body, under this pretence whipped up and down, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing else but set them further out one against another, then they were before. Nevertheless, the Senate

Senate being marvellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of Knights taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to Arme the People in the Market-place, to suppress them that were up, and drave them into the Capitoll: where for lack of Water, they were compelled to yeeld themselves at the length, because he had cut off the Pipes and Conduits, by the which the Water ranne unto the Capitoll. By reason whereof, they being unable to continue any longer, called Marius unto them, and yeelded themselves to him, under the assurance of the faith of the common People. But although Marius did what he could possible to his uttermost Power to save them, he could not prevaile, nor do them pleasure: for they were no sooner come downe into the Market-place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he having now purchased himselfe the ill will of the People and Nobility both, when time came about that new Censors should be chosen, every man looked that he would have been one of the futers: howbeit he sued not for it, for feare of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of farre lesse dignity and calling then himselfe. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, saying, that he would not sue to be Censor, because he would not have the ill will of many, for examining too straightly their lives and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible, by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, seeing in the end he could not have his will, he let it alone. The People having thus willingly revoked Metellus banishment, Marius heart would not serve him to see Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherefore he tooke the Seas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, under colour to pay certaine Sacrifices to the Mother of the gods, which he had vowed unto her. But this was not the very cause that made him to undertake this journey, for he had another secret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to live in Peace, and to governe civill matters, and having attained to his greatnesse by Armes, and supposing that his glory and Authority consumed and decreased altogether living idly in Peace, he sought to devise new occasion of Warres; hoping if he could stir up the Kings of ASIA, and specially Mithridates, (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make Warres against the ROMANES) that he should then undoubtedly without let of any man be chosen Generall to make Warres with him; and withall also, that by that meanes he should have occasion to fill the City of ROME with new Triumphes, and his House with the spoiles of the great Kingdom of PONT, and with the riches of the King. Now Mithridates disposing himselfe to entertaine Marius, with all the Honour and courtesies he could possible shew him: Marius in the end notwithstanding would not once give him a good looke, nor a courteous word againe, but churlishly said unto Mithridates at his departure from him: Thou must determine one of these two, King Mithridates: either to make thy selfe stronger then the ROMANES, or else to looke to doe what they command thee, without resistance. These words amazed Mithridates, who had heard say before, that the ROMANES would speake their minds freely: howbeit he never saw nor proved it before, untill that time. After Marius was returned unto ROME, he built a House neare unto the Market-place, because he would not (as he said himselfe) that such as came unto him, should trouble themselves in going far to bring him home to his House: or else for that he thought this would be an occasion that divers would come to salute him, as they did other Senators. Howbeit, that was not the cause indeed: but the onely cause was, for that he had no naturall grace nor civility to entertain men courteously that came unto him, and that he lacked behaviour besides to rule a Common-wealth: and therefore in time of Peace they made no more reckoning of him then they did of an old rusty harnesse or implement, that was good for nothing but for the Warres onely. And for all other that professed Armes as himselfe did, no man grieved him so much to be called forward to Office and State before himselfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the Noble men did all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Sylla first rising and perferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchus King of NUMIDIA was Proclaimed by the Senate, a friend and confederate of the ROMANE People, he offered up Statues of Victories, carrying tokens of Triumph into the Temple of the Capitoll: and placed neare unto them also, an Image of Gold of King Pharnaces, which he delivered by his owne hands unto Sylla. And this made Marius stark mad for spite and jealousy, who could not abide that another should take upon him the glory of his doings: in such sort as he determined to pluck those Images down and to carry them away by force. Sylla on the other side stomached Marius, and would not suffer him to take them out of the place where they were: so that this civill sedition had taken present effect, had not the Warres of their confederates fallen out betwene, and restrained them for a time. For the best Souldiers and most Warlike People of all ITALY, and of greatest Power, they altogether rose against the ROMANES, and had wellnere overthrowne their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force and Power, and well Armed: but their Captaines also, for Valiantnesse and Skill, did in manner equal the worthinesse of the ROMANES. For this Warre fell out wonderfully, by reason of the calamity and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius shame and dishonour. For he shewed himselfe very cold and flow in all his enterprises, still delaying time, either because age had mortified his active heate, and killed that quick ready disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then above threescore and five yeares old: or else as he said himselfe, because he was waxen gowty, and had achi in his veins and sinewes, that he could not well stir his body, and that for shame: because he would not tarry behind in this War, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithstanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great Battell, wherein were slain six thousand of their Enemies: and so long as the Warres endured, he never gave them advantage of him, but patiently suffered them sometime to intrench him, and to mock him, and gave him vile words, challenging him out to fight, and yet all this would not provoke him. It is said also, that Pompeius Silo, who was the chiefeft Capitaine of reputation and Authority the Enemies had, said unto Marius one time: If thou be Marius, so great a Capitaine as they say thou art, leave thy Campe and come out to Battell. Nay, said Marius to him againe: If thou be a great Capitaine, pluck me out by the Eares, and compell me to come to Battell. Another time when the Enemies gave them occasion to give a great charge upon them with advantage: the ROMANS were faint-hearted, and durst not set upon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius caused his men to Assemble, and spake unto them in this fort: I cannot tell which of the two I should reckon most cowards: you your selves, or your Enemies: for they durst not once see your backs, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was compelled to resigne his charge, being able to serve no longer for the weaknesse and debility of his Body. Now all the Rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at ROME (by the Orators meanes) did sue to have the charge of the Warres against Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the People called Sulpitius, (a very bold and rash man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perwaded them to give him the charge of these Warres, with title and Authority of Vice-consull. The People thereupon were divided in two parts: for the one side stood for Marius, and the other would have Sylla take the charge, saying, that Marius was to thinke now upon the hot Bathes at BATHES, to looke to cure his old Body, brought low with rewme and age, as himselfe said. For Marius had a goodly stately House in those parts neare unto the Mount of MI SENE, which was far more fine and curiously furnished then became a Capitaine that had been in so many foughten Battells and dangers. They say that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine House for the summe of seven thousand five hundred Crowns; and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thousand Crowns: to so great exceeße was vanity and curiosity growne in very short time at ROME. Notwithstanding all this; Marius too ambitiously striving like a passionate young man against the weaknesse and debility of his age, never missed day but he would be in the Field of Mars to exercise himself among the young men, shewing his Body disposed and ready to handle all kinde of Weapons, and to ride Horses: albeit that in his latter time, he had no great health of Body, because he was very heavy and said. There were that liked that passing well in him, and went of purpose into the Field to see what paines he tooke, striving to excell the rest. Howbeit those of the better sort were very sorry to see his avarice and ambition, considering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane Person a great Estate, that he could not now containe his prosperity within reasonable bounds, nor yet content himselfe to be esteemed and honoured, quietly enjoying all he had wonne, and which at that present he did possesse: but as if he had beene very poore and needy, after he had received such great Honour and Triumphs, would yet carry out his age so stoutly, even into CARPADOZIA, and unto the Realme of PONT, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neopolemus, Lieutenants of King Mithridates. Indeed he alledged some reasons to excuse himselfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he said that he desired in Person to bring up his Sonne in exercise of Armes, and to teach him the discipline of Warres. That discovered the secret hidden plague, which of long time had lurked in ROME, Marius specially having now met with a fit Instrument and Minister to destroy the Common-wealth, which was the insolent and rash Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, saying that he was found too cowardly and fainthearted in all his enterprises, and for that did Marius justly reprove him. But Sulpitius, because he would not dally nor delay time, had ever six hundred young Gentlemen of the order of Knights, whom he used as his guard about him, and called them the guard against the Senate. And one day as the Consuls kept their common Assembly in the Market-place, Sulpitius coming in Armed upon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Consuls Sons being taken tardy, was slain. Sylla being the other Consull, and perceiving that he was followed hard at hand unto Marius House, ranne into the same against the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ran after him not being aware, passed by the House. And it is reported that Marius himselfe conveyed Sylla safely out at a back doore, and that he being escaped thus, went unto his Campe. Notwithstanding, Sylla himselfe in his Commentaries doth not say, that he was saved in Marius House when he fled: but that he was brought thither to give his consent unto a matter which Sulpitius would have forced him unto against his will, presenting him naked Swords on every side. And he writeth also, that being thus forcibly brought unto Marius House, he was kept there in this feare, untill such time as returning into the Market-place, he was compelled to revoke againe the Adornment of justice, which he and his companion by Edict had commanded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the Commissions and charge of this Warre against Mithridates to be assigned unto Marius by the voice of the People. Therefore Marius giving order for his departure, sent two of his Colonels before to take the Army of Sylla: who having won his Soldiers hearts before, and stirred them up against Marius, brought them on with him directly towards ROME, being no lesse then five and thirty thousand fighting men: who setting upon the Capitaine Marius had sent unto them, slew them in the Field. In revenge whereof Marius againe in ROME put many of Sylla's friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by found of Trumpet, to all slaves and bondmen that would take Armes for him: but there were never but three onely only that offered themselves. Whereupon, having made a little resistance unto Sylla when he came into ROME, he was soon after compelled to run his way. Marius was no sooner out of the City, but they that were in his company forsaking him, dispersed themselves here and there being darke night: and Marius himselfe got to a house of his in the Country, called Salonium, and sent his Son to one of his Father in Law Mutius Farnes, nor far from thence, to make some provision for victuals. But Marius in the meane time, went before to OSTIA, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared him a ship, in the which he embarked immediately, not tarrying for his Son, and hoisted saile, having onely Granius his Wives Son with him. In the meane time the younger Marius being at his Father in Law Mutius Farnes, staid so long in getting of provision, in trussing of it up, and carrying it away, that broad day light had like to have discovered him: for the enemies had advertisement whither he was gone, whereupon certain horsemen were sent thither supposing to have found him. But the keeper of the house having an inkling of their coming, and preventing them also before they came, suddenly yoked his Oxen to the Cart, which he loded with Beanes and hid this younger Marius under the same. And pricking the Oxen forward with his Gode, set out, and met them as they went towards the City, & delivered Marius in this fort into his Wives house: and there taking such things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the sea, and took ship, finding one croffe-sailed, bound towards AFRIKE. Marius the Father sailing on still, had a very good wind to point along the coast of ITALY: notwithstanding being afraid of one Geminus, a chief man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gave the Mariners warning thereof betimes, & willed them to take heed of landing at TERRACINE. The Mariners were very willing to obey him, but the wind stood full against them coming from the main, which raised a great storme, and they feared much that their vessel which was but a boat, would not brook the seas: besides that, he himselfe was very sick in his stomacke, and fore sea-beaten: notwithstanding at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recovered the coast over against the City of CIRCES. In the meane time, the storme increased still, and their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandering up and downe not knowing what to do, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in such like cases of extremity, they thought it alwayes the best safety for them, to flee from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they saw nor for: if the sea were their enemy, the land was so likewise. To meet with men they were afraid: and not to meet with them on the other side lacking victuals, was indeed the greater danger. Nevertheless, in the end they met with herd-men that could give them nothing to eat, but knowing Marius warned him to get him out of the way as soon as he could possible, because it was not long since that there passed by a great Troop of Horsemen that fought him all about. And being brought unto such perplexity, that he knew not where to bestow himself, and specially for that the poor he men had in his company were almost starved for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and sought out a very thick Wood, where he passed all that night in great sorrow, and the next morning being compelled of necessity, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandered on along on the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, and praying them not to despaire, but to refer themselves to him, even untill the last hope, trusting in certain Prophecies which the Soothsayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the Country, he gathered up in the lap of his Gown, the airy of an Eagle, in the which were seven young Eagles: whereat his Father and Mother much wondering, asked the Soothsayers what that meant. They answered, that their Son should one day be one of the greatest men in the world, and that out of doubt he should obtain seven times in his life the chiefe Office of dignity in his Country. And for that matter, it is said, that so indeed it came to passe. Other hold opinion, that such as were about Marius at that time, in that present place, and elsewhere, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, believed it, and afterwards put it down in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both false and fained. For, they say that the Eagle never hath but two young ones: by reason whereof it is maintained also, that the Poet Musaem hath liyd, in that which he hath written in these verses:

The Eagle layes three egges, and two she hatcheth forth:
But yet she bringeth up but one, that any thing is worth.

Howsoever it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying said, that he was assured he should come unto the seventh Consulship. When they were come neare now to the City of MINTURNIS, about two miles and a halfe from it, they might perceive a Troope of horsemen coming by the sea side, and two ships on the sea that fell upon the coast by good hap. Wherefore they all began to run (so long as they had breath and strength) towards the seas, into the which they threw themselves, and got by swimming unto one of the ships where Granius was: and they croffed over unto the Ille that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heavy and sicke of body, two of his servants holpe to hold him up alwayes above water, with the greatest paine and difficulty in the world: and at the last they laboured so thoroughly, that they put him into the other ship at the selfe same present when the horsemen came unto the sea side; who cried out aloud to the Mariners to land againe, or else throw Marius over-board, and then to go where they would. Marius on the other side humbly besought them with tears, not to do so: whereby the Masters of the ship in a short space were in many minds whither to do it, or not to do it. In the end notwithstanding, they answered the horsemen, they would not throw him over board: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But as soone as they were gone, the Master of the ship changing minde, drew towards land; land, and cast Anchor about the mouth of the River of Liris; where it leaveth her banks, and maketh great Marshes: and there they told Marius he should do well to go on land to eat somewhat, and refresh his sea-sick body, till the wind served them to make saile, which doubtlesse said they, will be at a certain hour when the sea-wind falls and becomes calme, and that there riseth a little wind from the land, ingendred by the vapors of the Marshes, which will serve the turn very well to take seas again. Marius following their counsel, and thinking they had meant good fairly, was set on land upon the Rivers banks: and there laid him down upon the grasse, nothing suspecting that which happened after to him. For the Mariners presently taking their ship againe, and hoisting up their Anchors sailed straight away, and fled: judging it no honesty for them to have delivered Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor safety for themselves to have saved him. Marius finding himself all alone, and forsaken of every man, lay on the ground a great while, and said never a word: yet at the length taking heart a little to him, got up once again on his feet, and painfully wandered up and down: where was neither way nor path at all, overthwart deep Marshes and great Ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poor old mans Cottage, dwelling there in these Marshes; and falling at his feet, besought him to help to save and succour a poor afflicted man, with promise that one day he would give him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present danger wherein he was. The old man, whether for that he had known Marius aforetime, or that seeing him (by conjecture onely) judged him to be some great personage, told him that if he meant but to lie downe and rest himself a little, his poor Cabine would serve that turne reasonably well: but if he meant to wander thus, to flee his enemies that followed him, he would then bring him into a more secret place, and farther off from noise. Marius prayed him that he would do so much for him: and the good man brought him into the Marsh, unto a low place by the Rivers side, where he made him lie downe, and then covered him with a great deale of Reed and Bent, and other such light things as could not hurt him. He had not long been there, but he heard a great noise coming towards the Cabine of the poor old man: for Geminus of TERRACINE had sent men all about to seek for him, whereof some by chance came that way, and put the poor man in a feare; and threatened him that he had received and hidden an enemy of the ROMANS. Marius hearing that, rose out of the place where the old man had laid him, and stripping himselfe stark naked, went into a part of the Marsh where the water was full of mire and mud, and there was found of those that searched for him: who taking him out of the slime all naked as he was, carried him into the City of MINTURNES, and delivered him there into the Governors hands. Open Proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALY, that they should apprehend Marius, and kill him wheresoever they found him. Notwithstanding, the Governours and Magistrates of MINTURNES thought good first to consult thereupon among themselves, and in the meane time they delivered him into the safe custody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to have been a bitter enemy of his, for an old grudge she had to him, which was this. Fannia sometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom she was willing to leave, for they could not agree, and required her Dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe said, he had plaid the whoore. The matter was brought before Marius in his sixth Consulship, who had given judgement upon it. Both parties being heard, and the Law prosecuted on either side, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her Husband knowing it well enough before, yet he tooke her with her faults, and long time lived with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gave sentence that the husband should repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, she should pay four farthings. This notwithstanding, when Fannia saw Marius, she grudged him not for that, and least of all had any revenging minde in her towards him, but contrarily did comfort and help him what she could with that she had. Marius thanked her marvellously for it, and bad her hope well: because she met with so good lucke as he was coming to her house, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neare unto Fannias house, her door being open, there came an Ass running out to go to drinke at a Conduit not far from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked upon him with a livefull countenance, first of all stopping sodainely before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skip by him. Whereupon Marius straight conjecturing with himself, said, that the gods did signifie unto him, that he should save himself sooner by water then by land: because the Ass leaving him, ran to drinke, and cared not to eate. So when he had told Fannia this tale, he desired to rest, and prayed them to let him alone, and to shut the Chamber door to him. But the Magistrates of the City having consulted together about him, in the end resolved they must deferre no longer time, but dispatch him out of the way presently. Now when they were agreed upon it, they could not finde a man in the City that durst take upon him to kill him: but a man of Armes of the GAULES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we finde both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his sword drawn in his hand. Now, that place of the Chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of Armes thought he saw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner, saying unto him: O fellow, thou darrest thou to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAULE hearing these words, ran out of the Chamber presently, casting his sword in the middle of the floor, and cryed out these words onely: I cannot kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTURNIANS afraid in the City at the first, but afterwards it moved them to compassion. So they were angry with themselves, and did repent them that they converted their counsel to so cruell and unkind a deed, against one that had preferred all ITALY: and to deny him aide in so extreme necessity, it was too great a sin. Therefore let us let him go, said they to themselves, where he will, and suffer him to take his fortune appointed him elsewhere: and let us pray to the gods to pardon this offence of ours, to have thrust Marius naked and beggarly out of our City. For these considerations, the MINTURNIANS went all together to Marius where he was, and stood about him, determining to see him safely conducted unto the sea side. Now though every man was ready & willing to pleasure him, some with one thing, some with another, and that they did hasten him all they could possibly, yet they were a good while a going thither: because there was a wood called Marcia, that lay right in their way between their City & the Sea coast, which they greatly reverence, and think it a Sacrilege to carry any thing out of that Wood, that was once brought into it. On the other side, to leave to go through this Wood, and to compass it round about, it would aske a marvellous long time. So they standing all in doubt what they should do, one of the ancientest men of the City spake aloud unto them, and said: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to save Marius life. Then Marius himself being the foremost man, taking up some of the fardels which they carried with him to pleasure him in the ship, went through the Wood. All other things necessary being thus readily prepared for him with like good will, and specially the ship which one Bellauus had ordained for him: he caused all this story to be painted in a Table at large, which he gave unto the Temple, out of the which he departed when he took ship. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune carried him into the Isle of ENARIA, where he found Granius and some other of his friends, with whom he took sea again, and pointed towards AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to Land in SICILIA, in the territory of the City of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMANE Quæstor, who kept that coast. Marius being landed there, escaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he slew sixteen of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all speed, crossed the seas, untill he arrived in the Isle of MENYNGE, where he first understood that his Son was saved with Citibegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempsall King of the NUMIDIANS to beseech him for aide. This gave him a little courage, and made him bold to passe out of that Isle, into the coast of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMANE Prætor was Governour of AFRICKE, unto whom Marius had never done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pity onely he might perhaps have help at his hand. Howbeit he was no sooner landed with a few of his men, but a Sergeant came and said unto him: Sextilius, Prætor and Governour of LYBIA, doth forbid thee to land in all this Province: otherwise he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandement, and pursue thee as an enemy of the ROMANS. Marius hearing this commandement, was so angry and forry both, that he could not readily tell what answer to make him, and pawed a good while, and said never a word, still eyeing the Sergeant with a grim look: untill he asked him what answer he would make to the Prætors commandement. Marius then fetching a deep sigh from his heart, gave him this answer: Thou shalt tell Sextilius, that thou hast seen Caius Marius banished out of his Countrey, sitting amongst the ruines of the City of CARTHAGE. By this answer, he wisely layed the example of the ruine and destruction of that great City of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune, to warne Sextilius that the like might fall upon him. In the mean time, Hiempsall King of the NUMIDIANS, not knowing how to resolve, did honourably intreate young Marius and his company: but when they were willing to go their way, he alwayes found new occasion to stay them, and was very glad to see that he started not for any opportunity or good occasion that was offered notwithstanding there fortunated a happy mean unto them, whereby they saved themselves. And this it was. This Marius the younger being a fair complexioned young man, it pittied one of the Kings Concubines to see him so hardly dealt withall. This pity of hers was a shadow to cloak the love she bare him; but Marius would not hearken at the first to her inticements, and refused her. Yet in the end, perceiving that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and considering that she did all things for their avails, more diligently and lovingly then she would have done, if she had not meant further matter unto him, then onely to enjoy the pleasure of him: he then accepted her love and kindness, so as at the length she taught him a way how to flye, and save himself and his friends. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had embraced and saluted each other, and going along the sea side, they found two Scorpions fighting together. Marius took this for an ill signe: whereupon they quickly took a sifter boat, and went into the Isle of CERCINA, which is no great distance off from firme land. They had no sooner hoisted up Anchor, but they saw the horsemen which King Hiempsall had sent unto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greatest dangers that Marius ever escaped. In the mean time there was news at ROME, that Sylla made war against King Mithridates Lieutenant: and furthermore, that the Consuls being up in Arms the one against the other, Octavius wan the battell; and being the stronger, had driven out Cinna who sought to have usurped tyrannical power, and had made Cornelius Merula Consul in his place: and that Cinna on the other side leavied men out of other parts of ITALY, and made wars upon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diffention, thought good to return as soon as he could possibly into ITALY. And assembling certain horsemen of the Nation of the MAURUSIANS in AFRICKE, and certain ITALIANS that had saved themselves there, unto the number of thousand men in all: he took sea, and landed in a Haven of TUSCANE called TELAMON; and being landed, proclaimed by sound of Trumpet, liberty to all slaves and bondmen that would come to him. So the laborers, herdmen and neat-herds of all that Marsh, for the onely name and reputation of Marius, ran to the sea side from all parts: of the which he having chosen out the stoutest and lustiest of them; wan them so by faire words, that having gathered a great company together in few dayes, he made forty saile of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octavius was a marvellous honest man; that would have no authority otherwise then Law and reason, would: and that Cinna to the contrary was suspected of Sylla, and that he fought to bring in change and innovation to the Common-wealth: he determined to joyn his force with Cinna. So Marius sent first unto Cinna, to let him understand that he would obey as Consull, and be ready to do all that he should command him. Cinna received him, and gave him the Title and Authority of Vice-consull, and sent him Sergeants to carry Axes and Rods before him, with all other signes of Publike Authority. But Marius refused them, and said, that pompe became not his miserable fortune: for he ever went in a poor thread-bare Gown, and had let his haire grow still after he was banished, being about three-score and ten years old, and had a sober gate with him, to make men pity him the more that saw him. But under all this counterfeit pity of his he never changed his naturall look, which was ever more fearful and terrible then otherwise. And where he spake but little, and went very demurely and soberly, that shewed rather a cankered courage with him, then a minde humbled by his banishment. Thus when he had saluted Cinna, and spoken to the souldiers, he then began to set things a-broach, and made a wonderful change in few dayes. For first of all, with his ships he cut off all the victuals by Sea, and robbed the Merchants that carried Corne and other victuals to Rome: so that in short space he was master Purveyor for all necessary provision and victuals. After this he went along the coast, and took all the Cities upon the sea side, and at the length wan O S T I A also by treason, put the most part of them in the Town to the sword, and spoiled all their goods: and afterwards making a Bridge upon the River of T I B E R, took from his enemies all hope to have any manner of Provision by Sea. That done, he went directly towards Rome with his Army, where first he wan the hill called Janiculum through Othavius fault: who overthrew himself in his doings, not so much for lacke of reasonable skill of warres, as through his unprofitable curiosity and strictnesse in observing the Law. For when divers did perswade him to set the bondmen at liberty to take Armes for defence of the Common-wealth: he answered, that he would never give bondmen the Law and Priviledge of a ROMAN Citizen, having driven Caius Marius out of Rome, to maintain the Authority of the Law. But when Caelius Metellus was come to Rome, the Son of that Metellus Numidicus, that having begun the warres in LY B I A against King Jugurth, was put out by Marius: the souldiers forsooke Othavius immediately, and came unto him, because they took him to be a better Captain, and desired also to have a Leader that could tell how to command them to save the City, and the Common-wealth. For they promised to fight valiantly, and perswaded themselves that they should overcome their enemies, so that they had a skilfull and valiant Capitaine that could order them. Metellus mistaking their offer, commanded them in anger to return againe unto the Consull: but they for spite went unto the enemies. Metellus on the other side, seeing no good order taken in the City to resist the enemies, got him out of Rome. But Othavius being perswaded by certain Soothsayers and CHALDEAN Sacrificers, who promised him all should go well with him, tarried still in Rome: for that man being otherwise, as wise as any ROMAN of his time, and one that dealt as uprightly in his Consullship, not carried away with flattering tales, and one also that followed the Ancient Orders and Customes as infallible rules and example, neither breaking nor omitting any part thereof: he thinks yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothsayers, Wisemen, and Astronomers, more then men skilfull in Armes and Governmt. Wherefore, before that Marius himself came into the City, Othavius was by force plucked out of the Pulpit for Orations, and slaine presently by Marius souldiers whom he had sent before into the City. And it is said also, that when he was slaine, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN Prophecie in his bosome: and here is to be noted a great contrariety in these two notable men, Othavius and Marius. The first lost his life by trusting to Soothsaying, and the second prospered, and rose again, because he did not despise the Art of Divination. The state of Rome standing then in this manner, the Senate consulting together, sent Ambassadors unto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into Rome, and not to imbrue their hands with the blood of their Citizens. Cinna sitting in his chaire as Consull, gave them audience, and made them a very reasonable and courteous answer. Marius standing by him spake never a word: but shewed by his fowre look that he would straight fill Rome with murder and blood. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome environed with a great number of souldiers: but Marius staid suddenly at the gate, speaking partly in anger, and partly in mockery, that he was a banished man, and driven out of his Country by Law: and therefore if they would have him come into Rome again, they should first by a contrary Decree abolish and revoke that of his banishment, as if he had a Religious observer of the Laws, and as though Rome had at that present enjoyed their Freedome and Liberty. Thus he made the people assemble in the Market-place to proceed to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or four Tribes had time to give their voices, disguising the matter no longer, and shewing plainly that he meant not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into Rome with a Guard about him, of the veriest Rascals and most flamelesse slaves, called the BARDIANS, who came to him from all parts: and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinkling of his eye, or at a nod of his head made to them, slew many men through his commandment, and at the length slew Ancharius a Senator (that had been Prætor) at Marius feet with their swords, because onely that Marius did not salute him when he came one day to speak with him. After this murther, they continued killing all them that Marius did not salute, and speak unto: for that was the very sign he had given them to kill them openly in the streets before every man; so that his very friends were afraid of being murdered, when they came to salute him. Thus a great number of men being slaine, Cinna in the end began to be satisfied and to appease his anger. But Marius anger and unsatiable desire of revenge increased more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him never so little: and there was neither Town nor high way, that was not full of Scouts and Spies to hunt them out that hid themselves and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friend is faithful, and to be trusted, if fortune frown never so little: for there were very few that did not betray their friends that fled to them for succour. And therefore do Cornutus servants so much the more deserve praise, who having secretly hidden their Master in his house, did hang the dead body of some common person by the neck, and having put a Gold Ring on his finger, they shewed him to the BARDIANS, Marius Guard, and buried him in stead of their own Master, without suspicion of any man that it was a fained thing: and so Cornutus being hidden by his servants, was safely conveyed into the Country of GAULE. Marke Anthony the Orator had also found out a faithfull friend, yet was he unfortunate. This faithfull friend of his, was a poor simple man, who have received one of the chieftest men of Rome into his house to keep him close there: he being desirous to make him the best cheer he could with that little he had, sent one of his men to the next Tavern to fetch wine, who tasting the wine more curiously then he was wont to do, called for better. The Drawer asked him why the new ordinary Wine would not serve him, but he must needs have of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply answered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his master did feast Marke Anthony, who was hidden very secretly in his house. He was no sooner gone with his Wine, and his back turned, but the vile traiterous Drawer ranne unto Marius, who was set at Supper when he came. The Drawer being brought unto him, promised him to deliver Marke Anthony into his hands. Marius hearing of that, was so jocond, that he cried out and clapt his hands together for joy, and would have risen from the boord, and gone thither himself in person, had not his friends kept him backe. But he sent Annius one of his Captains thither with a certain number of souldiers, and commanded them to bring him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the Drawer had brought them to, Annius tarried beneath at the door, and the souldiers went up the staires into the Chamber, and finding Anthony there, they began to encourage one another to kill him, not one of them having the heart to lay hands upon him. For Anthonies tongue was as sweet as a Syrene, and had such an excellent grace in speaking, that when he began to speak unto the souldiers, and to pray them to save his life: there was not one of them so hard hearted, as once to touch him, no not onely to look him in the face, but looking downwards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiving they tarried long, and came not down, went himself up into the Chamber, and found Anthony talking to his souldiers, and them weeping, his sweet eloquent tongue had so melted their hearts: but he rating them, ran furiously upon him, and strake off his head with his own hands. And Catulus Lucilius also, that had been Consull with Marius, and had triumphed over the CIMBRES with him, seeing himselfe in this perill, set men to intreate Marius for him: but his answer was ever, He must needs die. So Catulus locked himselfe into a little Chamber, and made a great fire of Charcole to be kindled, and with the smoake thereof choaked himself. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the streets, and trode them under their feet: the which was not onely a pittifull, but a fearful sight to all that saw them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieved the people so much, as the horrible lechery and abominable cruelty of his Guard of the BARDIANS, who coming into mens houses by force, after they had slaine the Masters, defiled their young children, and ravished their Wives and Maides: and no man would once reprove their cruelty, lechery, and unsatiable avarice: until Cinna and Verrius in the end set upon them as they slept in their Campe, and slew them every one. But in this extremity, as if all things had been restored unto their first estate, news came againe from all parts to Rome, that Sylla having ended his warre against King Mithridates, and recovered the Provinces which he had usurped, returned into ITALY with a great power. This caused these evils and unspeakable miseries to cease a little, because the wicked doers of the same, looked they should have warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was chosen Consull the seventh time. He going out of his house openly the first day of January, being the beginning of the year, to take possession of his Consullship, caused one Sextus Lucilius to be thrown down headlong from the Rocks of A R P E I A N, which seemed to be a great signe and certain token of the evils and miseries that fell out afterwards the selfe same year upon them for their faction, unto all the City beside. But Marius being fore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppressed with extreme sorrow and griefe, could now now at this last time of need pluck up his heart to him againe, when he came to think of this new war toward that threatened him, and of the dangers, griefs, and troubles he should enter into, more great and perillous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for fear when he began to thinke of it, considering that he had to fight, not with Othavius, nor with Mervla, Captaines of a Company of rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driven him out of Rome before, and that came now from driving the puissant King Mithridates, unto the furthest part of the Realm of PONT, and of the sea Euxinum. Thus, deeply weighing and considering the same, and specially when he looked back upon his long time of banishment, how vagabondlike he wandered up and down in other Countries, and remembered the great misfortunes he had passed, and the sundry dangers he fell so often into, being pursued still by sea and by land: it grieved him to the heart, and made him so unquiet, that he could not sleep in the night, or if he slept, had fearfull dreams that troubled him, and still he thought he heard a voice buzzing in his ears:

A Lions very Denne is dreadful to behold, I though he himself be gone abroad, and be not there in hold.

But fearing most of all that he should no more sleepe and take his rest, he gave himselfe to make.

A note against the ambitious.

Platoes words at his death.

Note, that in Syllas Life following, it appeareth that Marius the younger was besieged in the City of Præneste, and not in Perusia as ye read here. So as the City seemeth to be mistaken in one of the lives unreasonable banquets, and to drink more then his years could bear, seeking to win sleep by this means, to avoid care the better. But at the length there came one from the Sea, that gave him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increase of a new fear unto him. And thus he being now extremely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly also for the over heavy burden of his present ill, there needed but little more aggravation, to fall into the disease whereof he died, which was a Plurisie: as Pofidonius the Philosopher writteth; who saith plainly, that he went into his Chamber when he was sicke, and spake unto him about matters of his Ambassade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet another Historiographer Caius Piso writeth, that Marius walking one day after supper with his friends, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his Life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him: concluding, that it is no wife mans part to trust her any more. So when he had done, he took his leave of them, and laid him down upon his bed, where he lay sicke seven dayes together, and on the seventh day died. Some write that his ambition appeared plainly, by a strange raving that took him in his head during his sickness: for he thought that he made wars with Mithridates, and shewed in his bed all the gestures and movings of his body, as if he had been in a battell, crying the same cries out aloud, which he was wont to cry when he was in the extremest fight. The desire he had to have taken this charge in hand against Mithridates, was so deeply settled in his mind through extream ambition and jealousy that posselt him, that being then threecore and ten year old, after he had been the first man that ever was chosen seven times Consull in ROME, and also after that he had gotten a world of goods and riches together that might have sufficed many Kings: yet for all this he died for sorrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had died before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had desired. But this was clean contrary unto that the wife Plato did, when he drew neere to his death. For he gave God thanks for his fatal end and good fortune. First, for that he had made him a reasonable man, and no brute beast: secondly, a Greeke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported also, that one Antipater of THAKSIS, calling to minde a little before his death the good fortune he had in his Life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy Navigation he made, coming from his Country unto ATHENS: which did witnesse that he put upon the file of his good accounts for a singular great grace, all favour fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetual memory, being the onely and most assured treasure a man can have, to keep those gifts that nature or fortune do bestow upon him. But contrariwise unthankfull fooles unto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefits, and laying up nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwayes voide of goods and full of hope, gaping still for things to come, and leaving in the mean time the thing present, though reason persuades them the contrary. For fortune may easily let them of the thing to come, but she cannot take that from them which is already past: and yet they utterly forget the certain benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging unto them, and dream alwayes of that which is uncertaine. And sure it changeth to them by great reason: for, having gathered outward goods together, and locking them up before they have built and laid a sure grounded foundation of reason through good Learning, they cannot afterwards fill nor quench their unsatiable greedy covetous mind. Thus ended Marius his Life, the seventeenth day of his seventh Consulship, whereof all the City of ROME was not a little glad, and took heart againe unto them, supposing they had then been delivered from a bloody cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their cost, that they had changed an old master taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: such extreme unnatural cruelties and murders did Marius the younger commit, after the death of his father Marius, murdering in manner all the chiefe nobles of ROME. At the first, they took him for a valiant and hardy young man, whereupon they named him the Son of Mars: but shortly after his deeds did shew the contrary, and then they called him the Son of Venus. In the end he was shut in, and besieged by Sylla in the City of PERUSIA, where he did what he could possible to save his life, but all was in vain: and lastly, seeing no way to escape, the City being taken, he slew himselfe with his owne hands.

The end of Caius Marius Life.

THE LIFE OF LYSANDER.

Ann. Mund.
3546.

Ant. Christ.

IN the treasury of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the Temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inscription: Brasidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the spoile of the ATHENIANS. That inscription maketh many men think, that the image of stone that standeth within the chamber by the door thereof, is the image of Brasidas: howbeit in truth it is the lively image of Lysander himselfe, made with a great bush of haire, and thicke long Beard after the old ancient fashon. And where some say that the ARGIVES, after they were overcome and had lost a great battell, did all of them shave themselves in token and signe of common sorrow: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side shew the joy of their Victory, did let all their hairs grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIADS: who being fled from CORINTH unto LACEDÆMON, the LACEDÆMONIANS found them so ill favouredly disguised and deformed, because their heads were all shaven, that thereupon they had a desire to let their haire and beards grow. For that was one of the Ordinances of Lycargus, who said, that the long bush of haire maketh them that are naturally fair, the pleasanter to look upon: and upon those that are ill favoured, more ugly and fearful to see to. And furthermore, it is said that Aristoclitus, the Father of Lysander, was not of the Royall blood of the Kings of SPARTA, though he came of the Race of the Heraclides: and that his Son Lysander was very meanly and poorly brought up, being as obedient to the Laws and Statutes of his Country, as any other man was, shewing himselfe alwayes very strong and constant against all vanity and pleasure, saving onely in matters of honor and courtesie, which they offer unto those that deserve well. For they think it no shame nor dishonesty in SPARTA, that the young men do suffer themselves to be overcome with that delight and pleasure: but do bring up their children, that from their youth they would have them to have some taste and feeling of honour, delighting to be praised, and sorry to be discommended. For they make no account of him that is not moved with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no manner of minde to do good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and stoutnesse that was bred in Lysander, proceeded of the LACONICAN discipline and education he had, and not so much of his own nature. But indeed of his own nature he was a right Courtier, and could tell how to entertain and flatter great States and Nobilitie; far better then the common manner of the naturall SPARTANS: and moreover for his private benefit, he could easily bear with the stoutnesse of greater men of Authority then himselfe, which some judge to be a great point of wisdom, to know how to deale in matters of State.

Aristotle in a place where he saith, that the greatest wits commonly are subject unto Melancholie (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lysander in his latter age fell into the Melancholy disease, but not in his youth. He had also this singular gift above all other, that in his poverty he alwayes kept that honest modesty with him; as he would never be overcome nor corrupted with Gold nor Silver: and yet he filled his Country with riches and covetousnesse, which lost him the reputation he had won, because himself made none account of riches nor getting. For, bringing store of Gold and Silver into his Countrey after he had overcome the ATHENIANS, he reserved not unto himself one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Dionysius the Tyrant of SYRACUSA had on a time sent goodly rich Gowns out of SICILIA to his Daughters: he refused them, saying, that he was afraid such Gowns would make them fowler. Nevertheless, shortly after being sent Ambassadour out of his Countrey to the same Tyrant, Dionysius having sent him two Gownes, praying him to choose which he would, and to carry to his Daughter: he answered that she herself could best chuse which was the fitter, and so carried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes, the wars of PELOPONNESUS fell out marvellous long. For after the overthrow of the Army which the ATHENIANS had sent into SICILIA, when every man thought they had utterly lost all their force by sea, and that by all conjecture they should soon after lose all by land also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale again in matters of the State, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he set the ATHENIANS afloat again, and made them as strong by sea as the LACEDAEMONIANS: who thereupon began to quake for fear, and to look effoonces for a fresh war, perceiving that they stood in need of a great power, and of a better Capitaine then ever they had before. Whereupon they made Lysander their Admirall, who arriving in the City of EPHESUS, found them very well affected towards him, and marvellous willing and ready to take the LACEDAEMONIANS part: howbeit otherwise in very poor state, and ready almost to take up all the barbarous manners and fashions of the PERSIANS, because they did continually frequent them, being environed round about with the Countrey of LYDIA, where the King of PERSIAES Captaines were ever resident. Wherefore, having planted his Campe there, he brought thither Merchants ships out of all parts, and set up an arsenal or store-houfe to build Gallies in: so that in short space, by oft recourse of Merchants that began to trade thither, he quickened their Havens, and set up their staple again for the Traffick of Merchandise, and filled every private Artificers house with an honest trade to make them rich by, so that ever after it grew in continual hope to come unto that flourishing state and greatnesse, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysander being advertised that Cyrus, one of the great Kings of PERSIAES Sons, was come unto the City of SARDIS, he went thither to speake with him, and to complaine of Tisaphernes: who having commandment given him from the King to aide the LECEDEMONIANS, and to helpe to expulse the ATHENIANS, and to drive them from the sea, seemed to deal but coldly and faintly against them: for the favour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furnishing the LECEDEMONIANS very scantily with money, he was the cause that all their Army by sea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tisaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himselfe a little odd grudge to him. Wherefore he loved Lysander marvellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tisaphernes, as also for the pleasure he took in his company, because he was a man that could wonderfully please and delight Noble men: by which meanes having wonne the favour of this young Prince, he did perswade, and also encourage him to follow this warre. And when Lysander was upon his departure to take his leave of him, Cyrus feasted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberality: and that was, that he would freely aske him what he would, assuring him he should not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lysander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to pleasure us, I beseech you, and do also counsell you then to increase the ordinary pay of our Mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they have but three halfe pence, they may henceforth receive two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to hear Lysanders bounty, and the increase that he would make, and caused ten thousand Dariicks to be delivered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the Mariners, the increase of a halfe penny a day. This liberality, within few dayes after emptied all their enemies Gallies of their men. For the most part of their Mariners and Gally-men went where they might have the best pay: and such as remained behind, became very dull, lazy, and seditious, daily troubling their Captaines and Governors. Now though Lysander had drawn his enemies men from them by this policy, and had done them this great hurt, yet he durst not fight it out by sea, fearing the worthinesse of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater store of ships then he had; and besides that, was never overcome by land nor by sea in any battell where he was Generall. So it chanced that Alcibiades went out of the Isle of SAMOS unto the City of PHOCIA, which standeth upon firme land directly over against SAMOS, and leaving the whole charge of his Fleet in his absence, with Antiochus his Pilot: he being more hardy then wise, in scorne and derision of Lysander, went with two Gallies onely into the Haven of EPHESUS, and went by the Arsenal (where all their ships lay in Dock) with great noise and laughing. This put Lysander in such a heat and chafe, that first of all he put a few Gallies to the sea, and had him in chafe with them. But afterwards, perceiving that the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after another to the rescue, he armed other Gallies also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at length they came to maine battell, which Lysander wan, and having taken fiftene of their Gallies, he set up a token of triumph and victory. When the people of ATHENS heard the news of this overthrow; they they were so angry with Alcibiades, that they deposed him presently of his charge: and the souldiers also that lay in Campe in the Isle of SAMOS, began to milke him, and to speak ill of him. Whereupon he presently left his Campe, and went into the Countrey of CHERRONNESUS in THRACIA. This battell was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lysander causing the stoutest and boldest men of every City, above the common fort to come to EPHESUS unto him: laid their secret foundations of great change and alteration, which he established afterwards in the governments of Cities. For he perswaded his private friends to make Tribes amongst themselves, to winne them friends, and to practise to get the rule of their Cities into their hands: promising them, that so soon as the ATHENIANS were overthrowne, they themselves also should be delivered from subjection of their people, and every one of them should beare chiefe rule in their Countrey. And this he performed to them all, and made every one of them prove his words true: for he preferred all them that had been his old friends, unto the best offices and charges, not sparing to do against all right and reason: so that they were advanced by it. And for this cause every man came to take his part, and they all fought and desired to gratifie and please him: hoping, that what great matter soever fell out, they might assure themselves that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to have the Government in his owne hands. And therefore they nothing rejoiced at Callicratidas coming, who came to succeed him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and just a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of governing, which was plaine and without any Art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his Vertue, as they would have done the image of some demi-god made after the old fashion, which had been of singular beauty. But in the mean time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender love and goodwill he bare to his friends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So when Lysander took the seas to return home againe, all they that were in the Campe, were as sorry as could be possible, in as much as the teares stood in their eyes: and he on the other side studied to make them worse affected unto Callicratidas. For amongst many other things, he sent the rest of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had given him to pay the Mariners: saying, that Callicratidas should goe himselfe to aske it, if he would have it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliver, leave, and assigne over the Army into his hands, commanding all the Sea. But Callicratidas, to overcome his false ambition, and soule boasting lye, answered him againe and said: If that be true thou sayest, come then and deliver me the Gallies in the City of MILETUM, as thou goest by, before the Isle of SAMOS: for sith thou commandest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lysander thereto replied, that the Army was no more at his commandement; and that he had the charge over them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly unto PELOPONNESUS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity: for he had brought no money out of his Countrey with him, neither could he compell the Cities to furnish him with any, seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA, to aske them money, as Lysander had done. But he was the unmeetest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall Nature, and thought it lesse dishonour and reproach unto the GRECIANS, to be overcome by the GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, and seek to them that had Gold and Silver enough, but otherwise no goodnesse nor honesty. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his journey towards LYDIA, and went directly to Cyrus Court: where at his first coming, he willed them to let him understand, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDAEMONIANS would speak with him. One of the souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: My friend, sir stranger, Cyrus is not at leisure now, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas answered plainly againe: No force, I will tarry here till he have dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, took him for some plaine lout, and so he went his way at the first time with a mocke at their hands. But the second time, when they would not let him come in at the Gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the City of EPHESUS, cursing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased themselves, as to go sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proud and stately for their goods and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soon as he came to SPARTA againe, he would do all that he could possible to pacifie the GRECIANS, and set them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearfull to the barbarous people, and also that they should meddle with them no more, nor need their aide to destroy one another. But Callicratidas having the noble heart of a SPARTAN, and being to be compared in justice, valiancy, and greatnesse of courage, with the most excellent GRECIANS in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost upon the Isles ARGI-NUSES. Wherefore, the confederates of the LACEDAEMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sent an Ambassade unto SPARTA, by which they made request to the Councell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall: promising that they would do all things with better courage and good will under his conduction, then they would under any other Capitaine they could send them. So much did Cyrus also write unto them. But because there was an expresse Law, forbidding that one man should be twice Admirall, and besides, they being willing to grant the request of their confederates, made one Arachus their Admirall, but in effect gave Lysander the whole authority of all things: who was marvellous welcome unto them, and

and specially unto the heads and Rulers of Cities, which long before had wished for his coming: because that by his means they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loved plain dealing, and open magnanimity in the manners of a Governour and Generall, when they came to compare Lyfander with Callicratidas, they found that Lyfander had a fine subtil head, and did more in wars with his policy and subtilty, then by any other means. And moreover, that he esteemed justice, when it fell out profitable: and took profit, for justice and honesty, not thinking that plain dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that said, that the race of Hercules should not make wars with craft and subtilty. For, said he, when the Lions skin will not serve, we must helpe it with the cufe of a Fox. And hereunto agreeth that which they write he did in the City of MILETUM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promised aide for destruction of the peoples authority, and to drive their enemies out of the City: they having changed their mindes, and being reconciled unto their adversaries, he openly made great shew of gladnesse, and seemed as though he would helpe to agree them together: but secretly being alone, he took them up sharply, and told them that they were cowards to do it, and did procure them to the contrary, to set upon the people. And then when he understood that there was commotion among them in the City, he ran thither suddenly as it were to appease it. But when he was also come into the City, the first he met with of them that would alter the state of the Government, and take the Authority from the people, he fell out withall, and gave them rough words, commanding with extremity that they should follow him, as though he would have done some great punishment. And againe, meeting with them of the contrary part, he willed them also that they should not be afraid, nor doubt that any man should do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practise of him, to stay the chiefeft of them that were most affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwards he might put them all to death, as he did: for they that trusting to his words remained quiet in the City, were all put to death. Moreover, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lyfander was wont to say: by the which it appeareth, that he made very little reckoning to be perjured. For he said, that children should be deceived with the play of Kayles, and men with Oathes of men, following therein Polycrates the Tyrant of SAMOS, but without reason: for he was a lawfull Capitaine, and the other a violent usurper of Tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behave himself towards the Gods none otherwise, then towards men, but rather worse, and more injuriously. For he that deceiveth his enemy, and breaketh his Oath to him, sheweth plainly that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God: Cyrus therefore having sent for Lyfander to come to SARDIS to him, gave him money largely, and promised him more: and because he would more honourably shew the goodwill he had to gratifie him, told him, that if the King his Father would give him nothing, yet he would give him of his own. And furthermore, when all other meanes failed to help him with money, that rather then he should lacke, he would melt his own chaire to make money of (which he fate in when he gave audience in matters of Justice) being altogether of Gold and Silver. And to be short, when he was going into MEDIA to the King his Father, he gave Lyfander power to receive the Taxes and ordinary tributes of the Cities under his Government, and made him Lieutenant of all his Country. And lastly, bidding him farewell, prayed him that he would not give battell by sea unto the ATHENIANS, untill he returned from the Court: and that before his coming againe, he would have authority to leavy a great number of ships, as well out of PHOENICIA, as out of CILICIA. Wherefore whilst Cyrus was in his journey, Lyfander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ships, nor also to lie still and do nothing with so good a number of Gallies, went and scoured the seas, where he took certain Islands, and robbed also EGINA and SALAMINA. From thence he went and landed on the firme Land in the Countrey of ATTICA, and did his duty there unto Agis King of LACEDÆMONIA, who came purposely from the Fort of Decelea to the sea side to see him, because their Army by land also should see what power they had by sea, and how it ruled more by sea then they would. Neverthelesse, being advertised that the fleets of the ATHENIANS followed hard after him, he took another course to flie back againe into ASIA by the Isles: and returning againe, found all the Countrey of HELLESPONT without men of war. So he laid siege before the City of LAMPACUS, and did assault it with his Gallies by sea: and Thorax being come thither also at the selfe same time in great hast, with his Army by land gave the assault on his side. Thus was the City taken by force, which Lyfander left to the spoile of the souldiers. Now in the mean time the fleet of the ATHENIANS (which was an hundred and fourescore sail) came to an Anchor before the City of ELEUNTE, in the Countrey of CHERRONESUS: and news being brought them that the City of LAMPACUS was taken, they came with all speed possible unto the City of SESTOS, where getting fresh Cates and Victuals, they coasted all along the coast unto a certaine place called the Goates River, directly over against the fleet of their enemies, which lay yet at Anchor before the City of LAMPACUS. Now there was a Capitaine of the ATHENIANS amongst other, called Philoctes, he that perswaded the ATHENIANS to cut off the prisoners Thombes of their right hands that were taken in the warres, to the end they should no more handle the Pike, but onely serve to pull the Ower. Both the one and the other rested that day, hoping to have battell without faile the next morning. But Lyfander having another meaning with him, commanded the Masters and Mariners notwithstanding, that they should should have their Gallies ready to give battell the next morning by break of day, because every man should get aboard beimes, and should keepe themselves in order of battell, making no noise at all, attending what he would command them: and further, made the Army by land also to be ranged in battell ray, by the sea side. The next morning at Sunne rising, the ATHENIANS began to row with all their Gallies in order of battell in a front. But Lyfander, though he had his ships in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that against them, but sending out Pinnaes unto the first Gallies, commanded them straightly that they should not stirre at all, but keepe themselves in order, making no noise, nor rowing against the enemy. Though the ATHENIANS also were retired in the night, he would not give the souldiers leave to comoroland out of the Gallies, before he had sent first two or three Gallies to destroy the fleet of his enemies: who brought him word that they had seen the ATHENIANS take land. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth also all in one sort: so that the ATHENIANS began to be bold of themselves, and to despise their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for fear of them, and durst not come forward. In the mean time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the Countrey of CHERRONESUS, in certain places which he had conquered) came riding to the Campe of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captaines and Generals of the Army, the great faults they committed. First, for that they had cast Anchor, and kept their ships in an open place, where there was no manner of succour, nor harbor to retire unto upon any storme: and worst of all, because that they were to fetch their victuals far off, at the City of SESTOS, unto which Haven they should rather draw themselves, considering that they had but a little way to go, and also they should have the City to backe them, which would furnish them with all things necessary: and beside that, they should be further off from their enemies, which were governed by one Generall onely that did command them all, and were so well trained that at a whistle they were ready straight to execute his commandement. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not onely misliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydemus, that answered him very leudly: That he had nothing to do to command the Army, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS having made the same countenance to present battell unto their enemies, and retiring the same night as of custome, very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies, Lyfander sent againe certaine Gallies to destroy them, commanding the Captaines of the same, that when they perceived the ATHENIANS had left their Gallies and taken land, they should then return back with all possible speed they could, and being midway over the straights, that they should lift up a Copper Target into the aire, upon the top of a Pike in the fore-deck, for a signe to make all the whole fleet to row in battell. Now Lyfander himselfe in the meane time went in person from Gallie to Gallie, perswading and exhorting every Capitaine, that they should put their Gallies, Mariners, and souldiers in good readinesse, to the end that when the signe should be lifted up, they should row with all their might in battell against the enemies. Wherefore, so soon as the Copper Target was set up in the aire, and that Lyfander had made his Trumpet sound out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the sea: the Gallies immediately began to row for life in envy one of another, and the footmen that were upon the land, ranne with speed also to the top of a high cliffe neare unto the sea, to see what would be the end of the fight, because the distance from one side to the other in that place was not fully two miles; which they had soon cut over, and in a little space, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their Oars. So Conon the chiefe Capitaine of the ATHENIANS perceiving from the shore this great Fleet coming with a full force to assault them: he thence cryed out to the souldiers that they should runne to their ship, and being in a rage to see things in this danger, called some by their names, others he intreated, and the rest he compelled to take their Gallies. But all his diligence was to no purpose, because the souldiers were wholly scattered here and there. For so soone as they were set a land out of their Gallies at their returne, some went to buy provision, other went a walking in the fields, some were set at Supper in their Cabins, and other were laid down to sleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were ready to joyne and fall upon them with great cries and noise of Oars, Conon having eight Gallies, stole secretly out of the fleet, and flying unto Enagoras, saved himself in the Isle of CYPRUS. In the mean time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling upon the other Gallies, tooke some of them empty, and brake the others as the souldiers began to come aboard upon them. And as for the men, some were slaine by their ships as they ranne unto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to have saved themselves: other were killed in flying, because the enemies landed and had them in chafe. And there were taken alive of them, three thousand prisoners with the Captaines. Lyfander moreover took all the whole fleet of their ships, the holy Gally excepted, called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had destroyed all the Campe of the ATHENIANS; he fastned the Gallies that were taken, unto the Keele of his Gallies, and returned with songs of triumph, with the sound of Flutes and Hoboyes, towards the City of LAMPACUS, having wonne a great victory with little labour, and had cut off in a small time, the long continuing and most divers warre that ever was; and had brought forth so many sundry strange events of fortune, as are uncredible. For there had been infinite battels fought both by sea and land, and had altered many sundry times; and there was slaine at that time moe Captaines then then in all the other wars of GREECE together: all which were at length brought to end and determined, by the good wisdom and conduction of one onely man. And therefore some thought, that this great overthrow was given by the gods, and said: That at the departure of Lysander's Fleet out of the Haven of LAMPACUS, to go set upon the Fleet of the enemies, they perceived over the side of the Gallie, and the other on the other side. They say also, that the fall of the stone was a to-ken, that did signifie this great overthrow. For about that time (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a marvellous great stone, in the place they call the Goates River, which stone is seen yet unto this day, holden in great reverence by the inhabitants of the City of CHERRONISUS. It is said also, that Anaxagoras did Prognosticate, that one of the bodies tied unto the vault of the Heaven, should be plucked away, and should fall to the ground by a sliding and shaking that should happen. For he said, that the Stars were not in their proper place where they were first created, considering that they were heavy bodies, and of the nature of stone: howbeit that they did shine by reflection of the fire Elementary, and had been drawn up thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the Element, even at the beginning of the world they had been staid and let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the separation was made of the cold and heavy bodies, from the other substance of the Univerfall world. There is another opinion of certain Philosphers, where there is more likelihood then in that. For they say, that those which we call falling Starres, be no fluxions nor derivations of the fire Elementary, which are put out in the aire, in a manner so soone as they be lighted: nor also an inflammation or combustion of any part of the aire, which by overmuch quantity thereof doth spread upwards: but they are Celestiall bodies, which by some slacknesse of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of Heaven, are throwne and cast downe here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more often abroad in the great Ocean sea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of Religion, that the space of three-score and fifteen years together, before that this stone did fall, they saw a great lump of fire continue in the aire like a cloud inflamed, the which carried not in any one place, but went and came with divers broken removings, by the driving whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gave light in falling, as the Starres do that fall. In the end, when this great body of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the Country, after that they were a little boldned from their feare and wonder, came to the place to see what it was: and they found no manner of shew or appearance of fire: but onely a very great stone lying upon the ground, but nothing in comparison of the least part of that which the compass of this body of fire did shew, if we may so name it. Sure herein, Damachus words had need of favourable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he utterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a piece of a Rocke, which the force of a boisterous wind did tear from the top of a mountaine, and carried in the aire, so long as this whirlwind continued: but so soone as that was downe, and calmed againe, the stone fell immediately. Neither do we say, that this lightning body, which appeared so many dayes in the Element, was very fire indeed, which comming to dissolve and to be put out, did be-geat this violent storme and boisterous wind in the Element, that had the force to tear the stone in sunder, and to cast it downe. Nevertheless, this matter requireth better discourse in some o-ther Booke then this. But now to our story. When the three thousand ATHENIANS that were taken prisoners at that overthrow, were condemned by the Councell to be put to death: Lysander calling Philotes, one of the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would judge him worthy of, that gave the Citizens so cruell and wicked counsell. Philotes being nothing a-bashed to see himselfe in that misery, answered him: Accuse not them that have no judge to heare their cause: but since the gods have given thee grace to be Conqueror, do with us, as we would have done with thee, if we had overcome thee. When he had said so, he went to wash himselfe, and then put on a faire cloake upon him, as if he should have gone to some feast: and went lustily the foremost man to execution, leading his Countreymen the way, as Theophrastus writeth. After this done, Lysander with all his Fleet went by all the Cities of the sea coast, where he commanded so many ATHENIANS as he found, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them under-stand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their City. And this he did of policy to bring them all within the precinct of the walls of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lacke of victuals: for otherwise they would have troubled him fore, if they had had wherewithall to have maintained a long siege. But in all the Cities as he passed by, if they were governed by the Authority of the People, or if that there were any other kinde of Government, he left in every one of them a LACEDÆMONI-AN Captaine or Governor, with a Councell of ten Officers, of whom that had been before in league and amity with him: the which he did aswell in the Cities that had ever been confederates and friends unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in them that not long before had been their enemies. So he went failing all along the coasts, faire and softly making no haile, stablishing in manner a generall principa- lity over all GREECE. For he did not make them Officers that were the Richest, the Noblest, or Ho- nestest men, but such as were his friends, out of those Tribes which he had placed in every City: and to them he gave authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, and would be present himselfe in person to helpe them to put those to death whom they would execute, or otherwise expulse or banish their Country. But this gave the GRECIANS small hope of good or gracious govern- ment ment under the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore me thinks that Theopompus the Comi- call Poet doted, when he compared the LACEDÆMONIANS unto Tayerners, saying, that they had given the GRECIANS a taste of the sweete Drinke of Liberty, and that afterwards they had mingled it with Vineger. For, the taste they gave the GRECIANS of their Government from the beginning, was very sharpe unto them: because Lysander tooke the Rule and Authority of Govern- ment out of the Peoples hands, and gave it unto a few of the boldest; and most feditious men in every City. Thus having spent a great time in this Voyage, to make these alterations; he sent news before to LACEDÆMON, that he was coming with two hundred Saile. He spake also with the Kings, Agis and Paulanias, in the Countrey of ATTICA, perswading himselfe that he should winne the City of ATHENS at the first assault. But when he saw that his expectation failed, and that the ATHENI- ANS did valiantly resist him, he returned once againe with his Fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the manner of Government through every City in equall manner, stablishing a Councell of tenne Officers onely in every one of them, and putting every where many Ci- tizens to death, and banishing many also. Among others, he drave all the SAMIANS out of their Countrey, and restored againe all them that had been banished before: and the City of SESTOS also, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not suffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but drave them away, and gave their City, their Hou- ses and Lands, unto Ship-masters, Officers of Gallies, and Galley-slaves, that had bene in the Warres with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were against him, and this was the first thing that they did forbid him: for they restored the SESTIANS, against his will, unto their Lands and Goods againe. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to see the parts Lysander played: so were they all very glad againe, to see these others which he afterwards did. For he restored the EGINE- TES againe to their Lands and Houses, who had bene put from them a long time. He restored also the MELIANS, and the SCIONÆIANS to their Lands againe, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and drave out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lysander being advertised, that the Citizens and Inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched sore for lacke of Victuals, he returned againe, and came into the Haven of PIREÆ: by meanes whereof he kept the City so straight, that he made them yeeld upon such Conditions as he himselfe would. Howbeit there are certaine LACEDÆMONI- ANS that say, Lysander wrote unto the Ephores: The City of ATHENS is taken: and that the E- phori wrote againe unto him: It is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale devised to make the mat- ter seeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori sent unto him, were these: The Lords of the Councell of LACEDÆMON have thus decreed: That ye do raze the Fortification of the Ha- ven of PIREÆ: That ye doe overthrow also the long Wall that joyneth the Haven to the City: That ye yeelde up and redeliver all the Cities which ye doe hold, and content your selves with your lives and Countrey onely. This doing ye shall have peace, so that ye performe our demands. That ye shall receive those which are banished: and for the number of Ships, ye shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed upon the Articles contained in that Bill, following the counsell of Theramenes the Sonne of Agnon. Who when a young Orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were so bold to dare to do, or say, anything contrary unto that, which Themistocles had done before time, to assent unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the Wall which he built in despite of them, should by their commandment now be razed: he answered him openly againe: Young man, my friend, I doe nothing contrary to Themistocles doings: for like as he heretofore did build the Wall, for the safety and benefit of all the Citizens and People that were in ATHENS at that time: even so doe we that are here now, for the self-same cause plucke it downe and raze it. And if it be true that Walls doe make Cities happy, then it must needs follow that the City of SPARTA which never had any Walls, should be the unfortunatest of all other. So Lysan- der having received all the ATHENIANS Ships but twelve, and the Walls of the City also to use them at his pleasure: on the sixteenth day of March (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had wonne the Battell by Sea, within the Straight of SALAMINA, against the King of PERSIA) he counselled them straight to change the forme of their Government. The People could not brooke that motion, and were marvellously offended withall. Whereupon Lysander sent to declare unto them, that they had broken the Articles of the Peace made betwene them, for that their Walls were yet standing; the tenne daies being expired in which they had promised to overthrow them: and there- fore that he would once againe refer it to the determination of the Councell, how they should be used, that had broken the Articles and Covenants of the first Peace. Other say, that immediately he refer- red it unto the deliberation of the Councell of their Confederates, that is to say: whether they should altogether destroy the City, and make the Inhabitants thereof Slaves and Bondmen, or no. In this Councell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should utterly raze the City, and make the Countrey a Desert: so that it should never after serve for other thing, but for pasturage of Beasts. But during this diet and Councell, there was a Banquet made, whereunto all the Captaines and chiefe Officers of the Army being bidden, there was a PHO- CIAN, a Singer of Songs, that sang the entry of the Chorus to the Tragedie of Electra, made by the Poet Enripides, which began in this sort:

Electra noble Dame, and Daughter to a King, Even Agamemnon, King of Greece, whose fame so wide did ring:
I come now to your Courts, which lye both wide and vast.
By spoile of Warres depopulate, destroyed and disgrast.

The ill life of the Magistrates, the cause of disorder in a Common-wealth.

These words moved all the hearers with compassion, so that the most part of them thought it were too great a sinne to destroy so noble a City, which brought forth so many famous wife men, and great persons. Wherefore Lysander, when the ATHENIANS had submitted themselves altogether to his will, caused all the Women-players of Pipes or Shalmes to come out of the City, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne Campe also, and with the sound of their Instruments he made the Walls and Fortifications of the City of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, and set all their Gallies on fire, and burnt them in the presence of the Confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who danced and played in the meane season with Garlands of Flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediately after he changed also the state of the Government, establishing a Councell of thirty Magistrates in the City, and other tenne also in the Haven of PIRÆA, having all equal and like authority: and therewithall made Calibius a Gentleman of SPARTA Captaine of the Castle there, and left a good Garison of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Calibius one day lift up his staffe he had in his hand to strike Autolycus withall, a strong made man to wrestle: whereupon Xenophon the Philosopher made his Booke in old time, called Conviuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wrestler, having all the sleights of wrestling, suddenly tripped Calibius with his leg, and lifting him up at the armes end, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lysander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproved Calibius, telling him that he should have remembered (if he had bene wife) that he had the government of freemen, and not of Bondmen. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty Governours of the City, to satisfie Calibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he tooke Sea againe, and went into the Countrey of THRACIA, and sent by Gylippus before unto SPARTA (who had bene Captaine and Generall of the SYRACUSANS in SICILIA) all the Gold and Silver that was left in his hands, with all the Prefents besides which had bene privately given him, and with the Crowns also that had bene presented him: which were marvellous in number, as it is to be thought, for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, and that in manner he was chief and sole Prince of all GREECE. This Gylippus did rip the seames of every bag in the bottome where the Money was, and tooke a good summe out of every of them: and afterwards sewed them up againe, not thinking that there had bene a border upon every bag, upon the which was declared, the number and kindes of Gold and Silver that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the Money he had stolne under the house eavings, and went and delivered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, shewing them Lysanders Seale, which he had set to every one of them. The Ephori having opened the bags, and told the Money, found that the summe agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the fault was. But a Servant of Gylippus told them in darke words, saying: that under the tiles of his Masters house there lay a great number of Owles. Now the greatest part of the Coyne of Gold and Silver which was currant through GREECE, was stamped with the marke of an Owle, by reason of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after so many noble exploits done in Wars, committing so shamefull and vile a deede, was banished out of his Countrey of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wisest men of SPARTA, and of deepest judgement, fearing the power of Gold and Silver, and seeing by proof of Gylippus doings, that it had such power to make one of their chiefest men fall through covetousnesse: they greatly blamed Lysander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beseeching the Ephori that they would send all his Gold and Silver out of SPARTA, as a plague, provocation, and wicked baite, to make them do evill: declaring unto them, that they should use no other Money, but their owne onely. Whereupon they referred all to the wisdom and determination of the Councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did move the Councell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the first that spake against it in the Councell, that they should not admit nor receive into the City of SPARTA any Money of Gold or Silver: but should onely content themselves with their owne Countrey Iron Coyne, the which first of all, coming from the fire-red hot, was quenched with Vineger, to the end they should be forged no more, nor employed unto any other use. For it was so eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more convert it to any other purpose: and beside, it was very heave and unhandsome to remove, considering that a great heape and quantity of it, was but of small value. And it seemeth they did use of old time, certaine little Iron Money, and in some places Copper Money, called Obelisci, from whence the small pieces of Money now extant are called Oboli, whereof fixe made a Drachma, so feared for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Nevertheless, at the earnest suite of Lysanders friends that stood against it, and held hard with him, it was decreed in the Councell, that the Money should remaine in the City, and ordained that it should be currant onely but for the affaires of the Common-wealth. And if it were found, that any private man did either locke up, or keepe any Money, that he should suffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his Lawes, feared Gold or Silver, and not the covetousnesse and avarice which the Gold and Silver bringeth with it. The which was not taken away so much, prohibiting private men to have it: as it was engendered onely by a toleration of getting it. For, the profit which they saw it brought withall, made it to be esteemed and desired. For it was impossible they should despise a thing privately for unprofitable, which they saw reckoned of commonly, as a thing very necessary: and that they should thinke it would not serve their turne privately, seeing it so commonly esteemed and desired. But we are rather to thinke, that private mens manners are confirmed according to the common uses and customes of Cities, then that the faults and vices of private men doe fill Cities and Common-wealths with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill: then then that the parts corrupted should draw the whole to corruption. For to the contrary, the faults of a part destroyed, which might be prejudiciall unto the whole; are oftentimes redressed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that tooke this resolution in their Councell at that time, to have Money in the Common-wealth, made feare of punishment, and of the Law, to be the outward watchmen of Citizens houses, to keepe that no Money should come into them. But all this while they made no inward provision, to keepe the entry of their soules from all passion and greedy desires of Money: but to the contrary, they made them all to have a covetous desire to be rich, as if it were a great and honourable thing. But for that we have heretofore in other places reproved the LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreover Lysander caused a Statue of Brasse to be made like himselfe of the spoile he had gotten of the Enemies, to set it up in the City of DELPHES, and for every private Captaine of the Gallies in like case, and the two Stars of Castor and Pollux in Gold besides, which vanished away a little before the Battell of LUCTRES: and no man knew what became of them. Again, in the Chamber of the Treasury of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a Galley made of Gold and Ivory, of two cubits long; which Cyrus sent unto him after the Victory he had wonne by Sea of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the Historiographer borne at DELPHES, writeth, that the self-same Lysander had left there to be kept safe, a Talent of Silver, two and fifty Mina's, and eleven pieces of Gold called State-res. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other Historiographers write, agreeing of his poverty. But Lysander being aloft then, and of greater power then ever any GREEKIAN was before him, carried a greater port and countenance then became his ability. For as Dorus writeth, he was the first of the GREEKIANs unto whom they did ever erect any Altars, and offer Sacrifice unto as a god, and in honour of whom they did first sing any Hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memory of one which began in this manner:

The noble Captaines praise, We meane to celebrate Of Greece: that Land which is divine in every kinde of state: Even he which was both borne, and brought to high renowne, Within the noble wealthy walls of Sparta stately Towne.

The SAMIANS by publick Decree ordained, that the Feasts of Juno, which were called in their City Heræa, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had ever one Charilus a SPARTAN Poet about him, to write and set forth all his doings in verse. Another Poet called Antilochus, one day made certaine Verses in his praise: which pleased him so well, that he gave him his hat full of Silver. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHONIAN, and Niceratus borne at HERACLEA, which did both write Verses to honour him, striving whether of them should do best. Lysander judged the Crowne and Victory unto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was so angry, that he razed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was young, and loved Antimachus because he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blinde the understanding of the ignorant, as blindness doth the sight of the blinde. Ariston an excellent Player of the Citherne, and one that had six times wanne the Prizes of the Pythian Games: to winne Lysanders favour, promised him, that if ever he wanne the prize of his Art againe, he would cause himselfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slave. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grievous, onely unto great persons, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompensing his friends, as also in punishing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his friends and familiars, he gave them absolute power and authority of life and death in their Townes and Cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibility of pardon. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the City of MILETUM, where, fearing lest they would fie that tooke part with the People, and because he would have them appeare that hid themselves: he gave his word, and sware that he would doe them no hurt at all. The poore men gave credit to his word: but so soone as they came out and did appeare, he delivered them all into the hands of their adversaries, (which were the chiefest of the Nobility) to put them all to death: and they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of People also to be done in other Cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had privately offended him, but numbers besides, onely to satisfie and revenge the private quarrels, enmities and covetousnesse of his friends, whom he had in every place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: That GREECE could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus writeth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing but his insolvency and vaine-glory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a severe nature, and sharpe conditions, that made his power fearfull and intolerable. Nevertheless, the LACEDÆMONIANS passed over all other complaints exhibited against him, saving when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadors unto them, to complaine of the wrongs and injuries Lysander had done him, spoyling and destroying the Countrey under his Government: then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped up Thorax in prison, one of his friends and Captaines that had served under him: and finding that he had both Gold and Silver in his House contrary to the Law, put him to death. And to himselfe they sent immediately that which they call Scytala, (as who would say, the scroll written upon a round staffe) commanding him, that he should returne immediately upon receipt thereof. The Scytala is in this sort: When the Ephori do send a General, or an Admirall to the Warres, they cause two little round staves to be made of the like bignesse and length, of which the Ephori do keepe the one, and the other they give to him whom whom they send to the Warres. These two little staves they call Scytalæ. Now when they will advertise their Generall secretly matters of importance, they take a scroll of parchment, long and narrow like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round staves, leaving no void space between the borders of the scroll. Afterwards when they have bound them fast together, then they write upon the Parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they have done writing, unfold it and send it to their Generall, who cannot else possibly read it to know what is written (because the letters are not joyned together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there) until he take his little roll of woode which was given him at his departure: and then wreathing the scroll of parchment about it which he receiveth, the folding and wreaths of the parchment falling just into the self-same place as they were first folded, the letters also come to joyne one with another, as they ought to do. This little scroll of parchment also is called as the roll of woode, Scytala, even as we commonly see in many places, that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchment scroll was brought unto Lysander, who was then in the Countrey of Hellepont, he was marvellously troubled withall, fearing above all other things, the accusations of Pharnabazus: so he fought meanes to speake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lysander prayed him he would write another Letter unto the Lords of SPARTA, contrary to his first, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cause to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETAN (as the common Proverbe saith) that could deceive another CRETAN. For Pharnabazus having promised him that he would performe his desire, wrote a Letter openly, purporting the effect of Lysanders request: but behinde he had another of contrary effect, so like on the outside unto the other, that by sight no man could discern the one from the other. And when he came to put to his Seale, he changed the first with the last that was hidden, and gave it him. When Lysander came unto SPARTA, he went as the manner is, straight to the Palace where the Senate kept, and gave his Letters unto the Ephores, thinking that by them he should have beene cleared from all danger of the greatest accusations they could have burdened him withall: because that Pharnabazus was very well thought on of the Lords of LACEDÆMONIA; for that he did ever shew himselfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their Warres, more then any other of the Kings Lieutenants of PERSIA. The Ephori having read this Letter, they shewed it unto him. Then did Lysander plainly see, that the common Proverbe was true:

That Ulysses was not subtil alone.

Thereupon he went home to his house marvellously troubled: but within few daies after returning to the Palace again to speake with the Lords of the Councell, he told them that he must needs make a voyage unto the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, to discharge certaine Sacrifices, which he had vowed and promised to him before he had wonne the Battels. Some say, that indeed Jupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did besiege the City of the APHYGIANS, in the Countrey of THRACIA, and that by his commandment he raised the Siege, and charged them of the City, that they should thanke Jupiter Ammon, and do Sacrifice unto him: by reason whereof they thinke that he meant good faith, when he sued for license to make this Voyage into LYBIA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most part did certainly believe, that he made suite to go this journey, for a cloake and colour onely to absent himselfe, because he feared the Ephores, and that he could not indure the yoke and subjection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commanded. And this was the true cause of his suite to go this voyage: much like unto a Horse taken out of a fresh Pasture and goodly Meadows, to bring him into a stable, and make him to be journeyed as he was before. Nevertheless, Ephorus writeth another cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lysander having hardly obtained license, tooke Ship and hoised Saile: but during his absence, the Kings of LACEDÆMON remembering that he kept all the Cities at his commandment, by meanes of the friends he had in every City, whom he had made chiefe Governours of the same, and that by their meanes he came in manner to be absolute Prince over all GREECE, they tooke upon them to redeliver the Government of the Townes and Cities againe into the hands of the People, and also to put downe his friends whom he had established there. And hereupon fell out great insurrection againe: for first of all, they that were banished from ATHENS, having surpris'd and taken the Castle of Phyla, upon the sudden did set upon the thirty Governours Tyrants (whom Lysander had placed there) and overcame them in Battell. Whereupon Lysander straight returned to SPARTA, and perswaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to refer the Government to the number of a few, and to punish the insolency of the People. So by his procurement, they sent first an hundred Talents unto the thirty Tyrants for an aide to maintaine this Warre, and appointed Lysander himselfe Generall. But the two Kings of SPARTA envying him, and fearing lest he should take the City of ATHENS againe, they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Pausanius went thither immediately, who in appearance seemed to maintaine the Tyrants against the People: but in effect, he did his endeavour to appease this Warre, for feare lest Lysander by meanes of his friends and followers should once againe come to have the City of ATHENS in his power, the which he might easily doe. And thus having agreed the ATHENIANS againe one with another, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he plucked up the roote of Lysanders ambition. But shortly after the ATHENIANS rebelling againe against the LACEDÆMONIANS, Pausanius himselfe was reproved, because he yielded so much to the boldnesse and insolency of the People, which were bridled and restrained before, by the Authority of the small number of the Governours: and to the contrary, they gave Lysander the honour to be Generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens mindes and to content them, neither with fond ostentation of glory, but severely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true, he would would give great words, and was terrible to them that resisted him. As he answered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their Confinnes with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and seemed to alledge the best reasons. Even they (said he) that shall prove the stronger hereby (shewing them his Sword) shall be they that shall pleade their cause best for their confines. Another time, when a MEGARIAN had told his minde boldly enough in open Councell, he answered him: Thy words (good friend) had neede of a City, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a Towne to use so great words. And to the BOEOTIANS also, who were in doubt to professe themselves friends or enemies: he sent unto them, to know if he should passe through their Countrey with his Pikes upwards or downwards. And when the CORINTHIANS also were revolted from their alliance, he brought his Army hard unto their walls: but when he saw his men were afraid, and made courtesie whether they should go to the assault or not: by chance spying a Hare coming out of the Towne-ditches, he said unto them: Are ye not ashamed to be afraid to go and assault your Enemies, that are so cowardly and slothfull, that Hares do keepe their formes at ease within the circuit of their walls? Now King Agis being deceased, he left behinde him his Brother Agefilauus, and his supposed Sonne Leotychides. Wherefore Lysander that had loved Agefilauus aforetime, gave him counsell to stand for the right of the Crowne, as lawfull heire and next of the blood, descending of the race of Hercules: because it was suspected that Leotychides was Alcibiades Sonne, who secretly had kept Timæa Agis Wife, at what time he was banished out of his Countrey, and came then to remaine in SPARTA. And Agis selfe also, concluding by reckoning of the time of his absence, that his Wife could not be with childe by him, made no reckoning of Leotychides: (and had openly shewed it all the rest of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his Sonne, until such time as falling sicke of that disease whereof he died, he was carried to the City of HERBIA: and there lying in his death bed, at the humble suite of Leotychides himselfe, and partly at the instant request of his friends, who were importunate with him, he did acknowledge Leotychides for his Sonne in the presence of divers, whom he prayed to be witnesses unto the Lords of LACEDÆMON, of his acceptance and acknowledging of him to be his Sonne: which they all did in favour of Leotychides. For all that, Agefilauus tooke it upon him, by the support and maintenance of Lysanders favour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wife man, and knowne to be skillfull in ancient Prophecies, did great hurt to Agefilauus side, by an ancient Oracle which he alledged against a defect Agefilauus had, which was his lamenesse:

*O Spartan People you, which beare high haughty hearts, And looke aloft: take heede I say, looke well unto your Marres: Lest whiles you stand upright, and guide your State by grace, Some halting Kingdome privily come creeping in apace.
By that meanes might you move, great troubles, carke and care,
And mischief: beape upon your head, before you be aware:
And plunged should you be, even over head and eares, With waste of Wars, which here on Earth doth perishe many Peeres.*

Many by occasion of this Oracle, fell to take Leotychides part: but Lysander declared unto them, that Diopithes did not construe the meaning of the Oracle well. For God, said he, cared not whether he hated of one leg or no, that should come to be King of LACEDÆMON: but indeed the Crown and Kingdome should halt and be lame, if bastards not lawfully begotten, should come to reigne over the true naturall issue and right line of Hercules. By these perswasions, Lysander with his great countenance and authority besides, wanne all mento to his opinion: so that Agefilauus by this meanes was proclaimed King of LACEDÆMON. This done, Lysander began straight to counsell him to make Wars in ASIA, putting him in hope that he should destroy the Kingdome of PERSIA, and should come to be the greatest man of the world. Moreover, he wrote unto his friends in the Cities of ASIA, that they should send unto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require King Agefilauus for their Generall, to make wars against the barbarous People. Which they did, and sent Ambassadors purposely unto SPARTA to sue that they might have him: the which was no lesse honour procured unto Agefilauus by Lysanders meanes, then that he did, in making him to be chosen King. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwise not unapt nor unfit to command, have this imperfection: that through the jealousie of glory, they do commonly envie their equals, the which doth greatly hinder them from doing any notable things. For they take them for their enemies, envying their vertue, whose service and meanes might helpe them to great matters. Thus Agefilauus being chosen Generall of this Enterprize, tooke Lysander with him in this Journey, among the thirty Counsellors which were given unto him to assist him: and made speciall choice of him, as by whose counsell he hoped most to be governed, and to have him nearest about him, as his chiefe friend. But when they were arrived in ASIA, they of the Countrey having no acquaintance with Agefilauus, feldome spake with him, or but little: and to the contrary, having knowne Lysander of long time, they followed him, and waited upon him to his Tent or Lodging, some to honour him, because they were his friends; others for feare, because they did mistrust him. Even much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play Tragedies there, that he that shall play the person of some Messenger or Servant, shall be the best Player, and shall have the best voyce to be heard above all others: and to the contrary, that he which harh the Royall Bande about his head, and the Scepter in his hand, a man doth scant heare him speake. Even so it fell out then: for all the Dignity due unto him that commanded all, was shewed onely to the Counsellor: and there remained to the King no more, but the Royall Name onely of a King, without any Power. Therefore methinks that this undiscreeet and importunate ambition of Lyfander, did well deserve reproofe, even to make him to be contented onely with the second place of honour next unto the King. But for Agefilau againe, through extreame covetousnesse and jealousie of glory, to cast Lyfander altogether off, and to set so light by his friend and Benefactor, that surely became not him neither. For first of all, Agefilau never gave Lyfander occasion to do any thing, neither did commit any matter of weight unto him, that might be honourable for him: but which is worst of all, if he perceived that he had taken any mens causes in hand, and that he did favour them, he did alwaies send them backe againe into their Countrey, denying their suite, without that they could obtaine any thing they sued for, lesse then the meaneest persons that could have come, extinguishing Lyfander's credit by little and little, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyfander perceiving how he was thus refused and rejected in all things, seeing that the countenance and favour which he thought to shew unto his friends, fell out hurtfull unto them: left off to sollicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbear to come unto him, or to follow him, but to go to the King, and unto those that could do them better pleasure then himselfe, and specially those that honoured him. When they heard that, many defighted to trouble him any more in matters of importance, but not to do him all the honour they could, and continued still to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwise to exercise himselfe: the which did aggravate and increase Agefilau's anger more against him, for the envie he bare unto his glory. And where he gave very honourable charge and commission in the Warres, oftentimes unto very meane Souldiers to execute, or Cities to governe: he appointed Lyfander Surveyor generall of all the ordinary Provision of Vitualls, and distributor of ffeish. And then mocking the *IONIAN*s that did honour him so much: Let them go now, said he, and honour my ffeish-distributor. Wherefore Lyfander seeing it high time to speake, went unto Agefilau, and told him in few words after the LACEDAEMONIAN manner: Truly Agefilau, thou hast learned well to abase thy friends. Indeede, said he againe, so have I, when they will be greater then my selfe: and to the contrary, they that maintaine and increase my Honour and Authority, it is reason that I esteeme of them. Yea marry, said Lyfander, but perhaps I have not done as thou sayest, yet I pray thee give me such an Office, as I may be least hated, and most profitable for thee: though it be but in respect of strangers eyes that looke upon us both. After this talke betweene them, Agefilau sent him his Lieutenant into the Countrey of HELLESPONT, where Lyfander still kept this anger secret in his heart against him, but for all that, did not leave to do all that he could for the benefit of his Masters affaires. As amongst many other things, he caused a PERSIAN Captain called Spithridates, to rebell against his Master, who was a valiant man of his hands, and a great Enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an Army also, which he brought with him unto Agefilau. Now concerning this Warre, this was all that he did in that Journey. Wherefore he returned againe to SPARTA not long after, with little honour, being marvelously grieved and offended with Agefilau, and hating more then before, all the State and Government of the City of SPARTA: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time thought upon concerning the alteration of Government, and his enterprize was this: Amongst the off-spring and Issue of Hercules, who were mingled with the *DORIAN*s, and returned againe into the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS, the greatest number and chiefest of them, dwelled in the City of SPARTA: howbeit all they that came of that race had no right of succession to the Crowne, saving two Families onely, the Eurytionides, and the Agides. The other Families, albeit they were all for nobility of blood descended out of one selfe-house, yet had they no more right nor interest unto the Realme, then the residue of the People: for the Dignities that were attained unto by vertue, were given unto the Inhabitants that could deserve them. Lyfander then being one of those which was descended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the Crowne: when he saw himselfe aloft, and called to great honour through his famous acts and merits, and that he had wonne many friends, and great credit and authority by dealing in matters of the State: it grieved him much, to see that they which were no nobler then himselfe, should be Kings in that City which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not have so much power as to take from these two Houses, the Eurytionides and the Agides, the Prerogative that the Kings should be chosen onely out of one of these two Houses, and to cast it upon the off-spring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not onely have enlarged that Prerogative unto the Issue of Hercules, but unto all the natural *SPARTAN*s also: because that Hercules race should not onely desire this reward of honour, but even they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honour. For he doubted not, but if they would dispose the Crowne in this sort, that there was no man in the City of SPARTA that should sooner be chosen King then himselfe: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his Citizens by very good reasons, and to bring this about the better, he conned an Oration without Booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnassens, made him for this purpose. But afterwards weighing with himselfe, that so great and strange a change as he would bring in, had neede of some better and stronger helpe: he began to frame a device, as they say, to move the People by, much after the manner they use in Tragedies, framing engines to bring some god to come downe from Heaven unto them; and this was his feigned invention. He devised certaine Oracles and Prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rhetoricke would stand him in no stead, if first of all he did not fill the Citizens hearts with some superstition and feare of the gods, that he might bring them afterwards more easily unto reason. And Ephorus saith, that he proved first to corrupt the Nunne with Money, that giveth all the Oracles and Answers in the Temple of Apollo at *DELPHE*s: and that afterwards, he would have wonne the Nunne also at the Temple of DIONA with Money, by Pherecles practise. And that he he being rejected by them both, went lastly unto the Temple of Jupiter Ammon: and that there he spake unto the Priests, and offered them great store of Money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lyfander, that they sent men of purpose to SPARTA, to accuse him, that he would have corrupted them with Money. The Councell clearing Lyfander of this accusation, the *LYBIAN*s his accusers at their departing said: We will one day judge more justly, then you my Lords of LACEDAEMON have done now, when you shall come to dwell in our Countrey of LYBIA: supposing there was an ancient Prophecy that said, the *LACEDAEMONIAN*s one day should come to dwell in the Countrey of LYBIA. But we shall do better to write the whole Story at large of this practise, subtilty, and malicious device, which was no matter of small importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a Mathematicall Proposition, there were many great conjectures and presuppositions, and many long circumstancials to bring it to conclusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, delivering that which an Historiographer and Philosopher both hath written. There was in the Marches of the Realme of PONT, a woman that said, she was gotten with childe by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not believe at all, and many also did believe it: so that she being delivered of a goodly Sonne, divers Noblemen and of great estate were carefull to bring him up, and to have him taught. This childe I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lyfander fetching the plot of his device from thence, added to all the rest of himselfe, to go on with his practise. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this jest, giving out a rumour of the birth of this childe, without any suspicion gathered out of the intent of this rumour. And furthermore, they brought other newes from *DELPHE*s, which they dispersed abroad through the City of SPARTA, to wit, that the Priests of the Temple kept secret Bookes of very ancient Oracles, which they themselves durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man reade them, unlesse he were begotten of the seede of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare unto the Priests that kept these Papers, and that by some secret marke and token, which they had amongst them: and thereby being knowne for Apollo's Sonne, he might then take the Bookes and reade the ancient Revelations and Prophecies of the fame. These things prepared in this sort, there was order taken, that Silenus should come and aske for these Bookes, as though he were the Sonne of Apollo: and that the Priests which were privie to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of every thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all, they should deliver these Prophecies unto him, as if he had beene indeede Apollo's Sonne: and that he should openly reade them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the Prophecies, that he should reade that specially, for the which this long paltry feigned drift was framed, touching the Kingdome of LACEDAEMONIA: that it was better, and meetlier for the *SPARTAN*s they should choole them for their Kings, whom they found the meetest men of all their Magistrates. But when Silenus was come to full age, and brought into GREECE of purpose to performe this practise, all the mystery was marred by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lyfander, who holpe him to countenance this device: who when the matter should have taken effect, shrunk for feare, and let the mystery alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was betrayed in Lyfander's life time, till after his death. For he died before King Agefilau returned out of ASIA, being fallen into Warres with BOEOTIA before his death, or rather having himselfe made GREECE to fall into Warres. They do report it either way: and some lay the fault upon him, other upon the THEBANS and other upon them both: and they burthen the THEBANS withall, because they did utterly overthrow the common Sacrifices which Agefilau made in the City of AULIDE. And they say also, that Androclides and Amphitruus did raise this Warre among the *GRECIAN*s, being before corrupted with Money by the King of PERSEA, to bring Warres upon the *LACEDAEMONIAN*s in GREECE: and began to invade and destroy the Countrey of the *PHOCIAN*s. Other say, that Lyfander was very angry with the THEBANS, because they onely of all other their confederates, did aske the tenth part of all the spoile which was wonne in the Warre against the *ATHENIAN*s: and that they were not pleased that Lyfander had sent the Money away unto SPARTA. But above all, Lyfander did malice them most, because they were the first that made way for the *ATHENIAN*s to be delivered from the oppression of thirty Tyrants, whom he had stablished Governours in ATHENS, and in whose favour (to make them to be dreaded the more) the *LACEDAEMONIAN*s had ordained by a common Edict, that they that were banished, and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place soever they fled unto; and that whosoever should resist or lett them to do it, they should be proclaimed Rebels, and open Enemies unto the *LACEDAEMONIAN*s. Againe, to contrary this Edict, the THEBANS made another very like, and meete for the glorious deedes of Bacchus and Hercules their Ancestors, for whom it was made: that every House and City through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, should be open for the *ATHENIAN*s that would come thither; and that he that would not helpe a banished man from ATHENS, against him that would take him away by force, should be fined and amerced at a talent. And also if there were any Souldiers that went unto ATHENS, through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, that the THEBANS should not see nor hear of. This was no dissimulation to speake of, that they should ordaine things with so gentle words, and so meete for the People of GREECE; and then that the deedes should not answer unto their Edicts and Proclamations. For Thrafsbulus, and his fellows of the Conspiracy, who kept the Castle of Phyla, they departed from THEBES, with Armour and Money, and the THEBANS did helpe them to begin and practise their enterprise so secretly, that it was not discovered. These were the causes why Lyfander was so earnestly bent against the THEBANS, and his choler being so extreme, by reason of his melancholicke that grew daily upon him more and more through his age, he solicited the ΒΡΟΤΙΑ so, that he perswaded them to send a Garison thither: and himselfe taking the charge of them, undertooke the Journey straight with his men. But afterwards they sent King Pausanias also with an Army thither, who was to fetch a great compassse about to enter into the Countrey of ΒΟΡΟΤΙΑ, by Mount Citharon: and Lysander should go to meete him through the Countrey of ΦΟΚΙΔΕΣ, with a great Company of Souldiers besides. Now as Lysander went, he tooke the City of the ΟΡΧΟΜΕΝΙΑΝΣ, who willingly yielded themselves to him as soone as he came thither. From thence he went to the City of ΛΕΒΑΔΙΑ, which he spoiled: and from thence he wrote unto King Pausanias, that departing from ΠΛΑΤΕΕΣ, he should march directly to the City of ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ, where he should not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the Towne Walls. These Letters were intercepted by certaine Scouts of the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ, who met with the Messenger that carried them. Thus the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ having intelligence of their purpose, left their City in custody unto the ΑΘΗΝΙΑΝΣ who were come to aide them, and departed out of ΤΗΒΕΣ about midnight, and marched all night with great speed, that they came to ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ in the morning a little before Lysander, and put halfe their men into the City. Now for Lysander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men upon a hill which is neare to the City, and there to tarry the coming of King Pausanias. But afterwards when he saw that the day was far spent, and that he came not, he could tarry no longer, but arming himselfe, after he had made an Oration unto the Confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in Battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went unto the City. In the meane season, the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ that were left without the City, leaving ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ on the left hand, did set upon Lysanders Rereward of his Army against the Fountaine called Cissia: where the Poets feigne that the Nurfes of Bacchus did wash him, when he came out of his Mothers wombe, because the water that cometh out of it (though it be very cleare and sweete to drinke) hath notwithstanding (I cannot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine: and not far from thence there grow great plenty of Sytrap-trees. The which the ΑΛΙΑΡΤΙΑΝΣ do alledge, to prove that Rademantibus heretofore dwelt in that part, and do shew his Sepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the Monument of Alcmena, which was buried (as they say) in that place, and was married to Rademantibus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ who were within the City with the ΑΛΙΑΡΤΙΑΝΣ, stirred not untill they saw that Lysander with the first of his Troupe was neare unto the Towne Walls: and then opening the Gates on the sudden, they made a Salley out upon Lysander, and slew him with his Soothsayer and a few other, because the most part of the Voward fled into the strength of the Battell. Howbeit the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ gave them not over so, but followed them so valiantly, that they brake their order, and made them all flie through the Mountaines, after they had slaine three thousand of them in the Field: so were there three hundred ΤΗΒΑΝΣ also slaine there, who followed their Enemies so fiercely, till they recovered straight narrow waies, of great strength for them. These three hundred were in manner all those that were suspected in ΤΗΒΕΣ to favour the ΛΑΚΕΔΑΜΟΝΙΑΝΣ secretly: wherefore, for the desire they had to take away this opinion from their Citizens, they hazarded themselves to no purpose, and were cast away in this chafe. King Pausanias heard newes of this overthrow, going from ΠΛΑΤΕΕΣ unto ΤΗΣΠΙΕΣ, and went on further, marching still in Battell ray towards ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ, where Thrafsybulus also arrived at the selfe-same time, bringing the aide of the ΑΘΗΝΙΑΝΣ from ΤΗΒΕΣ. And when Pausanias was purposed to send to aske license of the Enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had slaine, to the intent to bury them: the old ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝΣ that were in his Army, misliking it much, at the first were angry in themselves. But afterwards they went unto the King himselfe, to tell him that he dishonoured ΣΠΑΡΤΑ, to offer to take up Lysanders body by his Enemies leave and favour, and that he should valiantly recover him by force of Armes, and honourably bury him, after that he had overcome their Enemies: or else if it were their fortune to be overthrowne, that yet it should be more honourable for them to lie dead in the Field by their Captaine, then to aske leave to take up his body. But notwithstanding all these words of the old men, King Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to overcome the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ in Battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the walls of ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ, and that he could not come to take it away without great danger, although they should winne the Battell: he sent a Herauld to the Enemies; and having made truce for certaine daies, he led his Army away, and tooke up Lysanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of ΒΟΡΟΤΙΑ, within the Territory of the ΠΑΝΟΡΒΙΑΝΣ: where untill this day his Tombe remaineth upon the high way, going from ΔΕΛΦΕΣ unto the City of ΧΑΛΚΕΔΩΝΕΑ. Thus Pausanias Campe being lodged there, it is said there was a ΦΟΚΙΑΝ, who reporting the Battell unto one that was not there, said that the Enemies came to give a Charge upon them, as Lysander had passed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝ a very friend of Lysanders, by having heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? answered the ΦΟΚΙΑΝ to him againe. Even there it was where the Enemies did overthrow the first of our men which were slaine in the Fields: for the River that runneth by the walls of the City, is called Oplites. The ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝ hearing that, burst out in weeping for sorrow, saying: Then I see it is impossible for a man to avoide his destiny. For Lysander aforetime had an Oracle that told him thus:

*Lysander, take good heede, come not I thee advise, Neare Oplites that Rivers bankes, in any kinde of wise.
Nor neare the Dragon he, which is the Earth her Sonne, Who as the length will thee assault, and on thy backe will runne.*

Howe

Howbeit some take it, that this River of Oplites is not that which passeth by the Walls of ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ, but it is the River that runneth neare unto the City of ΧΟΛΟΝΕΣ, and falleth into the River of Φηλιurus, hard by the City; and they say that in old time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Isonmantus. He that slew Lysander, was an ΑΛΙΑΡΤΙΑΝ called Neochorus, who carried a Dragon painted upon his Target: and this was that which the Oracle of likelihood did signifie. They say also, that in the time of the Warres of ΠΕΛΟΠΟΝΝΕΣ, the ΤΗΒΑΝΣ had an Oracle from the Temple of Apollo Ismenias: which Oracle did prophesie the Battell which they wanne, by the Castle of ΔΕΛΙUM, and the Battell of ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ also, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that Oracle was this:

*When thou thy nets shalt spreade, the Woolves for to intrap, Beware thou come not neare unto a little hill by hap, Of Orchalide. Nor neare to any his confines:
For there the crafty foxes keepe, their dens and privie mines.*

He calleth the Territory that is about ΔΕΛΙUM, the uttermost confines, because ΒΟΡΟΤΙΑ doth confine there with the Countrey of ΑΤΤΙΚΑ, and the hill Orchalide which is now called Alopecon (to say, the Foxe denne) which lieth on that side of the City of ΑΛΙΑΡΤΕ, that looketh towards Mount Helicon. Lysander being slaine, the ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝΣ tooke his death so ill, that they would have condemned King Pausanias of Treason by Law: who durst not abide the trial, but fled unto the City of ΤΕΓΕΑ, where he ended the rest of his life within the Sanctuary of the Temple of Minerva. When Lysander was dead, his poverty appeared to the world, which made his Vertue farre more famous, then when he lived. For when they saw, that for all the Gold and Silver which had passed through his hands, for all his great Authority and countenance that he had carried, and for all that so many Cities and Townes did come to honour him: and briefly, for all that he had had so great and puissant a Kingdome in manner in his hands: yet he did never enrich nor increase his House with so much as one farthing. So witteeth Theopompus, whom we should rather believe when he praifeth, then when he discommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delight to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuned not long after, as Ephorus writeth, that the ΛΑΚΕΔΑΜΟΝΙΑΝΣ and their Confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lysanders Letters were to be seene that were in his House. King Agesslaus going thither to peruse them, amongst other Writings, found the Oration penned by Cleon Halicarnassus, which Lysander had prepared to perswade the ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝΣ to change their Government, and to declare unto them that they should revoke the Prerogative which the Eurytionides and the Agides had: that the Kings of ΣΠΑΡΤΑ could not be chosen but out of those two Families, and to leave the Prerogative at liberty, that the chiefest Magistrates might be lawfully chosen Kings of ΣΠΑΡΤΑ. Agesslaus stood indifferent to have shewed this Oration openly to the People, that the ΣΠΑΡΤΑΝΣ might see what manner a Citizen Lysander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a grave wise man, and President at that time of the Councell of the Ephori, would not suffer him: saying, that he should not dig Lysander out of his grave againe, but rather bury his Oration with him, that was so passingly well and eloquently penned to perswade. Yet notwithstanding, they did him great honour after his death: and amongst others, condemned two Citizens in a great summe of Money, that were made sure to two of his Daughters while he lived, and refused to marry them when he was dead, seeing their Father died so poore: because they sought to match in his House, supposing he had bene rich, and forooke them afterwards for their Fathers poverty, when they saw he died a good and just man. Thus we see, that at ΣΠΑΡΤΑ there was a punishment for them that did not marry, or that married too late, or that married ill: and unto this punishment were they most subject that fought great Matches for covetousnesse of Goods.

Sylla's kiared.

Ulcium Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Rome: and there was one of his Ancestors called Rufinus, that obtained the Dignity of Consul. He notwithstanding his Consulship, wanne more dishonour by defame, then he obtained honour by Dignity of Consul. For they finding in his house above tenne pounds worth of Plate, contrary to the Law at that time expressly forbidding it, he was expelled the Senate, and lost his place there, after which dishonour once received, his Issue never rose, nor yet recovered it. And Sylla himselfe had very little left him by his Father: so that in his youth he was faine to hire another mans house, and sate at a small rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they saw him richer

then they thought he had deferved. For when he gloried and boasted of the Victory at his returne from the Warres of AFRICKE, there was a Nobleman that said unto him: Why, how is it possible thou shouldest be an honest man, that having nothing left thee by thy Father, thou art now come to have so much? Now, though Rome had left her ancient iustice and purenesse of life, wherewith the brought up her People in former times, and that their hearts were poysoned with covetous desire of vaine superfluous delights: yet notwithstanding it was a foule reproach to them that did not maintaine themselves in the poverty of their Fathers, as unto them that did consume their Patrimony, and bring all to naught which their Parents had left them. But afterwards also when he carried the whole sway in Rome, and that he had put so many men to death: a Freeman being borne of the Slaves infranchised, and being ready to be throwne downe the rocke Tarpeian, because he had saved and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death wheresoever they were found, cast it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had lived and dwelt together a long time in one selfe-house, he having payed a thousand Nummo's for the rent of the uppermost roomes of the same house, and Sylla three thousand for all the neathermost roomes. So that betwene both their wealths, there was but onely two thousand and fifty Drachma's of ATHENS difference. And this is that we finde in writing of his first wealth. As for his stature and person, that appeareth sufficiently by the Statues and Images that were made for him which yet remaine. But for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull red: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearfull to behold. For he was copper-nosed, and that was full of white streakes here and there: whereupon they say that the Surname of Sylla was given him, by reason of his colour. And there was a Jester at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his Verse:

Sylla is like a black-berry sprinkled with meale.

It is not amisse to search out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward markes and tokens. It is said also, that he was so naturally given to mocke and jest, that being a young man unknowne, he would never be out of the company of Players, Fooles, and Tumblers, but still eating and tipping with them in dissolute manner. And afterwards also when he was in his chiefe Authority, he would would commonly eate and drinke with the most impudent jesters and scoffers, and all such rake-hells, as made profession of counterfeit mirth, and would strive with the baddest of them to give the finest mocks: wherein he did not onely a thing uncomely for his yeares, and dishonoured the Majesty of his Office and Dignity, but thereby also grew careless and negligent in matters of great importance, whereunto he should have taken good regard. For after he was once set at his Table, he was not to be moved any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the Table he was commonly found both very active, painfull, and severe: yet falling into such company, by drinking, bowling, and making good cheere, he suddenly became another manner of man. So that without all compasse of modesty and judgement, he was too familiar and conversant with players, jesters, tumblers, and dancers: who when they had him in that veine, might do what they would with him. Of this rioting came (in mine opinion) his vice of lechery, whereunto he was greatly given, and easily drawne after love and pleasure, in such sort, as his gray haire could not restraîne his voluptuous life. His unlawfull lusting love began in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire untill his latter age. For at the first he loved Nicopolis a rich Curtizan: and frequenting her company by oft access, besides that he spent the prime of his beauty and youth in feasting her with great delight and passing pleasure, she afterwards became in love with him, so that when she died, she made Sylla her Heire of all she had. He was Heire also unto his Mother-in-law, who loved him as her owne begotten Sonne: and by these two good haps he was stept up to prety wealth. Afterwards being chosen Quæstor (to say Treasurer) the first time that Marius was Consul, he embarked with him in his Journey into AFRICKE, to warre with King Jugurth. When he was arrived at the Campe, he shewed himselfe a man of great service in all other things, but in this especially, that he could wisely use the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wanne Bocchus King of the NUMIDIANS to be his fast and faithfull friend: whose Ambassadors, that scaped from a company of NUMIDIAN thieves, he courteously entertained, and having given them goodly Presents, sent them backe againe with a safe Convoiy. Now concerning King Bocchus, he had of long time both hated and feared King Jugurth his Sonne-in-law: inso much, that after he was overcome in Battell, and came to him for succour, Bocchus practised Treason against him, and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Jugurth should be taken by Sylla, then by himselfe. Sylla brake this matter unto Marius, of whom having received a small number of Souldiers to accompany him (without respect of perill or danger) went and committed himselfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous King, to take another: considering also that the King whom he trusted, was so unjust of his word, even unto his nearest friends and confederates. Now Bocchus having Jugurth and Sylla both in his power, and brought himselfe to that pitch, that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to resolve which of the two he should deale withall, in the end went on with his first plot and device of Treason, and so delivered Jugurth into Sylla's hands. Indeece Marius triumphed for taking of King Jugurth: but his evil willers, for the spite and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory and honour of Jugurth's taking wholly unto Sylla. That secretly went to Marius heart, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (coming then but newly from a base, obscure, and unknowne life, to be knowne and well accepted of the People of Rome, and to taste also what honour meant) became so ambitious and covetous of glory, that he caused the story to be graven in a Ring, which he did ever after use to weare and seale withall: wherein King Bocchus was delivered of Jugurth unto Sylla, and Sylla also receiving Jugurth Prisoner. These things misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, judging that Sylla was not so much envied as himselfe, he tooke him with him unto the Warres. Marius in his second Consulship, made Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Consulship, he had charge under him of a thousand Footemen, and did many notable and profitable exploits for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant, he tooke one Copillus, a Generall of the GAULES Tectosages. And when he was Colonell of a thousand Footemen, he so wrought the MARSIANS (a populous Nation of ITALY) that he perswaded them to remaine good friends and confederates of the ROMANES. For this his good service, he found that Marius grew in great misliking with him, because from thenceforth he never gave him any honourable charge, or occasion to shew good service: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Lucatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Consulship. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somewhat slacke and cold in Martiall matters, which was the cause that indeede he did commit unto Sylla all the specciall service and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gave him occasion not onely to increase his estimation, but also his credit and power. For by force of Armes, he conquered the most part of the barbarous People which inhabited the Mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus Campe lacking Victuals, having Commission, he made a marvellous great quantity of Provision to be brought thither, inso much as Catulus Campe being plentifully victualled, they sent their fore and surplussage unto Marius Souldiers, the which Sylla himselfe writeth, did much mislike Marius. And this is the first cause of their enmity: The which being grounded upon so light occasion, was followed with Civill Warres, great effusion of blood, and with incurable factions and dissensions, that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the ROMANE State and Empire. This doth prove that Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that foresaw the ruines of Common-weales, when he counselled, and also commanded Governours to flye ambition, as a most pestilent and mortall fury unto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla being dead, as a thinking that the Reputation he had gotten already in the Warres, would have made his way open to

to prefer him to some honourable Office in the City of Rome: he was no sooner returned from the Warres, but he would needs prove the Peoples good wills unto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that sued for the Pratorship of the City (that is to say) the Office of the ordinary Judge that ministreth Justice unto the Citizens) but he was rejected by the voyce of the People. For the which he laid the fault upon the meaner sort, saying, that the Commonalty knew well enough the friendship he had with King Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Edilis before he came to be Prator, he would make them see noble huntings and great fightings of wilde Beasts of LYBIA: and that therefore they did choose other Prators, and put him by his suite, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be first of all Edilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusal: for his owne act doth condemne himselfe: because the next yeare following he was chosen Prator, partly for that he wanne the People with courtesie, and partly with Money. So he falling out with Cæsar upon that occasion, in his anger threatened him that he would use the Power and Authority of his Office upon him. But Cæsar smiling, answered him, Thou hast reason to call it thine Office, for indeede it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Pratorship was expired, he was sent with an Army into CAPPADOCIA, colouring his Voyage thither with Commission to restore Ariobarzanes into his Kingdome againe: howbeit the onely cause of his Journey was indeede to suppress King Mithridates a little, who tooke too many things in hand, and increased his Power and Dominion with a new Signiory. of no lesse greatnesse then that which he had before. In truch he brought no great Army out of ITALY with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the Confederates of the ROMANES in every place, through whose aide he overthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS; and afterwards also a great number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like case to aide them: so that he expelled Gordius King of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and restored Ariobarzanes to his Realme againe. After which Victory, Sylla remained by the River of Euphrates, and thither came unto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassadour of Arfaces King of the PARTHIANS. Now these two Nations, the ROMANES and the PARTHIANS were never friends before: and that with other things shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came first to him by his meanes to seeke friendship with the ROMANES. They say, that receiving this Ambassadour Orobazus, he made three Chaires to be brought out, the one for King Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassadour, and the third for himselfe, which he placed in the middelt betwene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gave audience unto the Ambassadour: for which cause the King of PARTHIA afterwards put Orobazus to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this act, for that he kept his State in such Majesty among the barbarous People. Other doe reprove his ambition in it, shewing himselfe flatly out of time, and to no purpose. We doe reade that a Soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus Trainee, having diligently viewed and considered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other movings and gestures of minde and body, to judge not by the climate of the Countrey, but according to the rules of his Art, what his nature should be: all well considered of, he said that Sylla one day must needs come to be a great man, and that he marvelled how he could suffer it, that he was not even then the chiefest man of the World. When Sylla was returned againe to ROME, one Censorinus accused him of Extortion, that he had carried away a great summe of Money with him, contrary to the Law, out of one of their Confederates Countrey: howbeit he profuted not his accusation, but gave it over. In the meane time the enmity begun betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe upon a new occasion of King Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the Peoples favour of ROME, and partly also for to gratifie Sylla, gave and dedicated certaine Images of Victory, carrying tokens of Triumph unto the Temple of Jupiter Capitolin, and next unto them also the Image of Jugurth, which he delivered into the hands of Sylla, being all of pure Gold. This did so offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the City of ROME taking Armes, had like to have brought all to ruine: had not the Warres of the Confederates of ITALY bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this marvellous great Warre which fell out very dangerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMANES, Marius did no notable exploit: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike Discipline hath neede of a strong, lusty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, having done notable service, and obtained many profitable Victories, wanne the fame and estimation among the ROMANES, of a noble Souldier, and worthy Captaine: and among the Enemies themselves, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the Sonne of Canon had done: who, when his adversaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deedes unto the favour of Fortune, and did paint Fortune in Tables, that brought him all the Cities taken and snared in nets whilest he slept, he tooke it in very ill part, and was marvellous angry with them that did it, saying, that they robbed him of the glory that justly belonged unto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the Warres with great Victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole discourse of his doings in his Voyage, he said unto them: My Lords of ATHENS, Fortune hath had no part in all this which I have told unto you. Hereupon the gods, it should seeme, were so angry with this foolish ambition of Timotheus, that he never afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went utterly against the haire with him: untill at the length he came to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banished him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not onely patiently abide their words, that that said, he was a happy man, and singularly beloved of Fortune: but also increasing this opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the gods, did attribute the Honour of his doings unto Fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fancy, that the gods did prosper him in all his doings. For he wrote himselfe in his Commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotly according to the sudden occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good advice he had determined of. Furthermore, when he said that he was better borne unto Fortune, then to the Warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperity came rather by Fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly submit himselfe unto Fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend upon her: considering that he did attribute it to the speciall grace and favour of the gods, that he never disagreed with Metellus his Father in Law, who was a man of like Dignity and Authority as himselfe was. For where it was thought he would have bene a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very courteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together by reason of the society of their Office. And furthermore, in his Commentaries which he dedicated unto Lucullus, he counselled him to thinke nothing more certaine and assured, then that which the gods should reveale unto him, and command him in his nights Dreame. Hewrieth also, that when he was sent with an Army unto the Warres of the confederates, the Earth suddenly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediately came a marvellous bright flame of Fire that ascended up to the Element. The Wife men being asked their Opinions about the same, made answer, that a very honest man, and also a marvellous fair man of complexion taking soveraigne Authority in his hands, should pacifie all tumults and seditions which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla said it was himselfe whom the gods meant, because that amongst other things he had the singular gift of beauty, that his haire was as yellow as Gold: and he was not ashamed to name himselfe an honest man, after he had wonne so many notable great Victories. Thus have we sufficiently spoken of the trust he had in the favour of the gods. And Furthermore he seemed to be very contrary in his manners, and unlike to himselfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gave as much more also in another. Some he preferred without cause: and others he put downe without reason. Hewould be very gentle unto them of whom he would have ought: and unto those that fought of him, he would stand much upon his Honour, and looke for great reverence. Whereby men could hardly discern his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he used in punishing of them that had offended him: sometimes he hanged up men for very small and light causes: some other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the most grievous offences in the world, and lightly pardoned and forgave such faults as were in no wise to be forgiven: and afterwards againe would punish right small crimes, with murders, effusion of blood, and confiscation of goods. This judgement may be given of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a revenging minde: yet notwithstanding he qualified that naturall bitterness with reason, giving place to necessity, and his benefit. For in this Warre of the confederates, his Souldiers slew Albinus one of his Lieutenants, beating him to death with Staves and Stons, being a man of goodly quality, and one that had bene Prator. This great offence he passed over with silence, using no manner of punishment, and turned it to a boast in the end, saying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any piece of service that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faults by worthy service. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reprove him: but having determined with himselfe to destroy Marius, and to procure that he might be chosen Generall in the Warres against King Mithridates, because that this Warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cause he flattered and curried favour with his Souldiers that served under him. At his returne to ROME from these Warres of the confederates, he was chosen Consull with Pompeius, being then fifty yeares old and married with Cecilia a Noble Lady, and Metellus Daughter, who was then chiefe Bishop of ROME, for which marriage the common People sang Songs and Ballads up and down ROME against him: and many of the Noble men envied him for it, thinking him unworthy of so Noble a Lady, whom they thought worthy to be Consull, as Titus Livius saith. Now she was not his onely Wife, for he had a young Wife before called Mia, by whom he had a Daughter. After he had married Alia, then a third called Celia, whom he put away because she brought him no Children. But notwithstanding the went honourably away from him, with very good words of her, besides many other goodly rich Gifts he gave her: howbeit shortly after he married Metella; which made the world suspect that Celia was put away for her naughtinesse. Howsoever it was, Sylla did ever Honour and love Metella: in so much as the People of ROME afterwards making sure, that they that were banished for Marius faction, might be called home againe: and being denied, and refused by Sylla, they cried out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the City of ATHENS, he dealt more cruelly with them, because that some of them had scoffed at Metella from the Walls: howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that was marvellous desirous to go against Mithridates. But herein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition and covetousnesse of glory, stood against him, and sued to go that journey in like manner, being subject to those passions, which never wax old, as we may daily see by experience. For being now a heavy man, sickly of Body, and broken in service abroad in the Warres, from the which he came but newly home, and bruised moreover with age: did notwithstanding yet aspire to have the charge charge of the Warres so farre off beyond the Seas. Wherefore to obtaine his purpose whilst Sylla was gone a little unto the Campe to give order for certaine things that were to be done, he remaining in the City, did practise this pestilent mortall fedition, which alone did more hurt unto the City of Rome, then all the Enemies that Rome ever had: the which the gods themselves had fore-shewed by many signes and tokens. For Fire tooke of it selfe in the Staves of the Ensignes, which they had much ado to quench. Three Ravens brought their young ones into the high way, and did eate them up in the sight of many People, and afterwards carried the garbage they left of them into their Nests. Rats also having known some Jewels of Gold in a Church, the Sextens setting a Trap for them, as a Rat was taken full of young, and kindled five young Rats in the Trap; of the which she eate up three. But more yet, on a faire bright day when there was no Cloud seene in the Element at all, men heard such a sharpe sound of a Trumpet, that they were almost all out of their wits, for feare of so great a noise. Whereupon the Wife men and Soothsayers of Thuscans being asked their Opinions, they answered: that this so strange and wonderfull a signe did foreshew the change of the world, and the departure out of this into another Life: for they hold opinion, that there should be eight worlds, all contrary one unto another, in manners and fashions of Life: unto every one of the which, said they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance: but that they should all end their course within the space of the revolution of the great yeare: and when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there shall appeare such strange signes on the Earth, or in the Element. So that such as have studied that science, doe certainly know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contrary unto the first in their lives and manners, and which are either more or lesse acceptable unto the gods, then those which lived in former age. For they say, that amongst great changes and alterations which are done in those places from one age unto another, the science of divination and foretelling of things to come, doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth God to send most certaine and manifest signes, to know and foretell things to come. And in contrarywise also in another age it groweth to contempt, and loseth her reputation, for that it is very rash, and faithless to meete with the most part of her predictions, because she hath but obscure meanes, and all her Instruments defaced, to know what should come. And these be the fables which the wisest Soothsayers of Thuscans reported abroad, and they specially who seemed to have some singular speculation above others. But as the Senate were talking with the Soothsayers of these wonders, being Assembled together within the Temple of the goddesse Bellona, a Sparrow came flying into the Church in sight of them all, and carried a Grasshopper in her bill, and parted it in the midst, and left one part within the Temple, and carried the other away with her. Whereupon the Wife men and Interpreters of such wonders, said, that they doubted a commotion and a rising of the Countrey-men against the Commons of the City, because the common People of the City doe cry out continually like Grasshoppers, and the Husbandmen do keepe themselves upon their Lands in the Countrey. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the People, who in all kinds of wickednesse and mischief that a man can reckon, would give place to no living creature: so that a man need not to seeke or demand any where for worse then he, but the question is rather wherein he himselfe was not the worst of all others. For he was full repleat with all kinds of cruelty, avarice, and rafhnesse, and that so extremely, as he cared not what villany and wickednesse he openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had set up a Table in the open Market-place, where he sold freedome, making slaves and strangers denizens of Rome for their Money: and for that purpose he entertained a guard of three thousand about him, besides a band of young Gentlemen of the order of Knights that attended alwaies upon his Person ready at his commandement, whom he called the guard against the Senate. And furthermore, himselfe having passed a Law by the voice of the People, that no Senatour should borrow nor owe above two thousand Drachmas: it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beast, being left by Marius amongst the People, turned all things topsie turvey, by force of Armes and maine strength. He made also many wicked Lawes to passe by voice of the People, and amongst others, that one specially, whereby he gave Marius Commis-sion to make Warres against King Mithridates. For which extreme oppressions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Consuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to hear publique causes, and ceased the common course of Law and justice. And as they were one day occupied about the adjournment of the Law, in an open Assembly in the Market-place, before the Temple of Castor and Pollux: Sulpitius the Tribune came upon them with his Souldiers, and slew many People, and among others, the Consull Pompeius owne Sonne, and the Father himselfe being Consull, had much ado to save his Life by flying. And Sylla the other Consull, was also pursued even into Marius House, where he was compelled to promise before his departure, presently to go and revoke the adjournment of the Law which he had before commanded. Thus Sulpitius having deprived Pompeius of his Consullship, did not depose Sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had given him to make Warres against Mithridates, and transferred that unto Marius. And sending Colonels to the City of NOLA to receive the Army that lay there, and to bring them unto Marius, Sylla prevented them, and fled to the Campe before them, and told the Souldiers all what had past, as it was indeed: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and slew Marius Colonels with Stones. Marius on the other side put all Sylla's friends to death at Rome, and tooke the spoyle of their goods and Houses: so was there nothing else but flying from the Campe to Rome, and from

Rome

Rome to the Campe againe. The Senate were in manner besides themselves, not being able to governe as they would, but driven to obey Marius and Sulpitius commandements. Who being advertised that Sylla was coming towards Rome, sent straight two Prætors unto him, Brutius and Servilius, to command him as from the Senate, to approach no nearer. These two Prætors spake a little two boldly unto Sylla: whereupon the Souldiers fell to a mutiny, in such sort, that they stood indifferent whether to kill them presently in the Field, or no: howbeit they brake their Axes and bundles of Rods, which were carried before them, and tooke their Purple Robes wherewith they were apparelled as Magistrates, from them, and sent them home thus shamefully handled and intreated. Upon their returne now to Rome, their sad silence onely, and themselves so stripped besides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignity, made all men then to judge that they brought no other Newes, but such as were the worst that possible could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie the fedition, which was now altogether incurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make himselfe strong by force: and Sylla with his Companion Quintus Pompeius, departed in the meane time from the City NOLA, and brought six entire Legions on with him, who desired no other thing but to make haft to march to Rome-ward. Howbeit Sylla stood in doubt with himselfe what to doe, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Untill such time as his Soothsayer Pasphurnius having considered the signes and tokens of the Sacrifices, which Sylla had made upon this determination, gave him both his hands, and bad him bind them hard, and shut him up fast, untill the day of Battell should be past: saying, that he was contented to suffer death, if he had not good successe, and that out of hand, to his great Honour. And it is said also, that the same night there appeared unto Sylla in a Dreame the goddesse Bellona, whom the Romans do greatly Honour, following therein the CAPPADOCIANS: and I know not whether it be the Moone, Minerva, or Enyo the goddesse of Battels. So he thought, that the coming to him did put lightning into his hand, commanding him that he should lighten upon his Enemies, naming them one after another by their proper Names: and that they being stricken with this lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This Vision encouraged Sylla very much, and having reported the same to Pompeius, his fellow Consull and Companion, the next morning he marched with his Army to Rome. When he was at PRÆNES: there came other Ambassadors unto him, to pray him in the Name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and fury, declaring therewithall that the Senate would grant him all things that should be meete and reasonable. When Sylla had heard the message, he answered them, that he would Campe there: and so commanded the Marshals to divide the squadrons according to their manner. The Ambassadors beleeving that he would have done so indeed, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backs were no sooner turned, but Sylla straight sent Lucius Bassillus, and Caius Mammilius, before to seize one of the Gates of Rome, and the Walls which were on the side of Mount Equilin, and he himselfe also in Person with all possible speed marched after them. Bassillus entered Rome, and wan the Gate by force. But the common People unarmed, got them up straight to the top of their Houses, and with Tiles and Stones stayed and kept him, not onely for entering any further: but also drave him back againe, even to the very Walls of the City. In this hurly burly came Sylla himselfe to Rome, who seeing apparently in what state things stood, cryed out to his men, and bade them set fire on the Houses: and himselfe taking a Torch light in his hand, shewed them the way what they should doe, appointing his Archers and Darters to hurle and besow their Darts and other fiery Instruments, to the tops of the Houses. Herein he was too much overcome with unreasonable choler, passion, and desire of revenge: for seeking onely to plague his Enemies, he tooke no regard to friends, to Parents or confederates, neither had he yet any manner of remorse or pity: such and so fiery was his anger then, that he put no kinde of difference betwene those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driven into the City, unto the Temple of the Earth, where he made open Proclamation by sound of Trumpet, that he would make free all the slaves that would come to his part. But forthwith came his Enemies, set upon him, and prest him so neare, that he was constrained utterly to flye and forsake the City. Then Sylla assembling the Senate, caused Marius and certain others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the People, to be condemned to death: Sulpitius was betrayed by a slave of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promise past by publique Edict: but when he had made him free, he caused him to be throwne downe headlong from the Rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he promised by Proclamation a great summe of Money to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and unthankfull part, considering that Marius not many daies before, having Sylla in his owne House, in his hands and custody, delivered him from perill, and set him in safety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had suffered Sulpitius to have slaine him, himselfe had bene soveraigne Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might have ruled all things at his owne will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after upon the like advantage, used no such manner of requittall or gravity towards him, which bred a secret mistaking amongst the Senate: howbeit the common People made open shew of the evil will they bare unto Sylla, by rejecting one Nonius his Nephew, and one Servilius, who upon confidence of his favour, presented themselves to sue for certaine Offices. And besides the shame of this refusal, to spite him the more, they chose others in their steads, whose Honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely dissembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying that by this meanes the People of ROME enjoyed a full and perfect liberty, that in such cases of election they might freely doe what themselves listed. And to mitigate somewhat the Peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuse Lucius Cinna Consull, who was of a contrary faction unto him: having first bound him by solemn Oath and curse to favour his doings and whole proceedings. Whereupon Cinna went up to the Capitoll, and there holding a Stone in his hand, did solemnly sweare and promise, that he would be Sylla's faithfull friend: beseeching the gods if he did the contrary, that he might be throwne out of ROME, even as he threw that Stone out of his hand: and with those words, threw it to the ground before many People. But notwithstanding all these curses, Cinna was no sooner entered into his Consulship, but presently he began to change and alter all. For amongst other things, he would needs have Sylla accend: and procured Verminus one of the Tribunes of the People, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his Judges, and went to make Warres against Mithridates. And it is said, that about the time that Sylla tooke Ship, and departed out of ITALY, there fortun'd many tokens and warnings of the gods unto King Mithridates, who was at that present in the City of PERGAMUS: as amongst others that the PERGAMENIANS to Honour Mithridates withall, having made an Image of Victory, carrying a Garland of Triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with Engines: so foone as she was ready to put the Garland upon his head, the Image brake, and the Crowne fell to the ground in the midst of the Theater, and burst all to pieces. Whereby all the People that were present, were stricken with a marvellous feare, and Mithridates himselfe began to mislike this evill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA from the ROMANES, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the Kings which he had driven out: and at that time remained in the City of PERGAMUS, to divide the riches and great Territories amongst his friends. As touching his Sonnes, the eldest governed the Realme of PONTUS, and BOSPHORUS which he inherited from his predecessors, even unto the deserts beyond the Marishes of Maeotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great Army in Conquering of THRACIA, and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenants moreover, did many notable Conquests in divers places, with a great Power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and Master of all the Sea for the great number of Ships he had, Conquered the Isles CYCLADES, and all those beyond the head of MALEA, and specially amongst others, the Isle of EUROEA. And beginning at the City of ATHENS, had made all the Nations of GREECE to rebell, even unto THESSALY, saying that he received some losse by the City of CHERONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenants of Sentius Governour of MACEDON (a man of great Wisedome and Valiantnesse) came against him, and stayed him from going any further, overturning the whole Countrey of BOEOTIA like a furious raging River. And setting upon Archelaus by the City of CHERONEA, overthrew him in three severall Battels: repulsed, and enforced him to take the Seas againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commandement to give place unto Sylla, to follow those Warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and Commission in that behalfe given him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the Countrey of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his Generall Sentius, notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could have wished, and that all GREECE were very willing to revolt, for the reputation of his wisdome and goodnesse. Howbeit the things that we before have spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those parts. Sylla now upon his arrivall, recovered immediatly all the other Cities of GREECE: who being advertised of his coming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the City of ATHENS onely excepted, which was compelled by the Tyrant Aristion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his Power went thither, besieged the Haven of PIRAEA round, causing it to be battered and assaulted on every side, with all sorts of Engines and Instruments of battery: whereas if he could have had patience but a little longer, he might have had the high Town by famine, without putting himselfe in any manner of danger, the same being brought to such extreme dearth and scarcity of all kinde of Victuals. But the hast that he made to returne againe to ROME, for feare of the new change which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this Warre in that fort with great danger, many Battels, and infinite charge: considering also, that besides all other provision and Furniture, he had twenty thousand Mules and Mules labouring daily to furnish his Engines of battery. And when all other Wood failed him, because his Engines were oftentimes marked after they were made, some breaking of themselves by reason of their weight, others consumed with Fire throwne from the Enemies: at the length he fell to the holy Wood, and cut down the Trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, then any other Parke of pleasure in all the Suburbs of the City, and felled downe all the Wood of the Parke LYCAEUM. And standing in need of a great summe of Money to entertaine this Warre withall, he dealt also with the holiest Temples of all GREECE, causing them to bring him from the Temples of EPIDAUUM and OLYMPUS, all the richest and most precious Jewels they had. He wrote moreover unto the Counsell of the AMPHICTYONS holden in the City of DELPHES, to bring him the ready Money they had in the Temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, then if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to use it, he would restore as much againe unto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis PHOEBIAN, one of his very friends and familiars, and commanded him to weigh all that he tooke. So Caphis went unto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, things, in presence of the Counsell of the AMPHICTYONS he wept, that the teares ran down by his cheekes, as a man compelled to doe such an Act against his will. And when some that were present, told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apollos Cithern, in the Temple: whether he believed it was so indeed, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Sylla's head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he marvelled he could not consider, that Singing and Playing on the Cithern, were tokens rather of joy then of anger, and therefore that he should not faile to proceed further, and bring him those things which he commanded, for that (said he) Apollo did give them him. Now for the other Jewels of the Temple of Apollo, the common People knew not that they were sent unto Sylla: but the Silver tunne, which only was that, that remained of the offerings of the Kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in pieces, because it was so great and Massie, that the Beasts of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This Act made them to remember the other ancient ROMAN Captaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus Aemilius: of the which, the one having driven King Antiochus out of GREECE, and the rest also having overthrowne the Kings of MACEDON, they never once touched the Gold and Silver of the Temples of GREECE: but contrarily sent their offerings thither, and had them all in great Honour and reverence. But as to them, they were all Captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their Souldiers well trained, and obedient at commandement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutiny. And for themselves, were Kings in greatnesse of courage and magnanimity of minde: but in expence of their Persons, very spare and scant, without any lavish, but needfull and necessary, proportioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their Souldiers, then feare their Enemies. Now the Captaines contrarily in Sylla's time, sought not their perfectment in the Common wealth by Vertue, but by force, and having greater Warres one with another, then with strangers their Enemies, were compelled to flatter their Souldiers whom they should command, and to buy their paines and service, feeding them still with large and great expences, to please and content them. Wherein they did not consider, that they brought their Countrey into bondage, and made themselves slaves of the vilest People of the world, whilst that in the meane time they sought to command by all means possible those which in many respects were farre better then themselves. And this was the cause that both drave Marinus out of ROME, and made him also to returne againe against Sylla. This selfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octavius, and Fimbria to slay Flaccus: of which evils Sylla was the very first and onely Author, spending out of all reason, and giving the Souldiers largely that served under him, to win their good will the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, Sylla had need of Mountaines of Money, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make strangers Traytors, and besides, to furnish and satisfie his owne dissolute Souldiers: for he had such an earnest desire to take the City of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be dissuaded from it. And either it was of a certaine vaine ambition he had to fight against the ancient reputation of that City, being then but a shadow to that it had been: or else of a very anger, for the mockes and gibes which the Tyrant Aristion gave in his speeches from the Walls, against him and Adella, to spite him the more withall. This Tyrant Aristion was full of all cruelty and wickednesse, having taken up all the worst qualities and great imperfections of King Mithridates, and heaped them wholly together in himselfe: by reason whereof the poore City of ATHENS, which had escaped from so many Warres, Tyrannies, and civill diffentions until that present time, was by him, as by an incurable disease, brought unto all extremity: for a bushell of Wheate was worth a thousand Drachmas, and men were driven for famine to eate Feverfew that grew about the Castle: and they caused old Shoos and old Oyle Pots to be foddren, to deliver some savour unto that they did eate, whilst the Tyrant himselfe did nothing all day long but cram in Meate, and Drinke drunke, dance, maske, scoffe, and flout at the Enemies, suffering the holy Lampe of Minerva in the meane season to go out for lacke of Oyle. And when the Nun of the same Temple sent unto him for a quarter of a bushill of Wheate, he sent a quarter of a bushill of Pepper. And when the Counsellors of the City, the Priests and Religious came to the Castle, holding up their hands, and beseeching him to take some pity of the City, and fall to composition with Sylla: he made them to be driven away and scattered with Slings. In the end, very late and yet with great ado, he sent two or three of his quaffing Companions unto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demand of Composition for the Towne but began to praise and magnifie the deeds of Thesius, of Eumolpus, and of the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made them this answer: My goodly Orators, returne you againe with all your rhetoricks: for the ROMANES sent me not hither to learn nor to study, but to overcome and conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meane time there were certaine spies in the City, that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the Tyrant because he kept no better Watch on that side of the Wall that was directly over against the Heptrachalchon, which was the onely place where the Enemies might easiliest get up upon the Walls. Those spies went straight unto Sylla and told him what they had heard the old men say. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to see it: and perceiving that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And himselfe writes in his Commentaries, that the first man that scaled the Walls, was Marcus Teius who finding a Souldier ready to resist him, gave him such a fore blow with his Sword upon his Headpiece, that this Sword brake in two; and yet notwithstanding that he saw himselfe naked and disarmed of a Sword, did not for all that give backe, but stood still to it, and kept the place so long, till through him the City was taken, and all upon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the Wall to be pulled downe betwene the Haven of PIRÆA, and the holy Haven: and having before made the breach very plaine, entred into the City about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a marvellous noise with a number of Hornes, and founding of Trumpets, and all his Army with him in order of Battell, crying, To the ſacke, to the ſacke: kill, kill. For he had given them the Towne in spoile, and to put all to the Sword. The Souldiers therefore ran through the Streets with their Swords drawne, making an incredible slaughter: so that to this day they be not known, nor doe not declare what number of Persons were slain: but to shew the greatnesse of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the Blood ranne. For besides them that were slain through all the City, the Blood of them onely that were slain in the Market-ſeed, did wet all the ground of CERAMICUS, even unto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the Gates into the Suburbs of the City. But if the multitude of the People that were slain in this fort were great, much more (or so many at the least) it is said were those that slew themselves, for the sorrow and compassion they had to see their Countrey in such pitifull state, supposing certainly that their City was now come to utter ruine and destruction. This opinion made the Nobleſt men of the City to despaire of their owne safety, and feared to live any longer, because they thought they should finde no mercy, nor moderation of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Syllaes feet upon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the ROMANE Senators that were in his Campe, who prayed him to pardon the Body of the City, and the rather, for that he had already quenched the thirst of his ravening minde sufficiently well: after that he had said somewhat in praise of the ancient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to give the greater number unto the smaller, and the living to the dead. Sylla writeth himselfe in his Commentaries, that he tooke the City of ATHENS on the very selfe day of the calend of March, which cometh to agree with the first day of the Moneth that we call Antheſterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at ATHENS in memory of Noes Flood, and of the universall destruction of the whole world, that was in Old time by rage of Waters, falling out even in that very Moneth. When the City was thus taken, the Tyrant Arifion fled into the Castle, where he was besieged by Curio, whom Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last constrained thereunto for lacke of Water, he yielded. The Castle was no sooner given up, but immediately by Gods providence, the weather miraculously altered. For the selfe same day, and the very selfe instant that Curio carried the Tyrant Arifion out of the Castle, the Element being very faire and cleare, the Cloudes suddenly gathered together, and there fell such a marvellous glut of raine, that all the Castle was full of Water. Shortly after also, Sylla having gotten the Haven of PIRÆA, burnt the greatest part of the Buildings: amongst others was the Arsenall and Armory, which Philo in Old time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of King Mithridates, coming from THRACIA and MACEDON, with a hundred thousand Footmen, ten thousand Horſemen, and fourescore and ten thousand Carts of Warre all Armed with Sithes: sent unto Archelaus to joyne with him, lying yet at Anker in the Haven of MUNYCHIA, and not willing to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANES, but seeking rather to draw these Warres out in length, and to cut off all Victuals from his Enemies. Sylla understanding this drift better then himselfe, departed out of the Countrey of ATTICA (a very barren soyle, and indeed not able to keepe him in time of Peace) and went into BOEOTIA: wherein most men thought he committed great errour to leave ATTICA, which is a very hard Countrey for Horſemen, and to go into BOEOTIA, a plaine Champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well enough that the chiefest strength of the Barbarous People consisted in their Horſemen, and their Armed Carts with Sithes. But to avoide famine, and lacke of Victuals as we have said, he was compelled to seeke Battell. Furthermore, he had another cause also that made him afraid, and compelled him to goe: and that was Hortenſius a famous Captaine, and very valiant also, who brought him aide out of THESSALIE; and the Barbarous People lay in waite for him in his way, in the Straite of THERMOPYLES. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into BOEOTIA. But in the meane time, Cuphis that was our Countrey-man, deceiving the Barbarous People, guided Hortenſius another way by Mount PARNASSUS, and brought him under the City of TITHORA, which was not then so great a City as now at this present it is, but was a Castle onely, situated upon the point of a Rocke, hewn all about: whether the PHOCIANS in Old time flying, King Xerxes coming upon them, retired themselves for their safety. Hortenſius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his Enemies, so long as day-light lasted: and when the night came on, got down through very hard Stony waies, unto the City of PATRONIDE, where he joyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his Power. Thus being joyned together, they Camped upon a Hill that standeth about the middest of the plaine of ELATEA: the soyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of Trees and Water at the foote of the same. The Hill is called PHILOBEOTUS, the nature and situation whereof, Sylla doth marvellously commend. When they were Camped, they seemed but a handfull in the Eye of their Enemies: and no more they were indeede, for they had not above fiftene hundred Horſe, and lesse then fiftene thousand Footmen. Whereupon the other Capitaines their Enemies, against Archelaus minde, brought out their bands into the Field, and filled all the Valley and plaine thereabouts with Horſemen, with Carts, with Shields and Targets, so that the Ayr was even cut asunder as it were with the violence violence of the noise and cries of so many sundry Nations which all together did put themselves in Battell ray. The sumptuousnesse of their Furniture moreover, was not altogether superfluous and unprofitable, but served greatly to feare the beholders. For the glistering of their Harneſſe, so richly trimmed and set forth with Gold and Silver, the colours of their Arming Coates upon their Curaces, after the fashion of the MÆDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright glistering Steele and shining Copper, gave such a shew as they went and removed too and fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had beene on a very Fire, a fearefull thing to looke upon. Inſomuch as the ROMANES durst not so much as once go out of the Trenches of their Campe, nor Sylla with all his perswasion could take away this great conceived feare from them: wherefore (and because also he would not compell them to go forth in this feare) he was driven not to fir, but close to abide, (though it grieved him greatly) to see the Barbarous People so proudly and villainously laugh him and his men to ſcorne. Howbeit the disdaigne and scoffing of his Enemies, stood him to great good purpose afterwards: for they making now no account of him, kept small Watch and Ward, strayed up and down disorderly besides, though otherwise they were not very obedient unto their Capitaines, being many Commanders, and few good followers: by reason whereof, a small number kept in the Campe, and all the rest of the great multitude enticed with the gaine they made by spoiling and ſacking of Townes thereabouts, diſperſed themselves many daies journey from their Campe. For it is said, that at that very time they destroyed the City of PANOPÆIA, sacked the City of LEBADIA, and spoiled the Temple without commandment or licence of any of all their Capitaines to doe it. In the meane while, Sylla seeing so many Cities and Towns spoiled and destroyed, tooke it both grievously and also angrily: howbeit he suffered not his men to lye idle, but kept them in labour, to turne the course of the River of Cephissus, and to cast great Trenches, not suffering any man to take ease or rest, but contrarily with great severity punished such as went faintly and lazily to worke, to the end that being wearied with the paine they tooke after so many workes, they would rather prove to hazard Battell, as it fell out indeed. For the third day after they had begun thus to labour, as Sylla passed by them, they cried out unto him, to leade them again their Enemies. But this answer was unto them againe: That those were but cries of men wearied rather with labour, then desirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be so indeed, and that you have so good a will to fight as you make shew of: then I will, said he that you Arme your selves presently, and get you to yonder place; shewing them therewithall where the Castle of the PARAPOTAMIANS stood in Old time, which then (the City being destroyed) was no more but the top of a Stony Mountaine cut all about, and severed from the Mount of Edylium by the breadth of the River of Aſſus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the same Mountaine falleth into the River of Cephissus, and both these Rivers running in one, carrying a swift Streame, doe make the knap of the said Hill very strong of situation to lodge a Campe upon. And therefore Sylla seeing the Souldiers of his Enemies Campe, marching with their Copper Targets to take up that place to lodge in: to prevent them, and to get it before them (as indeed he did) he marched thither in all hast possible, and got it even with the earnest good will of all his Souldiers. Archelaus being so repulsed from thence, turned his way towards the City of CHOERONEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHOERONEANS that were in Syllaes Campe, besought him that he would not forsake their City, and leave it to their Enemy. Sylla desiring to gratifie them therein, sent Gabinus one of his Colonels with a Legion, and therewithall gave the CHOERONEANS leave to goe thither, who did what they could possible to get into the City before Gabinus: but that they could not, such was their diligence and honesty of the man, as he seemed more desirous of their safety, then they were themselves. Neverthelesse, Jubas doth not call the Colonell that was sent thither Gabinus, but Hircius. And thus was the City of CHOERONEA preserved from the danger it stood in at that time. In the meane time came very good Newes to the ROMANES, both of Oracles and Prophecies, which promised them Victory from the Temple of LEBADIA, and the Cave of Trophonius: of which Prophecies, those Countrey-men make great mention. But Sylla in the tenth Booke of his Commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titus, a man of quality and Name amongst them that trafficked into the Countrey of GRECE, came unto him after he had wonne the Battell of CHOERONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gave him to understand, that shortly after he should have a second Battell, and that he should yet againe have another Victory in the same place. After him another man of Warre called Salvenius, told him also what successe he should have in the Warres of ITALY, saying, that he knew it by revelation: and both these men agreed in the manner of the revelation. For they said, that they had seene a god, in Majesty, beauty and greatnesse, like unto the Image of Jupiter Olympius. Sylla having passed the River of Aſſus, went to lodge at the foot of Mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed and fortified his Campe between the two Mountaines of Acontium and of Edylium, joyning to the City of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus Camped beareth his own Name Archelaus unto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Murena in his Campe with a Legion, and two Cohorts, to keepe the Enemies still occupied that were in great trouble and he himselfe in the meane time went and Sacrificed by the River of Cephissus. His Sacrifice being ended, he marched towards the City of CHOERONEA, to take the force he had there under Gabinus, and to know the Mountaine also called Thurium, which the Enemies had taken. It is a knap of a Mountaine very steepe and sharpe of all sides, with a narrow point like a Pine Apple, by reason whereof we doe call it Orthopagum. At the foot of the same runneth the River called Morion, and there is also the Temple of Apollo Surnamed Thurinus: and they say, that this Surname of Thurinus was

was given unto him of the Name of Tharus, who was Mother of Charon, the Founder and Builder of the City of CHORONEA. Other thinke that the Cow which was given to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath ever since kept the Name, for that the PHOENICIANS call a Cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neare unto CHORONEA, the Colonell Gabinus whom he had sent thither with a Garrison to defend the same, went to meet him, with his men very well Armed, wearing a Laurell Garland: and Sylla after he had saluted him and his Souldiers, made an Oration unto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting. And as he was in his Oration, there came two Citizens of CHORONEA to him, one his Name was Omolochus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promised him to drive the Enemies from Mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but give them some small number of Souldiers. For there was a little Path-way, which the Barbarous People mistrusted not beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the Temple of the Muses, by the which they might easily goe to the top of this Mountaine Thurium: so that following that Path, it would bring them over the Barbarous Peoples heads, and they might easily kill them with stones, or at the least they should drive them maugre their heads down into the Valley. Gabinus assuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and such he might boldly trust unto: Sylla gave them men, and commanded them to execute their enterprize: and he himselfe in the meane season went and set his men in order of Battell in the plaine, deviding his Horsemen on the wings, placed himselfe in the right wing, appointing the left unto Murena. Galba and Hortensius his Lieutenants, were placed in the taile with certaine bands of the reregard, which they kept upon the Hills, to watch and let that the Enemies should not enclose them behind: because they perceived a farre off that the Enemies put forth a great number of Horsemen and Footmen light Armed in the wings, to the end that the Points of their Battell might the more easily bow and enlarge themselves, to compasse in the ROMANES on the back side. Now in the meane time, these two CHORONEANS whom Sylla had sent under Hircius their Captaine, having compassed about the Mountaine Thurium, before the Enemies were aware of them, sodainly came to shew themselves upon the top of the Mountaine, which did so feare the Barbarous People, that they began immediatly to flye, one of them for the most part killing another. There was no resistance, but flying down the Mountaine, fell upon the Points of their own Partisans and Pikes, and one of them thrusting in anothers neck, tumbled headlong down the Mountaine together, having their Enemies besides on their backs, which drave them from the Hill, and strake them behind where they lay open unto them: so as there were slaine three thousand of them about this Mountaine Thurium. And as for them that sought to save themselves by flight, Murena that was already set in Battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slew them downright. The other fled directly to their Campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the Battell of their Footmen, put the most part of them quite out of order, and marvellously troubled their Captaines before they could set them againe in order: which was one of the chieftest causes of their overthrow. For Sylla went and gave a charge upon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly won the ground that was betweene both Armies, whereby he tooke away the force of all their Armed Carts with Sithes, which are then of greatest force, when they have the longest course, to give them a swift and violent stroke in their chale: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker and of lesse strength, even as Arrowes are, that as far off enter nor deepe into the thing they be shot at: as at that time it fell out with the Barbarous People. For their first Carts set forth so faintly, and came on with so feebly a force, that the ROMANES sent them backe, and easily repulsed them, with great slaughter, and clapping of hands one to another, as they commonly use in the ordinary Games of Horse-running at ROME. When they had thus repulsed the Carts, the Battell of Syllas Footmen began to charge the Barbarous People, who basing their Pikes, stood close one to another, because they would not be broken: and the ROMANES on the other side, bestowed first their Darts among them, and then sodainly drew out their Swords in the heate they were in, and put aside the Enemies Pikes, whereby they might come nearer to their Bodies. There were fifteene thousand slaves in the front of the Battell of the Barbarous People, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open Proclamation, and had divided them by bands, amongst the other Footmen. By occasion whereof, there was a ROMAN Centurion spake pleasantly at that time, saying, That he never saw slaves before have liberty to speake and doe like free men, but onely at Saturnes Feasts. Nevertheless, they against the nature of slaves, were very valiant to abide the shooke, and the ROMAN Footmen could not so readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them give backe, because they stood very close one to another, and their ranks were of such a length besides: untill such time as the ROMANES that were behind the first ranks, did so pelt them with their Slings, hurling Stones, bestowing their Darts and Arrowes upon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backs and flye amaine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his Army, supposing to enclose the ROMANES behind, Hortensius straight waies caused the bands he had with him to run and charge upon the Flaaks: which Archelaus perceiving, made the Horsemen he had about him, turne their faces forthwith, which were in number above two thousand: inso much as Hortensius being set up with all his Troope, was compelled to retire by little and little towards the Mountaine, perceiving himselfe farre from the Battell of his Footmen, and environed round about with his Enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his Battell, and having not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelaus conjecturing by the dust which the Horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speed returned againe againe towards the right wing of his Enemies, from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it unfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to command them. Taxillus on the other side, caused his Copper Targets also to march against Murena: so as the noise they made on both sides, caused the Mountaines to ring againe: wherewithall Sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resolved to returne to the place from whence he came, and sent Hortensius with foure Ensignes to aide Murena: and himselfe with the fifth in great speed went towards the right wing of his Army, the which was now already bickering, and joynd with their Enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did easily distresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them, flying for Life to the River, and unto the Mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithstanding forgot not Murena, but went againe to his relief: and finding that he on his side had also put the Enemies to flight, followed him with the chase of them that fled. There was a marvellous slaughter made in that Field of the Barbarous People, and many of them supposing to have recovered their Campe, were slaine by the way: so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped onely ten thousand, who saved themselves by flying unto the City of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckoning of no more but foureteene of his Souldiers onely that were slaine, whereof there came two againe to him the same night: Wherefore in the markes of Triumph which he set up for tokens of that Victory, he caused to be written on the top thereof, Mars, Victory, and Venus: signifying thereby, that he had overcome in these Warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policy, or Martiall discipline. These markes of Triumph were set up for the Battell which he wan in the plaine Field, in that place where Archelaus began to flye, even unto the River of Molus. And he set up another also on the top of Mount Thurium, where the Barbarous People were set upon behind: and there is written in Greeke Letters: That the valiant deedes of Omolochus and Anaxidamus, gave way to the winning of this Victory. Sylla for the joy of this great wonne Battell, caused Musicians to Play in the City of THEBES, where he builded a Stage for all the Musicians neare unto the Fountaine Oedipus, and certaine Noble GREEKES were appointed Judges of that Musicke, whom he caused to be sent for out of other Cities, because he mortally hated the THEBANS: inso much as he tooke from them half their Lands, which he consecrated unto Apollo Pythias, and Jupiter Olympias, appointing that of the revenue thereof, they should redeliver and pay back the Money which he had taken and carried away from out of their Temples. Sylla after this having intelligence that Flaccus, one of his Enemies, was chosen Consull at ROME, and had passed the Sea Ionian with an Army, under pretence to make Warre against King Mithridates, but indeede to make Warre with himselfe: tooke his journey towards THESSALY to meete him. But when he was in the City of MELITEA, there came News to him out of all parts, that there was a new and second Army of the Kings arrived, no lesse then the first, the which spoiled and destroyed all the Countrey which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus one of King Mithridates Lieutenants, was arrived in the City of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of Ships, having brought thither with him fourescore thousand fighting men, the best trained, the best Armed and appointed Souldiers that were in all his Kingdome of PONTUS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that Countrey at commandement, and fought to fight with Sylla, notwithstanding that Archelaus alleged many reasons to dissuade him from it: and furthermore, gave it out in every place, that so many thousands of Souldiers could not have bene cast away in the first Battell, without some notable treason. Whereupon Sylla returned with all possible speed, and made Dorylaus know before many daies passed oyer his head, that Archelaus was a wife man, and knew well enough the worthinesse and valiant courage of the ROMANES. And Dorylaus having had but a little prooffe onely in certaine light skirmishes which he made against Sylla, about TILPHOSION in THESSALY: himselfe was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazard Battell, but rather to draw out the Warres in length, and supplant the ROMANES with charge and expence. And yet notwithstanding, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gave great encouragement to Archelaus, who judged it a very fit place to give Battell in, specially because he was the stronger of Horsemen in the Field. For all the plaines that are within the Countrey of BOEOTIA, the greatest and largest of them, is the plaine neare to the City of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without Trees, and runneth out in length unto the Marthes where the River of Melas disperseth it selfe abroad. The head of the same River is not far from the City of ORCHOMENE, and that River of all other Rivers of GREECE, from the very head whence it cometh, is navigable: and hath besides another singular property, that it riseth and swellth even in the longest Sommer daies, as the River of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the selfe same Plants and Trees, saying that they beare no Fruit, neither are they so great as those of EGYPT. This River hath no long course, because that the most part of the Water runneth into lakes and Marishes covered with brambles and Briars, and there is but a very little part of it that falleth into the River of Cephissus, in the place that the Reeds grow where they make good Flutes withall. When they were camped one neare to another, Archelaus lay quietly and stirred not: but Sylla presently cast great Trenches from one side to another, to stop the way against their Enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine, where they might have taken what ground they would for their men of Armes, and have driven the ROMANES into the Marishes. The Barbarous People not being able to endure that, so soone as their Captaines had given them liberty, discharged with such a fury, that they did not onely scatter them that wrought in Syllas Trenches, but put the most part of their guard also that stood in Battell ray to defend them, in a marvellous feare, who also began to flye. Which Sylla perceiving, lighted straight from his Horse, and taking an Ensigne in his hand, ranne through the middelt of his men that fled, untill he came to his Enemies, and crying out, said unto them: O my ROMANE Souldiers, mine Honour commandeth me to dye here, and therefore when any man asketh you where you forooke your Capitaine, remember that you answer, it was at ORCHOMENE. They were so ashamed at these words, that he made them turne: besides that, there came two Cohorts unto him from the right wing of his Battell, who under his leading gave such a hot charge upon their Enemies, that they fled forthwith upon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine: and thereupon by and by set them againe to the Trenches to enclose his Enemies Campe, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus Wives Sonne slaine, fighting valiantly before them all, in the right wing of their Battell. And the bow-men being pressed so neare by the ROMANES, that their Bowes would doe no good, tooke their Arrows in their hands in stead of Swords, and strake their Enemies with them, to force them to give back, untill such time as at the last they were all driven into their Campe, where they passed that night in great sorrow, as well for the losse of them that were slaine, as also for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towards the Campe of his Enemies, went on still continuing his Trenches: and certaine of them being come out to skirmish with them, he set upon them so lustily, that at the first charge he put them to flight. That brought such a feare to all the whole Campe of the Enemies, that not a man durst abide any longer: so as Sylla valiantly following on his Victory, shuffled in among them as they fled, and in the end tooke altogether. Straightway all the Marishes were filled with blood, and the lake full of dead Bodies: so that untill this present day they finde there in that place many Bowes of the Barbarous People, Morians, pieces of Tassels, and Swords drowned in the mud of the Marishes, notwithstanding that it is well neare two hundred yeares ago since this Battell was stricken. And thus much for the Warres about the Cities of CHOERONEA and ORCHOMENE. Now the Warres being past in this sort in GREECE, Cinna, and Carbo dealt very cruelly and unnaturally at ROME with the Noblemen and greatest Persons: by reason whereof, many flying their Tyranny, went to Syllas Campe, as unto the Haven of their health and fullnesse of felicity, so that in short time Sylla had an Assembly of a ROMANE Senate about him. Metella her selfe, his Wife, having stolen away very hardly with her Children, came to bring him Newses that his Houses in the City and Countrey both, were all burnt and destroyed by his Enemies: praying him that he would goe and helpe them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla upon hearing of these Newes, fell in great perplexity. For on the one side, it grieved him to see his Countrey so miserably afflicted: and on the other side, he knew not well how he might goe, leaving so great an enterprise as that Warre was, and specially against a King of such might and Power as Mithridates shewed himselfe to be. And being in these dumes, there came one Archelaus a Merchant to him, borne in the City of DELIUM, who brought him a secret message from the other Archelaus, King Mithridates Lieutenant: to the which pleased Sylla so well, that he desired that Archelaus and himselfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the Sea side, neare unto the City of DELIUM, where there is a Temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, declaring unto Sylla, that he would wish him to leave the Conquest of ASIA, and of the Realme of PONT, and to returne into his Countrey to the civill Warres at ROME: and in so doing, the King would furnish him, not onely with as much Money, but with as many Ships and men, as he himselfe would desire. Sylla upon this motion told him againe, that he would wish him to forsake Mithridates service, and to make himselfe King, offering to Proclaime him a friend and confederate of the ROMANES, so that he would deliver him all the Navy which then he had in his hands. Archelaus seemed much to abhorre to hear him speake of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replied againe unto him: Why Archelaus, said he, thou that art a CAPPADOCIAN, and Servant to a Barbarous King, or his Friend at the least: hast thou so good a heart with thee, that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill Act? And art thou indeed so bold to speake to me of treason, which am the ROMANES Lieutenant General, and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the Battell of CHOERONEA diddest save thy selfe by flying, with a small number left thee of six score thousand fighting men, which thou before hadst in thy Campe: and that hid thy selfe two daies together in the Marishes of ORCHOMENE, leaving the Fields of BOEOTIA with such heapes of dead Bodies, that no man could passe for them? After this reply, Archelaus altered his speech, and falling downe at Syllas feete, humbly besought him to end this Warre, and to make Peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla answered, that he was very well contented withall. And thereupon Peace was concluded betweene them under conditions: that Mithridates should depart from ASIA the lesse, and from PAPHLAGONIA, that he should restore BITHYNIA unto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA unto Ariobarzanes, that he should pay two thousand Talents to the ROMANES, and gave them threecore and ten Gallies, with all their Furniture. And upon this, Sylla would also assure him the rest of his Realme: and would cause him to be Proclaime a friend of the ROMANES. These Articles being past by agreement betwixt them, Sylla taking his journey through THESSALY and MACEDON, into the Countrey of HELLES PONT, carried Archelaus with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerously sicke of a disaile in the City of LARISSA, he stayed there for him, and was very carefull to recover him, as if he had been one of his chiefe Captaines and Companions. And this was the cause that made

Archelaus to be blamed for the Battell of CHOERONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treason. And againe, Archelaus was the more suspected, because Sylla redelivered Mithridates all his Servants and Friends which he had Prisoners, saving the Tyrant Aristion that kept ATHENS, whom he paysoned, because he was Archelaus Enemy: but specially for the Lands Sylla gave unto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gave him ten thousand Jugera, (or Acres of Land) within the Ile of EUBOEA, and gave him moreover the title of a Friend of the ROMANES for ever. But Sylla denyeth all these things in his Commentaries. In the meane time, Ambassadors came from King Mithridates unto Sylla, who told him that the King their Master did ratifie and accept all the Articles of Peace, saving that he onely prayed him he would not take the Countrey of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the Gallies, he would not so much as once say he would promise them. Sylla being offended herewith, angrily answered them againe: Then Mithridates (as ye say) meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA still, and refuseth to give the Ships I demanded: where I looked that he would have humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put so many ROMANE Citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another Tale, if I come once into ASIA: but now at PERGAMUS, he speaketh his pleasure of this Warre which he hath not feene. The Ambassadors being afraid of his words, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and besought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreaty, in the end he obtained of Sylla to send him unto Mithridates: promising that he would either bring him to agree to all the Articles and conditions of Peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himselfe with his owne hands. Upon this promise Sylla sent him away, and in the meane while entred with his Army into the Countrey of MEDICA: and after he had destroyed the most part thereof, returned back againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, found him neare unto the City of PHILIPES, bringing him Newses that all should be well: howbeit that his Master Mithridates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now the matter that made Mithridates so earnest to speake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who having slaine Flaccus the Consul, being of the contrary faction unto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants also, went himselfe against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his coming, chole rather to make himselfe Syllas friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the Countrey of TROADE, in the City of DARDANE, Mithridates being accompanied with a flecte of two hundred fale of Ships with Oares at Sea, with twenty thousand Footmen, six thousand Horse, and a number of Armed Carts with Sithes besides by Land, Sylla having onely but foure Ensignes of Footmen, and two hundred Horsemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the Peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed unto. Mithridates made him no answer. Sylla following on his Tale, said unto him: It is for futers to speake first, that have request to make: and for Conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and hear what they will say. Then began Mithridates to excuse himselfe, and to lay the occasion of the War, partly upon the ordinance of the gods that so had appointed it, and partly also upon the ROMANES themselves. Whereunto Sylla replied, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an Eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, seeing that he lacked no comely words to cloke his foule and shamefulle deedes: but withall he sharply reproved him, and drave him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates, made answer, that he did. Then Sylla saluted, embraced, and kissed him: and calling for the Kings Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe. In conclusion, after Mithridates had delivered Sylla threecore and ten Gallies, and five hundred Bow-men, he returned by Sea into his Realme of PONTUS. But Sylla hearing that his Souldiers were angry with this Peace made with Mithridates, because they could not abide to behold that King, whom they accounted for their most cruell and mortall Enemy, (having in one selfe day caused a hundred and fifty thousand ROMANE Citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroad in divers places of ASIA) so to depart, and go his way safe, with the riches and spoyles of the Countrey, which he had bereft them of, and used at his pleasure, the space of forty yeares together: answered them in excuse of himselfe, that he was not able to make Warres with Mithridates, and Fimbria both, if once they were joyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the City of THYATIRA, and lodged himselfe as neare unto him as he conveniently might. Now whilest he was compassing in his lodging with a Trench, Fimbriaes Souldiers came out of their Campe in their Coates without any Armour or Weapon, to salute Syllas Souldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make up their Trench: which Fimbria seeing, and perceiving his Souldiers mindes so changed, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose hands he looked for no mercy, killed himselfe in his owne Campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole Countrey of ASIA the lesse, to pay the summe of twenty thousand Talents amongst them, and presently also he undid many poore Householders through his insolent Souldiers, lying long upon their charge, which he left in Garrison there. For he ordained that every Householder should give the Souldier that lodged in his House, foure Tetradrachmaes a day, and should be bound to give him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their Supper also: and that every Capitaine should have fifty Drachmaes a day, a night Gowne for the House, and a Garment to goe abroad into the City when he thought good. When he had given this order, he departed from the City of EPHESUS with all his flect, and in three daies daies sayling arrived in the Haven of PIRÆA at ATHENS, where he was received into the fraternity of the Mysteries, and reserved for himselfe the Library of Appellicon Teian: in the which were the most part of Aristotle and Theophrastus Workes, not then thought meete to come in every mans hands. And they say, that this Library being brought to ROME, Tirannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN having recovered the originals into his hands, published them, and wrote the summaries which we have at this present: For the ancient Peripateticke Philosophers were of themselves very Wise and Learned men, but they had not all Aristotles Works, nor Theophrastus amongst them, and yet those few they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together: because that the goods of Nelus SCEPTIAN (to whom Theophrastus left all his Bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the Vertue and estimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS, had such a paine and numnesse in his Leggs, and was so heavy withall, that Sirabo calleth it a spice of the gout, that is to say, a feeling or entering thereinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Upon which occasion he tooke the Seas, and went unto a place called ANDIPSUM, where there are naturall hot Bathes: and there remained a while solacing himselfe all the day long with Musick, seeing of Playes, and entertaining such kinde of People. Upon a day as he walking by the Sea side, certaine Fisher-men made him a Present of Fish, which pleased him marvellous well: and demanding of them whence they were: they answered him againe, that they were of the City of ALES. What? of ALES said he: is there any of them yett left alive? speaking it, because that after the Battell of ORCHOMENE, when he followed the chase of his Enemies, he had taken and destroyed three Cities of BOEOTIA all at one selfe time, to wit, ANTHEDON, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poore Fisher-men were so amazed with these words, that they stood still, and could not tell what to say, Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their waies a Gods Name, and not be afraid, for they brought no small intercessours with them, which were worth the reckoning of. When Sylla had given them these words, the ALEIANS went home with a merry heart, to gather themselves together againe in their City. Sylla so passing through THESSALY and MACEDON, came to the Sea side, intending to go from the City of DYRRACHIUM unto BRUNDISIUM with a hundred and twenty sail. The City of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIUM, and thereabouts is a Park consecrated unto the Nymphs, where in a faire goodly green Meadow in many places there cometh out great bubbles of Fire that Flame continually: and it is said, that there was a Satyre taken sleeping, even in the very selfe same forme the Painters and Image-gravers have set him out. He was brought unto Sylla, and being asked by all sorts of Interpreters what he was, he made no answer that a man could understand, but onely put forth a sharpe voice like the neying of a Horse, or whinnying of a Goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be carried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarcked his men to passe the Sea, he was afraid that so soone as they had landed in ITALY, they would shrinke from him, and every man go home to his owne City. But they sware and promised first of themselves, that they would tarry and keepe together, and by their wils would doe no hurt in ITALY. Moreover, perceiving that he stood in need of Money, they offered him of theirs, and every man to lend him as his ability served. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like Valiant Souldiers, he went against fifteen Generals of Armies of his Enemies, who had foure hundred and fifty Ensignes of Footmen well Armed, as he himselfe writeth in his Commentaries. But the gods promised him good fortune in his Warres, by many sundry apparent signes. For in a Sacrifice he made by TARENTUM, after he was come on Land, the Liver of a certaine Beast sacrificed, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a Crowne or Garland of Lawrell, out of the which did hang two Bands or Rolles. And a little before he went into CAMPANIA, neare unto the Mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great Goates in the day time fighting together, even as two men do when they fight: which nevertheless was no matter of truth, but a Vision onely that appeared, and rising from the Earth, dispersed it selfe by little and little here and there in the Ayre, and in the end vanished quite away as Clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consul, who brought two great Armies against him, were overthrowne by him, before he had set his men in Battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely upon the courage and Life of his Souldiers, whose good will to serve against them was such, as following this Victory, he compelled the Consul Norbanus after he had slaine six thousand of his men, to take the City of CAPUA for his refuge. This Noble exploit (as himselfe reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they went neither home to their Houses, nor made any reckoning of their Enemies, although they were many against one. And he saith furthermore, that in the City of SYLVIVM, there was a slave of one Pontius a Citizen, who being inspired with a Propheticall Spirit, came to tell him of the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, and carry away the Victory of these Warres: howbeit that if he did not hie him the sooner, the Capitoll at ROME should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the sixteenth day of the Moneth called Quintilis, and now July. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllas Captaines) being neare unto the City of FIDENTIA with sixteen Ensignes onely, against fifty Ensignes of his Enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serve, because the most part of them were naked and unarmed, was afraid to hazard the Battell: and as he was even bethinking himselfe what was best to determine thereof, there rose a little winde out of a goodly Meadow, that blew a wonderfull sort of Flowers upon the Souldiers souldiers on every part of them. These flowers staid of themselves as they fell, some upon their Targets, and others upon their Morians, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their enemies a far off, as if they had been Garlands of Flowers upon their heads. This made Lucullus souldiers more lusty a great deale then they were before, and with this good will they determined to give a charge upon their enemies: whom they overthrew, slew eighteen thousand of them in the field, and tooke their Campe. This Lucullus was brother unto the other Lucullus, that afterwards overthrew the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes. Nevertheless, Sylla perceiving that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant Armies, thought good to use policy with force: and therefore practised with Scipio one of the Consuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: and thereupon were oft meetings and assemblies of both sides. Now Sylla drove off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasion of delay, to the end that his souldiers which were thoroughly acquainted with craft and subtilty as well as himselfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipios souldiers by repaire into his campe: for they coming into Scipios Campe, being very conversant with them, straight corrupted some of them with ready money, other with promises, and other with faire flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practise had continued a while, Sylla coming neare unto Scipios Campe with twenty Ensignes onely: all his men saluted Scipios souldiers, and they resaluting them againe, yielded themselves unto Sylla. So as Scipio was left post alone in his Tent, where he was taken, but they afterwards let him go. So Sylla with his twenty Ensignes, like to the Fowlers, that by their stales draw other Birds into their Nets, having gotten forty Ensignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his Campe. There it was that Carbo said of Sylla, that he had to fight with a Foxe, and a Lyon both: but that the Foxe did him more hurt and mischief then the Lion. After this, Marius the younger having foure score and five Ensignes in his Campe neare unto the City of STONIVM, presented battell unto Sylla: who having very good desire to fight, and specially on that day, because the night before he had seen this vision in his dreame, that he thought he saw Marius the Father (who was deceased long before) warning his Son that he should come to him. Sylla for this respect desired marvellously to fight that day: and thereupon caused Dolabella to come unto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies kept between him and home, and stopped his passage to keep him from joyning with Sylla. Syllas souldiers to the contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with so great labor and paine, that they were all weary and over harried. And furthermore, there fell a marvellous great shower of raine upon them as they were busie opening the way, that troubled them more then the labour they had in hand. Whereupon the private Captaines of the bands went to make Sylla understand it, and to pray him to deierre the battell untill another day: shewing him how the souldiers wearied with labour, lay down upon their Targets on the ground to take their ease. Sylla perceiving this, was contented withall, though greatly indeed against his will. But when he had given the signall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their Campe, Marius the younger cometh on horseback marching bravely before all his company, hoping to have surprisid his enemies in disorder, and by that meanes to have overthrowne them easily. But far otherwise did fortune then perform the Revelation which Sylla had in his foresaid dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their work in the Trench where they wrought, stucke their darts upon the banke, ran upon their enemies with their swords drawn, and with a marvellous cry set upon them so valiantly, that they were not able to resist their fury, but suddainly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable slaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the City of PRÆNESTE, where he found the Gates shut: but they threw him down a Rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and so was triced up by it. Yet some writers say, and Fenestella among other, that Marius never saw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and very sleepey, he lay under some tree in the shadow to rest a little, after he had given the signall and word of the battell, and slept so soundly, that he could scant awake with the noise and flying of his men. Sylla himself writeth, that he lost at this battell but three and twenty men, slew twenty thousand of his enemies, and took eight thousand prisoners. His Lieutenants also had the like good successe in other places. Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and Servilius: which without any losse of their men, or but with a very small, overthrew many great mighty Armies of their enemies. Insumuch as Carbo, the hard and chief of all the contrary faction, and he that most maintained it, fled one night out of his Campe, and went beyond the seas into AFRICKE. The last battell that Sylla had, was against Thelesinus SAMNITE, who coming like a fresh Champion to set upon him, when he was already wearied and had fought many battels, had almost slaine him even at ROME Gates. For Thelesinus having gathered together a great number of souldiers; with one Lamponius LUCANIAN, marched with all speede towards the City of RÆNESTE, to deliver Marius the younger that was besieged there. But understanding that Sylla on the other side came in great haste also to meet him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other side; and perceiving moreover that the way was so shut up, that he could goe neither forward nor backward, being a valiant souldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fields, most dangerously ventured to go straight to ROME. And so stole away by night with all his whole power, and marching to ROMEward, had almost taken it at his first coming, for that there was nither watch nor ward kept: but he stayed happily tenne furlongs from the Gate Collina, bragging with himselfe, and believing that he should do wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came divers young Noblemen and Gentlemen out of the City to skirmish with Thelesinus: who slew a great number of them, and among o-

others one Appius Claudius a young Gentleman of a Noble house, and very honest. Whereupon (as you may easily imagine) the City trembled for fear, and especially the women, who fell a shrieking, and running up and downe, as if they had been all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Bulbus (whom Sylla had sent) came first with seven hundred horse upon the spurre, and staying but a little to cool and give them breath, bridled straight again, and went to set upon the enemies, thereby to slay them. Soone after him came Sylla also, who commanded his men that came first, quickly to cate somewhat, and that done, put them straight in battell ray: notwithstanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrary, and besought him not to put his souldiers wearied with their journey, to so great and manifest a danger: and the rather, because they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNITES and LUCANS who were both warlike Nations and good souldiers; and those besides that most deadly hated the ROMANS. But for all that, Sylla lent them backe, and commanded his Trumpets to sound the Alarme, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that ever he fought before. The right wing where Crassus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very sore distressed, and stood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got up upon a white courser that was both swift and very strong. The enemies knew him, and there were two that lifted up their Armes to throw their darts at him, whom he saw not: but his Page gave his horse such a lash with his whippe, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horse taile and stucke fast in the ground. Some say, that Sylla had a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the City of DELPHES, and in time of warres wore it alwayes in his bosome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kissing it, said: O Apollo Pythias, haile thou so highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, so fortunate hitherto through so many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame overwhelm him wholly, even at the very Gates of his own naturall City amongst his Countreimen? And so crying out to Apollo for helpe, thrust into the prease among his men, intreating some, threatening others, and laying upon the rest to slay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his Army was broken and overthrown by his enemies: And himselfe amongst them that fled, was compelled to recover his Campe with speed, having lost many of his friends and familiars. There were moreover many Citizens slaine and troden under feete (both with horse and men) that came onely to see the battell fought: so that they within the City thought themselves verily undone. Lucretius Offella furthermore (he that besieged Marius in the City of PRÆNESTE) had almost raised his siege, upon the words of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to remove with all speed possible, for Sylla was slaine, and Thelphus had taken ROME. Now about midnight came certain souldiers from Crassus to Sylla's Campe, and asked for meat for Crassus supper, and his mens, who having chased his flying enemies whom he had overthrown unto the City of ANTENNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his Campe there. Sylla understanding that, and being advertised that the most part of his enemies were overthrown at this battell, went himselfe the next morning betimes unto ANTENNA, where three thousand of his enemies sent to know if he would receive them to mercy if they yielded themselves unto him. His answer was, that he would pardon their lives, so as they would do some mischief to their fellows before they came to him. These three thousand hereupon trusting to his promise, fell upon their companions: and for the most part one of them killed another. Notwithstanding Sylla, having gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as the rest, amounting in all to the number of six thousand, within the Shew-place where they used to run their horses: whilest he himselfe held a councill in the Temple of the goddesse Bellona, and was making his Oration there, he had appointed certaine to set upon those six thousand, and put them to the sword every man. Great and terrible were the cries of such a number of men slaine in so small a roome, as may easily be conjectured: inso much as the Senators sitting in councill heard them very easily, and marvelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his Oration which he had begun with a set steady countenance, without changing of colour, willed them onely to hearken what he said, and not to trouble themselves with any thing done abroad, for they were but certaine offenders and leud persons that were punished by his commandement. This was enough to shew the simplest ROMANE in ROME, that they had but onely changed the Tyrant, and not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had ever been of a churlish and severe nature, even from his childhood, he never changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall stubbornesse. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modest and civill in all his prosperity, and gave great good hope, that if he came to the Authority of a Prince, he would favour Nobility well, and yet love notwithstanding the benefit of the people. And being moreover a man in his youth given to all pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pitty, and weepe for tender heart: in that he became after so cruell and bloody, the great alteration gave manifest cause to condemne the increase of honour and authority, as the onely meanes whereby mens manners continue not such as they were at the first, but still do change and vary, making some fooles, others vaine and phantasticall, and others extream cruell and unnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by changing his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shew it selfe, when the way of liberty was laid open: this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fell to shedding of blood, and filled all ROME with infinite and unspeakable murders: for divers were killed for private quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffered his friends and those about him to worke their Lucretius Offella besieged Marius in Prænestine. In the end of Marius's life it is reported contrary, that Sylla besieged Marius the younger in Persia, and not in Prænestine. Three thousand saved themselves in Antenna: and yielded to Sylla upon promise of life. Sylla against the Law of Armes and his promise caused six thousand men to be slain.

their wicked wills: untill at the length there was a young man called Cains Metellus, that was so bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should know that all the miseries were finished the which they daily saw. For, said he, we will not intreate you to pardon life, where you have determined death: but onely to put them out of doubt whom you have determined to save. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolved whom he would save. Metellus replied, Then tell us (quoth he) who they are that shall die. Sylla answered, he would. Howbeit some say, it was not Metellus, but Anfidius: one of his flatterers, that spake this last word unto him. Wherefore Sylla immediately, without making any of the Magistrates privy, caused fourescore mens names to be set up upon posts, whom he would put to death. Every man being offended with all, the next day following he set up two hundred and twenty mens names more: and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an Oration to the people, he told them openly, that he appointed all them to dye, that he could call to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should die, by dayes, as he did call them to mind. Whosoever saved an Outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindnesse, he himselfe was condemned to die: not excepting them that had received their Brothers, their Sons, their Fathers, nor Mothers. And the reward of every homicide and murder that killed one of the Outlawes, was two Talents: though it were a slave that had killed his Master, or the Son that had slaine the Father. But the most wicked and unjust Act of all was, that he deprived the Sons, and Sons Sons of them whom he had killed, of all credit and good name: and besides that, had taken all their goods as confiscate. And this was not only done in ROME, but also in all the Cities of ITALY throughout: and there was no Temple of any god whatsoever, no Altar in any bodies house: no liberty of Hospitall, nor Fathers house, that was not embrued with blood and horrible murder. For the Husbands were slaine in their Wives armes, and the children on their Mothers laps: and yet they which were slaine for private hatred and malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murdered onely for their goods. And they that killed them, might well say, His goodly great house made that man die, his goodly fair Garden the other, and his hot bathes another. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that never medled with any thing, and least looked that these evils should light upon him, and that onely pitied those which he saw so miserably murdered, went one day into the Market-place, and reading the Bill set up of the Outlawes names, found his own name amongst the rest, and cried out aloud: Alas the day that ever I was borne, my house of ALBA maketh me be put to death. He went not far from the Market-place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time Marius the younger seeing he could by no means escape if he were taken, slew himselfe. And Sylla coming to PRÆNESTE, did first execute them by one and by one, keeping a certaine forme of justice in putting them to death: but afterwards, as if he had no longer leisure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelve thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword every man, saving his Host onely; unto whom he said, that he shewed him speciall favour to save his life. But his Host answered him stoutly againe, that he would not be beholding unto him for his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his Countreimen: and so thrusting in amongst the Citizens, was willingly slaine with them. They thought the Act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, who had slaine his owne Brother before the Civil war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the Outlawes, as if his Brother had been alive. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereupon to shew his thankfulness for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently and slew Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction, and brought him his head for a present before all the people, in the midst of the Market-place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his hands all bloodied in the hallowed Font of the Temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murders committed, yet were there other things also that grieved the people marvellously. For he proclaimed himselfe Dictator, which Office had not been of sixscore yeeres before in use, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, giving him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy Cities and to build up new as he listed: to take away Kingdomes, and to give them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly sold the goods confiscate, by the Cryer, sitting so proudly and stately in his Chaire of State, that it grieved the people more to see those goods packt up by them to whom he gave and disposed them then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For some times he would give a whole Country, or the whole Revenues of certaine Cities, unto women for their beauty, or unto pleasant Jesters, Minstrels, or wicked slaves made free: and unto some he would give other mens wives by force, and make them to be married against their wills. For he desiring (howsoever it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had married: and taking Æmilia (the Daughter of Æmilius Scipio, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabbio, caused him to marry her great with child as she was by Glabbio: but she died in childbed in Pompey's house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse at the City of PRÆNESTE, suing to be Confiscall, Sylla commanded him to cease his suite: but he notwithstanding that expresse commandement, went one day into the Market-place, with a great traine of men following him that favoured his cause: whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slew Offella before all the people, himselfe sitting in a Chaire of estate in the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from above the murder done. The people that were about Offella, laid hold of the murthrer straight, and brought him before Sylla: but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they they should let him go, because he commanded them to do it. Further more, as touching his Triumph, it was a sumptuous sight to behold, for the rareness of the riches, and Princely spoiles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished ROMANES, who were the chiefest Noblemen of all the City of ROME, following his Chariot triumphant wearing Garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their Father and saviour: because that by his means they returned to their Country, and recovered their goods, wives and children. In the end of his triumph, he made an Oration, in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare unto them (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did also carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his Oration, told them that by reason of the great favour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to say, happy or fortunate. And he himself when he wrote unto the GRECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them, furnished himself Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloved and favoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our Countrey, have this superscription: Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a Son and a Daughter: he named his Son Faustus, signifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausta: because the ROMANES call Faustum that which falleth out prosperously and happily. To be short, he trusted so much unto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innovation in the Common-wealth, yet of himself he left off his Office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consuls again, without his presence at the election: and frequented the Market-place as a private man among the Citizens, offering himself to every man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rash enemy of his was chosen Consull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any devotion the people had to Lepidus, but only to gratifie Pompey, who gave countenance and favour unto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come merry homewards from the Election, and joyfull that he had obtained his friends sute from all other suters: took him aside, and told him: Indeed thou hast great cause to rejoyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest Asse in all ROME, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hadst not need to sleep: for thou hast strengthened an enemy, that will be thy own destruction. And Sylla proved a true Prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediately after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla consecrating the dimes of all his goods unto Hercules, made exceeding sumptuous feastes. Now the ROMANES, the provision whereof was so unreasonable great, that every day they threw a great deal of meat into the River, and they dranke wine of forty years old and above. During these feasts which continued many dayes, his wife Metella sickened, and died, and in her sicknesse the Priests and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neare her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was divorced from her in her sicknesse, and caused her to be carried into another house, whilst she lived. And thus did Sylla curiously observe the superstition and ordinance of the Soothsayers: but yet he brake the Law which he made himselfe, touching the order of Funerals, sparing no cost at Metellae buriall. So did he also breake another order himselfe had made, touching the reformation of bankets: comforting his sorrow with ordinary feasts, full of all vanity and lasciviousnesse. Within a few moneths after, he had Fencers games at the sharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and unfenced, men and women sitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Lady, and of a noble house, that sate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: she was the Daughter of Messala, and sister of Hortensius the Orator, that had been divorced not long before from her husband. This Lady passing by Sylla behind him, did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and took a hair from off his Gown, and so went on to her place, and sate her downe. Sylla marvelling at this familiarity, looking earnestly upon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a little of your happinesse. Her words misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them: for he sent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had lived.

But after many flie looks betwene them, they turned their faces one to another upon every occasion, with pretty smiling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and contract marriage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as wise, as honest, and as vertuous a Lady as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla marry her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had been but a young Boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest passions of the minde, to be so carried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this faire young Lady in his house, he left not the company of women Minstrels and Tumblers, and to have pleasant Jestors and Musicians about him: with whom he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, upon little Couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscus a maker of common Playes, Sorax a Prince of Scoffers, and one Metrobius a Singing man, whom he was in love withall while he lived, and yet did not dissemble his love, though he was past his Age to be beloved.
This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the originall cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he lived a great time before he perceived that he had an Im-postume in his body, the which by proceffe of time came to corrupt his flesh in such sort, that it turned all to lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually

nually night and day, yet the Lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiply-ed still upon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it selfe, but was presently filled with swarms of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the Bath to wash and cleanse himself of them, but all would not serve: for the changing of his flesh into this putrature was it straight againe, that there was no cleansing, nor shifting of him, that could keep such a number of lice from him. Some say, that in old time (amongst the most ancient men, whereof there is any memory) Acaus the Son of Pelias, died of the lowlie evil: and long time after also, the Poet Alcman, and Phericles the Divine: and so did Callisthenes OLYNTHIAN in prison, and Marius a wife Lawyer. And if we shall make mention of those that are famous, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bondman called Ennus, he was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and carried to ROME, died also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not only foresee his death, but he wrote something of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twentieth Book of his Commentaries, two dayes before he died. In that Booke he saith, that the wife men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had lived honourably, he should end his dayes in the flower of all his prosperity. And there he saith also, that his Son who departed a little before his Mother, Metella appeared to him in his sleepe, apparelled in an ill favoured Gowne, and that coming unto him, he prayed him he would go with him unto Metella his Mother, thenceforth to live in peace and rest with her. But for all his disease, he would not give over to deale in matters of State. For ten dayes before his death, he pacified a sedition and tumult risen among the inhabitants of the City of PUTEOLANUM (in Italian called Pozzolo) and there he gave them Lawes and Ordinances, whereby they should governe themselves. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the Common-wealth, deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he sent for him, and made him come into his Chamber, and there caused his men to compasse him about, and commanded them to strangle him in his sight. The passion of his anger was so vehement against him, that by the extreme straining of himselfe, he brake the Im-postume in his body, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of blood: by reason whereof his strength failing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and so died, leaving the two little children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a Daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, because the ROMANES call those children that are borne after the death of their Fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consull Lepidus, to let that his body should not be honourably buried, as they were accustomed to bury Noblemen and men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had given him nothing in his Will, and had remembered all his other friends: yet he made some for love, some by intreaty, and others with threatening to let it alone, and accompanying the Corpses into ROME, gave both safety and honour unto the performance of his funerals. And it is said also, that the ROMANE Laides amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfume and odoriferous matter towards the same: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and ten great Baskets, they made a great image to the likenesse of Sylla himselfe, and another of a Sergeant carrying the Axes before him, all of excellent Incense and Cinamon. When the day of the Funerals came, fearing lest it would raine in the forenoone, all the Element being so cloudy, they deferred to carry forth the body to be burnt, untill past three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then rose there such a sudden boisterous wind, that it set all the stake of wood straight on fire, that the body was burnt at a trice; and the fire going out, fell a great shower of raine that held on till night: so that it seemed good fortune following him even to his end, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His Tombe is to be seene in the field of Mars: and they say that he himselfe made his own Epitaph that is written upon it, which was: That no man did ever passe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing mischief to his enemies.

THE COMPARISON OF LYSANDER with SYLLA.

Now that we have at large also set forth the Life of the ROMANE, let us come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike, that both of them grew to be great men, rising of themselves through their own virtue: but this only is proper to Lysander, that all the Offices and Dignities which he attained unto in the Common-wealth, were laid upon him through the peoples good wills and consents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither usurped he any extraordinary Authority upon them, contrary to the Law: for as the common saying is:

There wicked men are most esteem'd, and rule with greatest gaine.*

As at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the state of Government utterly subverted and brought to nought: to day there rose up one Tyrant, to morrow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla usurped and ruled all, when such fellows as Glancius and Saturninus, did both banish and drive out of ROME such men as Metellus was: and where also in open assembly they slew the Consuls Son in the Market-place, and where force of Armes was bought and sold for Gold and Silver, with the which the souldiers were corrupted: and where they made new Lawes with fire and sword, and forced men to obey the same. Yet I speak not this in reproach of him that in such troublesome times found means to make himselfe the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity he grew unto in so unfortunate a City, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from SPARTA (at what time it flourished most, and was the best governed Commonweale) he in all great causes, and in most honourable Offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chieftes: whereof it came to passe, that the one did often resigne up his Authority to his Citizens, which they had given him, who also restored it to him again many and sundry times; for the honour of his vertue did alwayes remaine, and made him justly accounted for the Worthiest man: where the other being onely once chosen Generall of an Army, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hostility, making himself by force, sometime Confull, sometime Vice-consull, and sometime Dictator, but alwayes continued a Tyrant. Indeed Lysander attempted to change and alter the state of Government in his Countrey, howbeit it was with great lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he fought it by reason, and good persuasion, not by the sword: neither would he make a change of the whole at one self time as Sylla did, but fought onely to reform the Election of Kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtlesse seemed very just: that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen King of that City, which was the chiefe over all GREECE, not for her Nobility, but for her vertue onely. For like as a good hunter doth not seek for the Whelp of a good Dog, but for the good Dog himselfe: nor like as a good husband doth not seek for the Colt that cometh of a good Horse, but the good Horse himselfe. E-a wife man of Armes also, the Colt that cometh of a good Horse, but the good Horse himselfe. If he ven so, he that taketh upon him to establish a Civil Government, committeth a foule fault, if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince himself should be, considering that the LACEDÆMONIANS themselves have deprived diverse of their Kings from their Crowne and Realme, because they were not Princely, but unprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a Noble man, yet is alwayes ill of it self: but vertue is honoured for her selfe alone, and not because she is placed with Nobility. Now for the wrongs and injuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleasure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lysander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the Tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla fought for spite to take away his Army from Pompey and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himselfe had given him, and caused Lucretius Offella to be slaine openly in his owne fight, because he sought to be Consull, for recompence of the good service he had done: for which cruelty of his, causing his owne friends to be slaine in such sort, he made every man afraid of him. Furthermore, their behaviours touching covetousnesse and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other that of a Tyrant. For we do not finde that Lysander, for all his great Princely Authority, did ever use any insolency or lasciviousnesse in his deeds, but alwayes avoided as much as a man might, the reproach of this common Proverbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: he led such a true LACONIAN life, straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could never moderate his unlawfull lusts, neither for poverty when he was young, nor for age, when it came upon him. But whilest he gave Lawes to the ROMANES, touching Matrimoniall honesty and chastity, himselfe in the meane time did nothing but follow love, and commit adulteries, as Salust writeth. By meanes whereof he so much impoverished ROME, and left it so void of Gold and Silver, that for ready money he sold absolute freedome unto the Cities, their confederates, yet was it his daily study to confiscate and take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthy houses in all the whole City of ROME. But all this spoile and havock was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away upon his jesters and flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we thinke he kept in his gifts and private bankers, when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being present, to see him sell the goods which he had caused to be confiscated) he made one of his friends and familiars, to trust up a great deale of household stuffe, for a very little price: and when any other had outbidden his price, and that the Cryer had cried it out aloud: then he was angry, and said: My friends, I have great wrong done me here, not to suffer me sell the spoile I have gotten, at mine owne pleasure, and dispose it as I list my self. Where Lysander contrarily sent to the Common-wealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very presents that were given to himselfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peradventure he did more hurt to SPARTA, bringing thither that Gold and Silver, then Sylla did to ROME, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely for prooffe and declaration, that Lysander was nothing covetous. They both have done that unto their City, which never any other but themselves did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his Citizens notwithstanding to good order and government: and Lysander contrarily filled his City with vice, yet not infected withall himselfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the Law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the Citizens worse then he was himself: for he taught the SPARTANS to desire those things, which he above all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and Civil government. Now for matters of warre and battels fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lysander wanne onely but two battels by sea, besides the taking of the City of ATHENS: which (though I grant him) being rightly considered, was no great exploit of warre, howbeit it was a noble Act, considering the fame he wanne by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the City of ALIARTE: a man might say peradventure that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he staid not for King Pausanias aide (the which came from PLATEES immediately after his overthrow) and because he went in a gaire, in fury, and in a vaine ambition to run his head against a wall: so that men of all sorts making a desperate lally out of ALIARTE upon him, slew him there to no purpose. Farre unlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of LEUCTRES, resisting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keep his men from flying, and to give them assured victory, received his deadly wound: for all these men died like noble Kings, and valiant Captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast himself away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: proving thereby, that the ancient SPARTANS did like wise men, to avoid the fight with walls. For the noblest and valiantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not onely by the first souldier that cometh, but by every silly woman or child. As they say, that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very Gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary againe, the victories that Sylla wanne in set battels, and the thousands of enemies which he slew, are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he took the City of ROME twice: and the haven of ATHENS, not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driven Archelus out of firme land into the maine sea. It is to be considered also, against what Captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a pastime, as a man might say, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a Pilot of Alcibiades, or to surprize and deceive Philocles, a common Orator at ATHENS:

The chief person is not always the best.

Lysanders and Syllas faults.

Whose busie tongue much worse then two edged sword did seeme: Which prated still, and honesty did never once esteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchsafe to compare with his horse-keeper, nor Marius with one of his Sergeants or Mace-bearers. But to leave aside the particular names of all other Princes, Lords, Consuls, Prators, Captaines, and Governours that made warres with Sylla: what ROMANE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what King living was there of such power as King Mithridates: And of Generals and Lieutenants of Armies in

Sylla fought with men of greater power and overcame them.

ITALY, were there any ever more valiant, then Lamponius and Thelephus: of the which Sylla drave the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and slew the two last. But the greatest matter of all that we have spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his Noble Acts, with the aide of his whole Country, where Sylla to the contrary did his (being banished from his Country) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time they drave Syllas wife out of ROME, that they overthrew his houses, and slew his friends also in ROME: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousands of fighting men in BOROTIA, and ventured his person in manifold dangers, so that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his Country. Furthermore, Sylla would never stoope to King Mithridates, for any particular Alliance he offered him, neither yeeld unto him for any aide of men, or money, to warre against his enemies: but (a thing most chiefly to be noted above the rest) he would not vouchsafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand onely, before he had spoken it with his own mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would forgoe ASIA, deliver him his Gallies, and give up the Realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA unto their naturall Kings. This me thinks was the goodliest Act that ever Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to have preferred the benefit of the Common-wealth in that sort, before his private commodity. For therein he was like unto a good Greyhound, that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast till he have overthrown him, and then afterwards followeth the pursue of his own private quarrell. And lastly, me thinks it is easily judged, what difference there was betweene their two Natures, in that they did both towards the City of ATHENS: For Sylla having taken it, after the Citizens had made fierce warres with him for the increase of King Mithridates greatnesse: yet he left it free unto them, enjoying their owne Lawes. Where Lysander to the contrary, seeing such a mighty State and Empire as that overthrown from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the Liberty of popular government, whereby it had been governed of long time before, and established there very cruell and wicked Tyrants. And therefore in mine opinion, we shall not much swarve from the troth, if we give judgement that: that Sylla did the greater Acts, and Lysander committed the fewer faults. And that we give to the one the honour of a continent and modest man: and to the other, the commendation of a Valiant and skilfull Souilder.

P*eripoltas* the Soothfayer, he that brought King Opheltas out of THE SALY into the Country of BOROTIA, with the people which were under his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time flourished in that Country, the more part of the which were ever resident in the City of CHERONEA, because it was the first City that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expelled thence. All they that came of that race were commonly men of great courage, and naturally given to the wars: who were so forward and adventurous in all dangers thereof (in the invasions of the MEDES into GREECE, and in the battels of the GAULES) that they were slain all of them, but onely Damon (a little childe left fatherlesse and motherlesse) surnamed Peripoltas that escaped; who for goodly personage and noble courage excelled all the lusty youths of his time, though otherwise he were very rude, and of a severe nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growne of full age, a ROMANE Capitaine of an Ensigne of footemen (lying in Garrison for the Winter season in the City of CHERONEA) fell in great love with Damon: and because he could not reape the fruites of his dishonest love by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement presumptions, that by force he went about to abuse him, for that CHERONEA at that time (being my naturall City where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon mistrusting the Capitaines villany, and detesting his abominable desire, watched him a shrewd turne, and got certain of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compasse his enterprise) to be of counsell with him, and take his part against the Capitaine. Now there were sixteene of them in consort together, that one night blacked their faces all with soote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the break of day set upon this ROMANE Capitaine, that was making sacrifice in the Market-place, and slew him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the City, which was straight in a great uproare for the murder committed. Thereupon they called a Councell, and in the Market-place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death: hoping thereby to have cleared their innocency for the fact done unto the ROMANS. But the selfe same night, as all the Magistrates and Officers of the City were at supper together in the Town-house according to their custome: Damon and his followers stole upon them suddenly, slew them all, and fled againe upon it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being sent on some journey, passed by the City of CHERONEA with his Army, and because this murder was but newly done, he stayed there a few dayes to examine the troth and originall thereof: and found that the Commons of the City were in no fault, but that they themselves also had received hurt: whereupon he tooke the souldiers of the ROMANS that remained of the Garrison, and carried them away with him. In the meane time, Damon destroyed all the Country thereabout, and still hovered neare to the City, inasmuch as the inhabitants of the same were driven in the end to send unto him, and by gentle words and favourable decrees handled him so, that they inticed him to come againe into the City: and when they had him amongst them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus, to say, a master of exercises of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his stove or hot-house, stark naked as he was, they flew him by treason. And because there appeared Spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard groanings and sighings as our fathers told us, they caused the doore of the hot-house to be walled up: yet for all that, there are visions seene, and terrible voices and cries heard in that selfe place unto this present time, as the neighbors dwelling by do testifie. Now they that were defended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the Countrey of PHOCIDES, neare unto the City of STIRIS, who do onely of all other both keepe the Language and manners of the ETOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, signifying Black, and besmeared with soote: because that Damon and his fellows did blacke their faces with soote, when they flew the ROMANE Capitaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neare neighbours unto the CHERONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of ROME, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole City (as if it had been one private person alone) for the murder of the ROMANS, whom Damon and his companions had slain. The Inditement was drawn, and the case pleaded before the Governor of MACEDON, for that the ROMANS did send no Governours at that time into GRECE: and the Counsellors that pleaded for the City of CHERONEA, relied upon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselves to his report, who knew the troth and how it was. Thereupon the Governor wrote unto him, and Lucullus in his Letter of answer advertised the verity troth: so was our City cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stood in danger of utter destruction. The inhabitants of the City of CHERONEA, for they had escaped the danger by testimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honour him withall, they set up his image in stone in the Market-place, next unto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be living at this present, though many yeares be gone, and passed since, do notwithstanding reckon our selves partakers of his forepassed benefit. And because we are persuaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh us acquainted with mens manners and conditions, is far more excellent, then the picture that representeth any mans person or shape onely: we will comprehend his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of Noble mens Lives, where we do compare and fort them one with another. It shall be sufficient for us therefore, that we shew our selves thankful for his benefit: and we think, that he himself would mislike, for reward of his true testimony, to be requited with a favourable lie told in his behalfe. But like as when we will have a passing faire face drawne, and lively counterfeited, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, yet some manner of blemish or imperfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leave it out altogether, nor yet too curiously to shew it, because the one would deforme the counterfeite, and the other make it very unlikely. Even so, because it is a hard thing (or to say better, peradventure impossible) to describe a man, whose life should altogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first study to write his vertues at large, and thereby seek perfectly to represent the troth, even as the life it selfe. But where by chance we finde certaine faults and errors in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by necessity of the time or state of the Common-wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednesse proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not need too curiously to expresse in our History, but rather to passe them lightly over, of reverent shame to the meer frailty of mans nature, which cannot bring forth a man of such vertue and perfection, but there is ever some imperfection in him. And therefore, considering with my selfe unto whom I might compare Lucullus. I thought it best to compare him with Cimon, because they have bene both valiant souldiers against their enemies, having both done notable exploits in warres against the Barbarous people: and moreover, they have both bene courteous and mercifull unto their Citizens, and were both the onely men that pacified the Civill warres and diffention in their Country, and both the one and the other of them was notable victories of the Barbarous people. For there was never GRECIAN Capitaine before Cimon, nor ROMANE Capitaine before Lucullus, that had made warres so farre off from their Country, leaving apart the deeds of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the Acts also of Persus against the ETHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Jason also, if there remaine any monument extant since that time, worthy of credit in these our dayes. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together, that they never ended their warres: they onely overthrew their enemies, but never overcame them altogether. Again, we may note in them a great resemblance of nature, for their honesty, curtesie and humanity, which they shewed unto strangers in their Countrey: and for the magnificence and sumptuousnesse of their life and ordinary expence. It may be we do leave out some other similitudes between them: howbeit in the discourse of their Lives they easily appeare. Cimon was the Sonne of Miltiades and of Hegesipyle, a THRACIAN woman born, and the Daughter of King Olorus, as we finde written in certain Poeticall Verses which Melanthius and Archelaus have written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the Historiographer himself, who was of kin also unto Cimon, was called in like manner Olorus, shewing by the agreeing of the name, that this King Olorus was one of his ancestours, and did also possesse Mines of Gold in the Countrey of THRACIA. It is said moreover, that he died in a certaine place called the Ditchy Forrest, where he was slaine: howbeit that his ashes and bones were carried into the Countrey of ATTICA, where his Tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongst the Tombes of them of the house and family of Cimon, neare unto the Tombe of Cimon's owne Sister called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the Village of ALIMUS, and Miltiades of the Village of LACTIA. This Miltiades, Cimon's Father, being condemned by the state to pay the sum of fifty Talents, was for non-payment cast into prison, and there died: and left Cimon and his Sister Elpinice alive, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his first young yeares had a very ill name and report in the City, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drinker, following his Grandfather Cimon's fashions up and down, as he had also his name: saving that his Grandfather for his beahtinesse was furnished with Coates, as much to say, as fool. Sestimbrotus THRASIAN, who was about Cimon's time, writeth, that Cimon never learned Musicke, nor any other of the liberal Sciences, accustomedly taught to young Noble mens Sons of GRECE, and that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper unto children born in the Countrey of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a Noble minde, and plain, without dissimulation, so that he rather lived PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was even such as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be:

A simple man he was, and could not well disguise:

As honeste in things of weight, as wit could well devise.

This served fitly to be applied unto Sestimbrotus words written of him: but notwithstanding, in his first young yeares he was suspected of incontinency with his Sister, who indeed otherwise had no very good name. For he was very familiar with the Painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners upon the Walls of the Gallery, called the Plesandion, and now Pecile (to say, set out and beautified with divers Pictures) he drew (as they) Laodices face upon Elpinices Picture. This Painter Polygnotus was no common Artificer nor hireling, that painted this Gallery for monies sake, but gave his labour frankly to the Common-wealth, as all the Historiographers that wrote in that time do witness: and as the Poet Melanthius also reciteth in these verses:

At his own proper charge, great cost he hath bestowed, In decking up our Temples here With gilded Rooves embowed, For honour of the Gods. And in our tongue likewise, He hath adorned the common place, with many a fine devise:

Painting and setting forth, in stately shew to see,
The images of demy-gods that here amongst us be.

Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly company with her Brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull married wife, because he could not for her poverty have a husband of like Nobility and parentage to her selfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richest men in the City, did afterwards fall in fancy with her, and desired to marry her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fifty Talents, wherein he stood condemned a debter to the State, so that he might have her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and upon that condition married his Sister Elpinice unto Callias. This notwithstanding, it is certaine that Cimon was somewhat amorous and given to love women. For Melanthius the Poet in certain of his Elegies, maketh mention for his pleasure of one Astoria born at SALAMINA, and of another called Mnestræ, as if Cimon had been in love with them. But undoubtedly, he loved his lawfull life. Iodice marvellous well, the Daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles Son, and tooke her death very grievously, as we may conjecture by the Elegies that were written unto him, to comfort him in his sorrow. Panæus the Philosopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Physitian wrote those Elegies: and sure it is not unlikely, considering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimon's nature and conditions deserved great commendation. For his valiantnesse he gave not place unto Miltiades, and for his wisdom and judgement, he was not inferior unto Themistocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a juster and honeste man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valiantnesse of a noble Capitaine: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good Governor, and in the administration of the affaires of a City, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the coming in of the MEDES, counselled the people of ATHENS to go out of the City, to leave their Lands and Countrey, and to ship into Gallies, and fight with the Barbarous people by sea in the straight of SALAMINA: as every man was wondering at his bold and venturous counsell, Cimon was the first man that went with a life and jolity through the streete Cerameicus, unto the Cattle, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carrying a bit of a Bridle in his hand to consecrate unto the goddess Minerva, signifying thereby, that the City had no need of horsemen at that time, but of Mariners and Seamen. And after he had given up his Offering, he took one of the Targets that hung upon the Wall of the Temple, and having made his prayer unto Minerva, came down to the Haven, and was the first that made the most part of the Citizens to take a good heart to them, and courageously to leave the land, and take the Sea. Besides all this, he was a man of a goodly stature, as Ion the Poet testifieth, and had a fair curled hair and thick, and fought so valiantly at the day of battell, that he was immediately great reputation, with the love and good will of every man. So that many were still about him to encourage him to be lively and valiant, and to think thenceforth to do some Acts worthy of the glory that his Father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwards, so soon as he began to deal in matters of State, the people were marvellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themistocles: by means whereof Cimon was presently advanced and preferred to the chiefe Offices of honour in the

the City, being very well thought on of the common people, because of his soft and plaine nature. Moreover, Aristides also did greatly further his advancement, because he saw him of good gentle nature, and for that he would use him as a counterpoise to controule Themistocles craft and stoutnesse. Wherefore after the Medes were fled out of Greece, Cimon being sent for by the Athenians for their Generall by sea, when the City of Athens had then no manner of rule nor commandement, but followed King Pausanias and the Lacedaemonians: he ever kept his Countrey men and Citizens in marvellous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to do good service, then any other Nation in the whole Army whatsoever. And when King Pausanias had practised with the barbarous people to betray Greece, had written also to the King of Persia about it, and in the meane tyme dealt very cruelly and straightly with the confederates of his Countrey, and committed many insolent parts by reason of the great Authority he had, and through his foolish pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwise, gently entertained them whom Pausanias injured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his courteous manner, the Lacedaemonians having no eye to his doings, he stole away the rule and commandment of all Greece from them, and brought the Athenians to be sole Lords of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his sweet tongue, and gracious manner of using all men. For the most part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Pausanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and submitted themselves under the protection of Cimon and Aristides: who did not onely receive them, but wrote also to the Councill of the Ephores at Lacedaemon, that they should call Pausanias home, for that he dishonoured Sparta, and put all Greece to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they say that King Pausanias being on a time in the City of Byzance, sent for Cleoneice, a young maiden of a Noble house, to take his pleasure of her. Her parents durst not keep her from him, by reason of his cruelty, but suffered him to carry her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the Groomes of Pausanias Chamber to take away the lights, and thinking in the darke to come to Pausanias bed that was asleep, groping for the bed as softly as she could to make no noise, she unfortunately hit against the Lampe, and overthrew it. The falling of the Lampe made such a noise, that it waked him on the sudden, who thought straight therewithall that some of his enemies had been come traiterously to kill him, whereupon he took his dagger lying under his beds head, and so stabbed it in the young Virgin, that she died immediately upon it. Howbeit he never let Pausanias take rest after that, because her spirit came every night and appeared unto him, as he would faine have slept, and spake this angrily to him in verse, as followeth:

For no and shame be unto him, that justice down doth beare.*

This vile fact of his did so stir up all the confederates hearts against him, that they came to besiege him in Byzantium under the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithstanding he escaped, and secretly saved himselfe. And because that this maidens spirit would never let him rest, but vexed him continually, he fled unto the City of Heraclea, where there was a Temple that conjured dead spirits, and there was the spirit of Cleoneice conjured to pray her to be contented. So she appeared unto him, and told him that he should deliver of all his troubles so soon as he came to Sparta: signifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he should suffer there. Divers writers do thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the Grecians, which were come to him to take his part: was advertised that certaine great men of Persia, and allied to the King himselfe, who kept the City of Eione, upon the River of Strymon in the Countrey of Thracia, did great hurt and damage unto the Grecians inhabiting thereabouts. Upon which intelligence he took the Sea with his Army, and went thither, where at his first coming he vanquished and overthrew the barbarous people in battell: and having overthrown them, drave all the rest into the City of Eione. That done, he went to invade the Thracians that dwelt on the other side of the River of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of Eione: and having driven them to forsake the Countrey, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himselfe. Whereupon he held them that were besieged at Eione so straightly from victuals, that Butes the King of Persias Lieutenant, despairing of the state of the City, set fire on the same, and burnt himselfe, his friends, and all the goods in it. By reason whereof, the spoile taken in that City was but small, because the barbarous people burnt all the best things in it with themselves: howbeit he conquered the Countrey thereabouts, and gave it to the Athenians to inhabit, being a very pleasant and fertile soile. In memory whereof, the people of Athens suffered him to consecrate and set up openly three Hermes of stone (which are four square pillars) upon the tops of the which they set up heads of Mercury: upon the first of the three pillars, this inscription is ingraven.

*The people firmly were, of courage stout and fierce, Who having sent the Medes fast up (as stories do rehearse) Within the Walled Towne, of Eione that side, Which on the streame of Strymon stands, they made them their abide The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feeble
The dint of warre so many a time, with trusty toles of Steele: Till in the end, dispaire so pierced in their thought, As there they did destroy themselves, and so were brought to nought.*

Upon

Upon the second there is such another:

*The Citizens which dwell in Athens stately Towne, Have here set up these Monuments, and Pictures of renowne, To honour so the facts, and celebrate the same,
Their valiant Chieftaines did achieve, in many a martiall Game:
That such as after come, when they thereby perceive, How men of service for their deades, did rich rewards receive, Encouraged may be, such men for to resemble,
In valiant acts and dreadfull deeds, which makes their foes to tremble.*

And upon the third another:

*When Menestheus did leade forth of this City here, An Army to the Trojan Warres, (by Homer doth appeare) He was above the rest, that out of Græcia went,
A valiant Knight, a worthy Wight, a Captaine excellent,
To take in hand the charge, an Army for to guide:
And eke to range them orderly, in Battell to abide.
That praise of prowess then (O grave Athenians) Is now no newes to fill the eares of these our Citizens, Since through the World so wide, the fame and worthy praise, For martiall feats, to you of yore hath judged beene alwaies.*

Now though Cimons name be not comprised in these Inscriptions, yet they thought that this was a singular honour to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themistocles had ever the like. For when Miltiades requested the People one day that they would license him to weare a Garland of Olive Boughs upon his head: there was one Socharis, borne in the Towne of Decelea, that standing up in open Assembly spake against him, and said a thing that marvellously pleased the People, though indeed it was an unthankfull recompence for the good service he had done to the Common-wealth. When you have Miltiades (said he) overcome the barbarous People alone in Battell, then aske to be honoured alone also. But how was it then, that Cimons service was so acceptable to the Athenians? It was in mine opinion, because they had with other Captaines fought to defend themselves and their Countrey onely: and that under the conduction of Cimon, they had assaulted and driven their Enemies home to their owne doores, where they conquered the Cities of Eione and of Amphipolis, which afterwards they did inhabit with their owne Citizens, and wanne there also the Ile of Scyros, which Cimon took upon this occasion. The Dolopians did inhabit it, who were idle People, and lived without labour or tillage, and had bene Rovers on the Sea of a wonderful long time, using Piracy altogether to maintaine themselves withall: so that in the end they spared not so much as the Merchants and Passengers that harboured in their Havens, but robbed certaine Thessalians that went thither to traffick. And when they had taken their Goods from them, yet would they cast them in Prison besides. Howbeit the Prisoners found meanes to escape, and after they had saved themselves, repaired to the Parliament of the Amphictyons, which is a generall Councill of all the States and People of Greece. The Amphictyons understanding the matter, condemned the City of the Scyrians to pay a great summe of Money. The Citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the Fine, and bad them that robbed the Merchants, and had the Goods in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, because there was no other likelihood, but that the Thieves themselves should be driven to answer the Fine, they fearing it, wrote Letters unto Cimon, and willed him to come with his Army, and they would deliver their City into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon having conquered the Island, drave out the Dolopians thence, and rid the Sea Ægeum of all Pyrates thereby. That done, remembering that the ancient Thesew, the Sonne of Aegæus, flying from Athens came into that Island of Scyros, where King Lycomedes suspecting his coming, had traiterously slaine him: Cimon was marvellous careful to seeke out his Tombe, because the Athenians had an Oracle and Prophecy, that commanded them to bring his ashes and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honour him as a demy-god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the Inhabitants of the Island would never afore confesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much ado found the Tombe, put his bones aboard the Admirall-Galley sumptuously decked and set forth, and so brought him againe into his Countrey, foure hundred yeares after Thesew death. For this, the People thanked him marvellously, and thereby he wanne exceedingly the Athenians good wills, and in memory of him they celebrated the judgement of the Tragicall Playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man, had played his first Tragedy, Aphepsion the President perceiving there was great strife and contention amongst the lookers on, would not draw them by lots that should be Judges of this Play, to give the Victory unto that Poet that had best deserved: but when Cimon and the other Captaines were come into the Theater to see the same (after they had made their accustomed Oblations unto the god, in honour of whom these Playes were celebrated) he stayed, and made them to minister an Oath unto tenne (which were of every Tribe of the People one) and the Oath being given, he caused them to sit as Judges to give sentence, which of the Poets should carry away the Prize. This made all the Poets strive and contend who should doe best, for the honour of the Judges: but Sophocles by their sentence bare away the Victory. But Æschylus (as they say) was so angry and grieved withall, that he tarried not long after in Athens, but went for sight into Sicilia, there.

passing sweetly

where he died, and was buried neare unto the City of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young Boy, newly come from CHIO unto ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons Houfe, and that after Supper when they had given the god thanks, Cimon was intreated by the Company to sing. And he did sing with so good a grace, that every man praised him that heard him, and said he was more courteous then Themistocles far: who being in like company, and requested also to play upon the Citherne, answered them, he was never taught to sing or play upon the Citherne, howbeit he could make a poore Village to become a rich and mighty City. After that done, the Company discoursing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talke of Cimon's doings: and having rehearsed the chiefest of them, he himselfe told one, which was the notablest and wisest part of all the rest that ever he played. For the ATHENIANS and their Confederates together, having taken a great number of barbarous People Prisoners, in the Cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIUM, the Confederates to honour him withall, gave him the preheminence to divide the Spoyle amongst them. Whereupon he made the division, and set out the bodies of the barbarous People all naked by themselves, and laid the Spoyles and their Apparell by themselves. The Confederates found this distribution very unequall: but neverthelesse Cimon gave them the choice to choofe which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gave the Confederates counsell, rather to take the Spoyles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themselves, and so they did: for they tooke the Spoyle of the Prisoners Goods and Apparell, and left the men unto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common Souldiers to be but an ill divider of Spoyle, because that the Confederates carried away great store of Chaines, Carkanets, and Bracelets of Gold, and goodly rich Purple Apparell after the PERSIAN fashion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and unacquainted with paine and labour. But shortly after, the Parents and Friends of these Prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed every man of them at a great Ranfome: so that Cimon gathered such a masse of ready Money together by their Ranfome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his Galleys with the same for the space of foure Moneths after, and left a great summe of Money besides in the sparing Treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, bestowed the Goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous People, more honourably againe, in relieving his poore decayed Citizens: for he brake up all his Hedges and Inclosures and laid them plaine and open, that Travellers passing by, and his owne poore Citizens, might take as much Fruite thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continuall Table in his Houfe, not furnished with many Dishes, but with Meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore Countrey men were daily refreshed, that would come unto that Ordinary: so as they needed not otherwise care to labour for their living, but might be the readier, and have the more leisure to serve the Common-wealth. Yet Arifotle the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinary Table: but for his poore Townesmen only in the Village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwaies certaine young men waiting on him of his Household Servants well apparellled, and if he met by chance as he went up and downe the City, any old Citizen poorly arrayed, he made one of these young men strip himselfe, and change Apparell with the old man, and that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreover these young men carried ever good store of Money about them: and when they met with any honest poore Citizen in the Market-place, or elsewhere, knowing his poverty, they secretly gave him Money in his hand, and said never a word. Which the Poet selfe Cratinus seemeth to speake of, in a Comedy of his intituled the Archiloches:

*I am Metrobius the Secretary, he Which did my selfe assure (in age) well cherished to be:
At wealthy Cimon's board, where want was never found, Whose distributions and his almes did to the poore abound.
There thought I for to passe mine aged yeares away, With that right noble goodly man, which was the Grecians stay.*

Furthermore, Gorgias Leontine said, that Cimon got Goods to use them, and that he used them to be honoured by them. And Critias that was one of the thirty Tyrants of ATHENS, he wisheth and desireth of the gods in his Elegies:

*The goods of Scopas heires, the great magnificence, And noble heart of Cimon, he who spared none expence:
The glorious Victories and high triumphant Showes.
Of good Agesilaus King: good gods, oh grant me those.*

The Name of Lychas SPARTAN hath beene famous amongst the GRECIANS: and yet we know no other cause why, saving that he used to feast strangers that came to LACEDÆMON on their Festivall day, to see the Sports and Exercises of the young men dancing naked in the City. But the magnificence of Cimon, did far exceede the ancient liberality, courtesie, and hospitality of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the first men that taught the GRECIANS throughout all GREECE, how they should sowe Corne, and gather it to maintaine themselves withall, and also shewed them the use of Wells, and how they should light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an Hospitall of his owne Houfe, where all his poore Citizens were fed and relieved, and permitting strangers that travelled by his Grounds, to gather such Fruites there as the time and season of the yeare yielded:

he brought againe (as it were) into the World, the Goods to be common amongst them, as the Poets say they were in the old time of Saturnes Reigne. And now, where some accused this honest liberality of Cimon, objecting that it was but to flatter the common People withall, and to winne their good wills by that meanes: the manner of life he led, accompanying his liberality, did utterly confute and overthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon ever tooke part with the Nobility, and lived after the LACEDÆMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies against Themistocles, who without all compasse of reason increased the Authority and Power of the People: and for this cause he joyned with Arifides, and was against Ephialtes, who would for the Peoples sake have put downe and abolished Areopagus Court. And where all other Governours in his time were Extortioners and Bribe-takers, (Arifides and Ephialtes only excepted), he to the contrary led an uncorrupt life in administration of Justice, and ever had cleane hands, whatsoever he spake or did for the State and Common-wealth, and would therefore never take Money of any man living. And for proofe hereof, we finde it written, that a Nobleman of PERSIA called Refaces, being a Traytor to his Master the King of PERSIA, fled on a time unto ATHENS, where being continually baited and wearied with the common accusations of these tale-bearers and pick-thanks that accused him to the People, he repaired at the length unto Cimon, and brought him home to his owne doore two Bolles, the one full of Daricks of Gold, and the other of Daricks of Silver, which be pieces of Money so called, because that the name of Darius was written upon them. Cimon seeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather choofe, to have him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous Nobleman answered him, that he had rather have him his friend. Then said Cimon to him againe, Away with thy Gold and Silver, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that Gold and Silver shall ever be at my commandement, to take and dispose it as I have neede. About that time began the Confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the Warres against the barbarous People, desiring thenceforth to live quietly, and to have leisure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke also, considering that they had driven their Enemies out of their Countrey, and that now they did them no more hurt: by reason whereof they payed the Money they were seffed at, but they would furnish no more men nor Ships as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to do it by all the meanes they could, and prosecuted Law against them that failed payment, condemning them in great Fines, and that so cruelly, that they made the Seigniorie and Dominion of the ATHENIANS hateful unto their Confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary course to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take Money and voide Ships of them that would not, or could not serve in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become slothfull Mongrels in their Houses, by too much rest, and to transpore themselves from good Souldiers which they had beene, to Labourers, Merchants, and Farmers, altogether altered from Armes and Warres, through the beauly slothfull desire they had to live pleasantly at home. And contrariwise, causing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to serve in Galleys, he so acquainted them with continuall paines in his Voyages, that he made them in short space become Lords and Masters over them that gave them pay and entertainment. For they began by little and little to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they saw trained continually in the Warres, ever bearing Armour, and carrying their Weapons in their hands, becoming expert Souldiers at their charge, by reason of the Pay they gave them: so that in the end, they became Subjects and Contributaries as it were unto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there never was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the cruelty and Power of that mighty PERSIAN King, then Cimon did: for after he had driven him out of all GREECE, he left him not so, but following him foote-hot, as we commonly say, before the barbarous People could take breath, or give wise and direct order for their doings, he made so great speede, that he tooke some of their Cities from them by force, and other some by practice, causing them to rebell against the King, and turne to the GRECIANS side: inasmuch as there was not a man of Warre left for the King of PERSIA in all ASIA, from the Countrey of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being advertised that the Kings Captaines were upon the Coast of PAMPHYLIA, with a great Army by Sea, because he would feare them in such sort, that they should not dare any more to shew themselves upon the Sea, on this side of the Isles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Isle of GNEDOS, and from the City of TRIOPUM, with two hundred Galleys, the which at the first had beene excellently well made and devised by Themistocles, as well for swift sailing, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carry the greater number of men of Warre in Battell, to assault the Enemies. And so went first against the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS borne, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receive their Army into their Havens) landed there, destroyed all the Countrey, and then came and camped with his Army hard at their Walls. But the men of CHIO being ancient friends of the PHASELITES, and in Cimon's Army at that Journey, did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gave advertisement to them of the City of their doings, by Letters, which they tied to their Arrows, and shot over the Walls. So as in the end they procured their peace, with condition, that the PHASELITES should pay tenne Talents for a Fine: and furthermore, should also follow the Army of the GRECIANS, and from thenceforth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous People. Now Ephorus saith, that the PERSIAN Captaine that had charge of the Army by Sea, was called Tibrastus, and the Captain of the Army by Land, Pherendates. But Callisthenes writeth that Ariomandes, the Sonne of Gobrias, was the Kings Lieutenant, having chiefe Authority over the whole Army that lay at Anker before the River of Eurymedon, and had no desire to fight, because they looked for a new supply of fourescore Sayle of the PHOENICIANS, that should come to them from CYPRUS. But Cimon contrarily, fought to fight before these Gallies of the PHOENICIANS, came to joyne with them, and put his Gallies in order of Battell, determining to give a Charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not: which the barbarous People perceiving, drew nearer into the mouth of the River Eurymedon, because they should not compasse them in behinde, nor force them to come to Battell against their wills. Which notwithstanding, when they saw the ATHENIANS come to set upon them where they lay, they made out against them a Fleete of six hundred Sayle, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fifty Sayle onely. But they did nothing worthy of so great a Power, at the least touching the Fight by Sea, but turned their Prores straight to the River: where such as could recover the mouth thereof in time, saved themselves, flying to their Army by Land, which was not farre from that place, set also in order of Battell. But the rest that were taken tardy by the way, they were slaine, and their Gallies funke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were saved, as it is likely, and many also were splitted to pieces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two hundred of them Prisoners. In the meane season, their Army by Land came neare to the Sea side: which Cimon perceiving, stood in some doubt, whether he should land his men or not, because it seemed a hard and dangerous thing unto him, to land in sight of his Enemies: and to put forth the GRECIANS already wearied with the first Battell against the barbarous People, who were altogether whole, fresh, and lusty, and withall many in number against one. Nevertheless, perceiving that his men trusted in their force, besides the courage which the first Victory gave them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the Enemies: he put them on Land while they were hot yet with the first Battell. And so with great fury and loud cries they ranne immediately against the barbarous People, who stood still and stirred not, and received their first Charge very valiantly: by reason whereof, the Battell grew sharpe and bloody, inso much as there were slaine all the greatest Personages and men of best account of all the ATHENIANS Army. But the other fought it out so valiantly, that in the end they wanne the Field, and with marvellous difficulty made the barbarous People flee, whereof they slew a great number in the place, and tooke the rest Prisoners, with all their Tents and Pavillions, which were full of all sorts of Riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant Champion of the holy Games, having in one selfe-day wonne two Victories, and having excelled the Battell by Sea also which the GRECIANS had wonne within the Channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then upon the Land: and the Battell which the GRECIANS wanne by Land before the City of PLATEES, with that which he wanne the day before on the Sea: yet was he not contented with all this. For after two so famous Victories obtained, he would once againe fight for the honour of the Tokens of Triumph: and being advertised that the fourescore Sayle of the PHOENICIANS (coming too late to be present at the first Battell by Sea) were arrived at the head of Hydra, he sayled thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this Fleete knew no certainty of the overthrow of their chiefe Army, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was overthrowne in that sort: and therefore were they so much the more afraid, when they discried afar off the victorious Army of Cimon. To conclude, they lost all their Ships, and the greatest part of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. This Victory against the PERSIANS did so daunt and plucke downe the pride and lofty minde of the barbarous PERSIAN King, as he made that condition of Peace so much spoken of in ancient Histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his Armies thenceforth should come no nearer to the GRECIAN Sea, then the cariage of a Horse; and that he would sayle no farther forward then the Illes CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any Gallies or other Ships of Warre. Howbeit the Historiographer Calisthenes writeth, that it was no part of any Article comprised within the Condition of Peace, but that the King kept it for the feare he had of this so great an Overthrow: and that afterwards he kept so farre from the GRECIAN Sea, that Pericles with fifty Sayle, and Ephialtes with thirty onely, did sayle beyond the Illes CHELIDONIAE, and no barbarous Fleete ever came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common ACTS of ATHENS, which Craterus hath gathered together, the Articles of this Peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true indeede. And it is said, that for this occasion the ATHENIANS built an Altar of Peace, and that they did Callias great honour, for that he was sent Ambassadors unto the King of PERSIA to take his Oath for confirmation of this Peace. So when all these Spoyles of the Enemies were sold to them that would give most, there was such store of Gold and Silver in the sparing Coffers of their Treasury, that there was enough to serve their turne for any service they would employ it to; and besides that, they had sufficient to build up the side of the Wall of the Castle which looketh towards the South, this Voyage and great Spoyle did so enrich them. And it is said moreover, that the building of the long Walls that joyne to the City, with the Haven, which they call the legs, was built and finished afterwards: howbeit the first foundations thereof were built with the Money Cimon gave towards it, for that the Worke met with Moorish and watry places, by meane whereof they were driven to fill up the Marshes with force of Flints and great Logs, which they threw unto the bottome. It was he also that first did beautifie and set forth the City of ATHENS, with places of liberrall exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he caused plaine Trees to be set in the Market-place: and the Academy

which before was very dry and naked, he made it now a pleasant Grove, and full of goodly Springs which he brought into it, and made fine covered Arbours to walke in, and goodly long smooth Alleys to runne a good course in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine PERSIANS dwelling in CHERRONEUS (to say, a demy Isle of the Countrey of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but sent to the People of high THRACIA, to pray their aide to defend themselves against Cimon: of whom they made but little account, because he was departed from ATHENS with a very few Ships, who set upon them onely with foure Gallies, and tooke thirtene of theirs. And so having driven the PERSIANS out of CHERRONEUS, and subdued the THRACIANS, he conquered all the Countrey of CHERRONEUS, from THRACIA unto his owne Countrey: And departing from thence, went against them of the Isle of THASOS, that had rebelled against the ATHENIANS: and having overcome them in Battell by Sea, he wanne three and thirty of their Ships, and besides that tooke their City by Siege, and wanne the Mines of Gold lying beyond the same to the ATHENIANS, with all the Lands that belonged unto them. This Conquest made his way open into MACEDON, and gave him great opportunity to have taken the best part thereof at that present time. But because he let it alone, and followed not that opportunity, he was suspected to have taken Money, and to have beene bribed by Presents of King Alexander: whereupon his secret Enemies laid their heads together, and accused him. But Cimon to clear himselfe before the Judges of this accusation, said unto them: I have practised friendship neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy People: neither have I taken their matters in hand, as some other have done, to receive both honour and profit by them. But indeede I am a friend to the LACEDÆMONIANS; for I confesse I love them, and desire to follow their sobriety and temperance of life, the which I prefer and esteeme above any Riches or Treasure: although I am very glad notwithstanding to enrich our State and Common-wealth with the spoiles of our Enemies. Stesimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and saith, that his Sister Elpinice went to Pericles house, (who was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to pray him not to deale so extremely with her Brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, said: Alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, thou, now to overcome these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimon came to hearing, he was a more gentle adversary then any other of his accusers, and rose up but once to speake against him, and that for manners sake onely: so that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And furthermore, so long as he was present in ATHENS, he alwaies kept the seditious People in obedience, who would ever crosse and thwart the Authority of the Nobility, because they would have all the sway and rule in their owne hands. But when Cimon was sent abroad any whither to the Warres, then the common People having no body to gainsay them, turned and altered the Governement of the City to plebeian survey, and confounded all the ancient Lawes and Customes which they had observed of long time, and that by the procurement and setting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of Causes in manner from the Court of * Areopagus, and put all Authority of matters judiciall into the hands of the People, and brought the state of the City into a pure Democracy, to say, a Common-wealth ruled by the sole and absolute power of the People, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether favoured the Peoples Faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the Authority of the Senate and Councell so shamefully defaced and troden under foote, was marvelously offended withall, and sought to restore the ancient state of Judgement againe as it was before, and set up the Governement of the Nobility (called Optimasia) that was established in the time of Clisibenes. But then began his Enemies againe with open mouth to cry out upon him, reviving the old former naughty rumour that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne Sister: and furthermore accusing him, that he did favour the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongst other things, there ranne in the Peoples mouths the Verses of the Poet Eupolis, which were made against Cimon:

No wicked man he was, but very negligent,
And therewithall to Wine much more, then unto Money bent.
He stole sometimes away, at Sparta for to sleepe:
And left poore Elpinice his Wife at home alone to weepe

And if it be so, that being thus negligent and given to Wine, he have gotten so many Cities, and wonne such sundry great Battels: it is out of doubt then, that if he had beene sober and careful, there had never beene before him nor since, any GRECIAN Captaine that had passed him in glory of the Warres. Indeede it is true, that from the beginning he ever loved the manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twins which he had by his Wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedæmonius, and the other Elasus, as Stesimbrotus writeth, saying: that for that cause Pericles did ever twit them in the teeth with their Mothers stock. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both these two, and another third called Thestalus, were borne of Isodice, the Daughter of Euryptolemus, the Sonne of Megacles. Howsoever it was, it is certaine that Cimon credit grew the greater, by the favour and countenance which the LACEDÆMONIANS gave him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a young man, did beare more sway in ATHENS then he: which the ATHENIANS perceived well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning, because the good will of the LACEDÆMONIANS towards him, did bring them great commodity. For when the ATHENIANS began to grow of great Power, and to practise secretly, that the Confederates of the GRECIANS should forsake the LACEDÆMONIANS to joyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angry withall,

for the honour and love they bare unto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of Greece at that time, because he was very courteous unto the Confederates, and also thankfull unto the Lacedæmonians. But afterwards when the Athenians were aloft, and of great Power, and that they saw Cimon stucke not for a little matter with the Lacedæmonians, but loved them more then they would have had him: they began then to envie him, because in all his matters he had to doe, he ever highly praised and extolled the Lacedæmonians before them. But specially, when he would reprove them of any fault they had committed, or that he would persuade them to doe any thing: The Lacedæmonians (said he) I warrant ye doe not so. That, as Stesimbrotus saith, made him marvellously to be maliced of the People. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out upon this occasion. The fourth year of the Reigne of Archidamus, the Sonne of Zenxidamus King of Sparta; there fortun'd the wonderfullst and most fearefull Earthquake in the City of Lacedæmon, and thereabouts, that ever was heard of. For the Earth in many places of the Countrey opened, and fell as into a bottomlesse pit. The Mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of Rocks fell downe from it. All the City was layed on the ground and overthrowne, five Houses onely excepted, the rest being wholly destroyed. And it is said also, that a little before this Earthquake came, the young men of that City were playing with the young boyes, exercising themselves starke naked under a great Gallery covered over: and as they were sporting together, there started up a Hare hard by them. The young men spying her, ranne after the Hare starke naked, and oyled as they were with great laughter. They were no sooner gone thence, but the top of the Gallery fell downe upon the boyes that were left, and squashed them all to death. And in memory of the same, the Tombe where they were afterwards buried, is called unto this day Sistatias, as much to say, as the Tombe of those which the Earth-quake had flaine. But King Archidamus foreseeing straight upon the sudden, the danger that was to come, by that he saw present, perceiving his Citizens busie in saving their Household-stuffe, and that they were running out of their Houses, made the Trumpeters to sound a hot Alarme upon it, as if their Enemies had come stealingly upon them to take the City, to the end that all the Inhabitants should presently repaire unto him (setting all businesse apart) with Armour and Weapon. That sudden Alarme doublelesse saved the City of Sparta at that time: for the Ilotæ, which are their Slaves and Bond-men in the Countrey of Laconia, and the Countrey Clownes of little Villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all parts, to spoile and rob them upon the sudden that were escaped from this Earth-quake. But when they found them well armed in order of Battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then began afterwards to make open Warres upon them, when they had drawne certaine of their Neighbours unto their Confederacy, and specially the Messenians; who made hot Warres upon the Spartans. Whereupon the Lacedæmonians sent Pericidas unto Athens, to demand aide: of whom Aristophanes the Poet in mockage, said:

*With visage pale and wanne he on the Altar sate,

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not aide nor relieve a City that was an Enemy unto Athens, but rather suffer it to fall to the ground, and to spurne the pride and arrogancy of Sparta under their feete. But Cimon (as Crius saith) being more careful for the benefit of Sparta, then for the enlarging and increasng of his Countrey, brought it to passe by his perswasion, that the Athenians sent him thither with a great Power to helpe them. And furthermore, Ion rehearseth the very selfe-words that Cimon spake to move the People to grant his request. For he besought them that they would not suffer Greece to halt, as if Lacedæmon had bene one of her feete, and Athens the other: nor to suffer their City to lose another City their friend, and subject to the yoke and defence of Greece. Having therefore obtained aide to leade unto the Lacedæmonians, he went with his Army through the Corinthians Countrey: wherewith Lacharus a Captaine of Corinth was marvellously offended, saying, that he should not have entred into their Countrey with an Army before he had asked license of them of the City. For (said he) when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he cometh not in before the Master of the house commandeth him. But ye Corinthians (said Cimon to him againe) have not knocked at the Gates of the Cleonæans, nor of the Megarians, to come in, but have broken them open, and entred by force of Armes, thinking that all should be open unto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stoutly answer the Corinthian Captaine againe, because it stode him upon, and so went on with his Army through the Countrey of Corinth. Afterwards the Lacedæmonians sent againe unto the Athenians, to require aide against the Messinians and the Ilotæ, (which are their Slaves) who had wonne the City of Itome. But when the Athenians were come, the Lacedæmonians were afraid of the great Power they had brought, and of their boldnesse besides: wherefore they sent them backe againe, and would not employ them of all other their Confederates that came to their succour, because they knew them to be men very tickle, desiring change and alterations. The Athenians returned home, misliking much that they were sent backe againe, inasmuch as ever after they hated them that favoured the Lacedæmonians in any thing. And for the Lacedæmonians sake therefore, taking a small occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their Countrey for tenne yeares: which was the full time appointed and limited unto them that were banished with the Ostracism banishment. Now within the terme of these tenne yeares, the Lacedæmonians fortun'd to undertake the delivery of the City of *Delphe*s, from the servitude and bondage of the Phocians

Phocians, and to put them from the custody and keeping of the Temple of Apollo, which is in the said City. Wherefore to obtaine their desire and purpose, they came to plant their Campe near unto the City of Tanagre in Phocide, where the Athenians went to fight with them. Cimon understanding this, although he was in exile, came to the Athenians Campe armed, with intent to doe his duty to fight with his Countrey men against the Lacedæmonians, and so went into the Bands of the Tribe Oeneide, of the which he was himselfe. But his owne Countrey Enemies cried out against him, and said, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their Battell, of intent that he might afterwards bring them to the City selle of Athens. Whereupon the great Councell of the five hundred men were afraid, and sent to the Captaines to command them they should not receive him into the Battell: so that Cimon was compelled to depart the Campe. But before he went, he prayed Enthippus Anaphlystian, and his other friends that were suspected as himselfe was to favour the Lacedæmonians doings: that they should doe their best endeavour to fight valiantly against their Enemies, to the intent their good service at that Battell might purge their innocency towards their Countrey men: and so they did. For the Athenians keeping the Souldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were an hundred in all, they set them apart by themselves in a Squadron, who fought it so valiantly and desperately, that they were slaine every man of them in the Field, leaving the Athenians marvellous sorry for them, and repenting them that they had so unjustly mistrusted them as Traytors to their Countrey. Wherefore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partly as I am perswaded, because they called his former good service to minde which he had done to their Countrey aforetime, and partly also, because the necessity of the time so required it. For the Athenians having lost a great Battell before Tanagre, looked for no other about the Spring of the yeare, but that the Peloponnesians would invade them with a great Power: wherefore they revoked Cimons banishment by Decree, whereof Pericles selfe was the onely author and procurer. So civill and temperate were mens enmities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publick State and Weale: and so much did their ambition (being the most vehement passion of all other, and that most troubleth mens mindes) give place, and yeelde to the necessities and affaires of the Common-weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to Athens, he straight pacified the Warre, and reconciled both Cities together. And when he saw that the Athenians could not live in peace, but would be doing still, and enlarge their Dominions by Warre, for lucre sake: to prevent them that they should not fall out with any of the Grecians, nor by scouring and coasting up and downe the Countrey of Peloponnesus, and the Isles of Greece, with so great a Navie, should move occasion of Civill Warres amongst the Grecians, or of complaints unto their Confederates against them: he rigged and armed out two hundred Gallies to goe againe to make Warre in Cyprus, and in Egypt, because he would acquaint the Athenians with the Warres of the barbarous People, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the spoyles of those their naturall borne Enemies. But when all things were in readinesse to depart, and the Army prest to shippe and saile away, Cimon dreaming in the night had this Vision: It seemed unto him that he saw a bitch angry with him, and barking earnestly at him; and that in the midst of her barking, she spake with a mans voyce, and said unto him:

Come hardily, spare not, for if thou come by me, My whelpes and I which doe here stand, will quickly welcome thee.

This Vision being very hard to interpret, Astypylus borne in the City of Posidonia, a man expert in such conjectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this Vision did betoken his death, expounding it in this sort: The Dogge commonly is an enemy to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing with the barking of a Bitch, signifieth nothing else but an Enemy of the Medes: because the Army of the Medes is mingled with the barbarous People and the Grecians together. Besides this Vision, as he did Sacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the Beast after it was sacrificed, about the blood that fell to the ground, there assembled a swarme of Ants, which carried the congealed blood off from the ground by little and little, and laid it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the last spied it by chance: and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the Minister of the Sacrifice brought the Beasts Liver that was sacrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they judged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, having all things ready for preparation of this Journey, soe he could not well go backe, he launched into the Sea, and hoised Saile, and sending three-score of his Gallies into Egypt, sayled with the rest upon the Coast of Pamphilia, where he wanne a Battell by Sea of the King of Persia, overcoming the Gallies of the Phoenicians and the Cilicians, and conquered all the Cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into Egypt. For he had no small thoughts in his minde, but reached to high Enterprizes, and determined utterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mighty King of Persia, and specially for that he understood Themistocles was in marvellous credit and reputation amongst the barbarous People, because he had promised the King of Persia to leade his Army for him, and to doe him notable service whensoever he should have occasion to warre with the Grecians. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistocles poyson himselfe, because he depaired that he could not performe that service against Greece which he had promised: assuring himselfe that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimons courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with his Army all alongt alongst the Isle of CYPRUS, promising himselfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane Cimon sent certaine of his men unto the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to aske him some secret question: for no man ever knew neither then nor since, for what cause he had sent them thither, neither did they also bring backe any answer. For they were no sooner come thither, but the Oracle commanded them straight to returne: saying unto them, that Cimon was then coming to him. So Cimon's men receiving this answer, left the Oracle, and tooke their Journey backe to the Seawards. Now when they were come againe to the GRECIANS Campe, which at that present lay in ÆGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this World: and reckoning the dayes since his death, with the instant of their answer received from the Oracle, that Cimon was then coming unto him, they knew straight that darkly he had signified his death unto them, and that at that very time he was with the gods. He died at the Siege of the City of CITTUM in CYPRUS, as some report, or else of a hurt he received at a Skirmish, as other hold opinion. When he died, he commanded them that were under his charge, to returne into their Countrey againe, and in no case to publish his death: which commandement was so wisely and cunningly handled, that they all came home safe, and not an Enemy, nor any of their Confederates, that once understood any thing of it. So was the Army of the GRECIANS governed and led by Cimon, though himselfe was dead the space of thirty dayes, as Phanodemus writeth. But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Capitaine that did any notable thing worthy of fame against the barbarous People, because the Oratours and Governours of the chiefest Cities of GRECE stirred them up one against another, and there was no man that would once step in as a mediatur to make peace betweene them. And thus the GRECIANS now did one destroy and spoile another by Civill Warre amongst themselves, which happily gave the King of PERSIA leisure and time to restore himselfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such utter ruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GRECE, as no tongue can well expresse. Indeede a long time after, King Agésilus came with an Army of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and began a small Warre against the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA's Governours of the lower Countreys of ASIA: but before he could doe any notable exploit, he was called home againe by occasion of new troubles and Civill Warres rising among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his Countrey, leaving the Treasurers of the King of PERSIA raising of Subsidies and Taxes upon the Cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were Confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon governed, they never saw any of the Kings Serjeants at Armes, or Commissioner, that brought any Letters Patents or commandement from the King, or any Souldier that durst come neare the Sea, by forty furlongs. The Tombes which they call unto this present day Cimonias, doe witnesse that his ashes and bones were brought unto ATHENS. Nevertheless, they of the City of CITTUM do honour a certaine Tombe, which they say is Cimon's Tombe: because that in a great dearth and barrenesse of the Earth, they had an Oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Oratour Nausicrates writeth it, but to honour and reverence him as a god. Such was the Life of this GRECIAN Capitaine.

THE LIFE OF LUCIUS LUCULLUS.

S for Lucullus, his Grandfather was a Consall, and so was Metellus (surnamed Numidicus, because of his Conquest of NUMIDIA) his Uncle by the Mothers side. His Father notwithstanding was convict of Felony, for robbing the Treasure of the State whilst he was Officer: and Cecilia his Mother was reported to have led an unchaste life. But for Lucullus selfe, before he bare Office or Rule in matters of State, the first thing he touched and tooke in hand for the Cause of his Countrey, was the accusation of Servilius the Soothsayer (who before had accused his Father) for that he also had dealt falsly in his Office, and deceived the Common-wealth. And this the ROMANS thought very well handled of him, inso much as a pretty valiant act done by him. For otherwife, though privately they had no just occasion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuse the wicked, and it pleased them as much to see the young men put Law-breakers in suite, as to see a notable good course of a Dog at a Hare. Howbeit there followed such stir and banding upon this suite, that some were very sore hurt, and other flaine in the Market-place: but in fine, Servilius was cleared and quite dismissed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latine Tongues: inso much as Sylla dedicated unto him the Commentaries of all his doings which he himselfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole History thereof, and couch it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a ready tongue to utter that he would speake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be seene to do, having matters of suite or open audience:

Then are they gravell'd straight, withouten grace or skill:
Their eloquence lies then in dike, and they themselves be still.

For Lucullus had studied humanity from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall Sciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refresh his wit (after great troubles) he fell to the study of Philosophy, which quickened the contemplative part of his soule, and mortified, or at the least betimes bridled the ambitious and active part, specially after the dissention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his Learning yet, it is said, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortensius the Oratour, and Sisenna the Historiographer (in jest as it were at the first, but afterwards it fell to good earnest) that he would write the Breviary of the MARSEAN Warres in Verse or Prose, in the Latine or Greeke Tongue, which never fell to his lot: and I thinke his happe was to doe it in Prose in the Greeke Tongue, because we finde a little Greeke Story extant of the Warres of the ROMANES against the MARSIAN. He dearly loved his Brother M. Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofes; but the chieft and most noted proofe among the ROMANES was this. Himselfe was elder then his Brother Marcus, and yet for all that would never sue to beare Office in the Common-wealth, nor accept any before his Brother, but tarried alwaies till he should be chosen, and let his owne time passe over. This great courtlesie to his Brother, so wanne the Peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Edilis, and his Brother Marcus with him for his sake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIAN Warres, wherein he did many wise and valiant deedes. The cause notwithstanding that moved Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his constancy and good courteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once wonne him, he ever after employed him continually in his most weighty causes: as in Commission specially, he gave to him to coyne Money. For indeede part of the Money that Sylla spent in the Warres against King Mithridates, was coyned by Lucullus commandement, within the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS: whereupon they were called Lucullian pieces, and were currant a long time amongst the Souldiers, to buy such things as they stood in neede of, and never refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the stronger by Land, but the weaker by Sea, so as his Enemies cut off his Victualls from him, sent Lucullus into Aegypt and LYBIA, to bring him such Ships as he found in those parts. It was in the deepe of Winter, and yet he spared not to faye with three Brigantines of GREECE, and as many Gallioes of the RHODIANS, putting himselfe not onely to the danger of the Sea in so long a Voyage, but of his Enemies in like manner: who knowing themselves to be the stronger, went sailing every where with a great Navie. But for all these dangers, he first arrived in the Isle of CRETA, and wanne their good wills. From thence went to the City of CYRENE, where he found the Inhabitants turmoyled with Civil Warres, and continuall oppressions of Tyrants: from which troubles he delivered them, and gave them Lawes to establish Government among them, putting them in remembrance of Platoes words spoken to their Ancestors in old time, in the spirit of a Prophecy. For when they prayed Plato to write them Lawes, and to appoint them some forme of Government for their Common-wealth, he made them answer: It was a hard thing to give Lawes to so rich and fortunate a People as they were. For to say truly, as nothing is harder to be ruled than a rich man: so contrarily, nothing readier to receive counsell and government than a man in adversity. This Lesson framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more civill and obedient to the Lawes Lucullus gave them. When he departed thence, he coasted towards AEGYPT, where he lost the more part of his Ships by Pyrates: but for his owne person, escaping their hands, he was very honourably received in the City of ALEXANDRIA. For all the Kings Army came to meete him at Sea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the King when he returned from any Voyage by Sea; and King Ptoleme himselfe being very young at that time, gave him as honourable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his Court, and defrayed his ordinary diet, where never strange Captaine was lodged before: and did not onely spend the ordinary allowance in feasting of him which he used to others, but commanded four times as much Provision more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus tooke no more then was reasonable for his Person: nor yet would he receive any manner of Gift, although the King had sent him Presents to the value of fourecore Talents. And which is more, would not so much as goe see the City of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous Monuments and wonderfull sights in AEGYPT, saying, that it was for a man that travelled up and downe for his pleasure, and had leisure withall, to see such things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the Field, at the Siege of the Walls of his Enemies. To conclude, this young King Ptoleme would in no case fall in friendship with Sylla, fearing lest he should thereby put himselfe into Warres, but gave him men and Ships to bring him into CYPRUS. And as he was ready to imbarque, the King bidding him farewell, and imbracing him, gave him a goodly rich Emerald set in Gold, which Lucullus at the first refused, until the King shewed him his Picture graven in it: and then he accepted the Gift, fearing lest the utter refusal might cause the King thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an Ambush by Sea for him. Thus having gotten a certaine number of Shippes together of the Port Townes thereabouts, over and besides such as the Pyrates and Sea-rovers had hidden, being part of their Spoyles, and bestowed with their receitours, went on with them into CYPRUS, where he understood that his Enemies lay close in certaine Creekes under the foreland, watching to boord him as he sailed by. Whereupon he unrigged and belowed his Shippes in Docks, and sent word to all the Port Townes thereabouts, that he was determined to Winter there: and therefore willed them to provide him Victualls and other necessary Munition to be in readinesse against the Spring. But in the meane while, when he saw time convenient, he put his whole Fleete againe to the Sea with all possible speede, went himselfe away, and in the day time carried a low Saile, but in the night packt on all the Cloth he could for life: so that by this craft he wanne RHODES, and lost not one Shippe. The RHODIANS they also furnished him with Shippes: and besides them, he so perswaded the GNIDIANS and the Inhabitants of the Isle of Co, that they forooke King Mithridates, and went to make Warres with him against them of the Isle of SAMOS. But Lucullus himselfe alone drave King Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS againe to liberty, and tooke Epigonus the Tyrant Prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forsake the City of PERGAMUS, and to retire to the City PITANE, within the which

Fimbria kept him besieged very straightly by Land. Wherefore Mithridates having the Sea open upon him, sent for his Force and Navie out of all parts, not daring to hazard Battell against Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreover was himselfe a Conqueror. Fimbria perceiving what Mithridates meant, and having no Power by Sea of his owne, sent straight to Lucullus, to request him to come with his Navie into those parts to his aide, for the overcoming of this King, the greatest and most cruell Enemy that ever the ROMANE People had. Because that so notable a prey, which they followed with such danger and trouble, should not escape the ROMANES, while they had him in their hands, and was come himselfe within their danger: and that therefore he should so much the more hearken unto it, because that if it fortune Mithridates to be taken, no man should winne more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had stopped his passage, and layed hands on him, even as he thought to have fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble Victory runne in equality betweene them both: the one that had driven him from Land, and the other that had stopped his passage by Sea. And furthermore, that the ROMANES would nothing regard all the famous Battels and Victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had wonne before the Cities of CHOERONEA and ORCHOMENE, in comparison of taking the King. This was the effect of Fimbria's Message sent unto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would have believed him at that time (and have gone thither with his Shippes to stop the Havens mouth of the City, in the which Mithridates was besieged, considering also that he was so neare at hand) this Warre had taken end there, and the World besides had then bene delivered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the consideration and respect he had unto Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of private or common benefit: or that he detested and abhorred Fimbria as a cursed person, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his hands in the blood of his Captaine: or else, that it was through the secret Providence and permission of the gods, that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reserved as a worthy Enemy, against whom he might afterwards shew his valour. Howsoever it was, it so fell out that he hearkened not unto Fimbria's Message, but gave Mithridates time and leisure to flie, and finally to scorne all Fimbria's Force and Power. But Lucullus selfe alone afterwards overcame the Kings Army by Sea, once neare unto the head of Lectum, which is on the Coast of TROADE: and another time neare unto the Isle of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by Sea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of Shippes then he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had descried him, he sailed before all his Navie, being Admirall, in a Galley of RHODES, at five Oares to a Banke, whereof one Demagoras was Master, a man well-affectd to the Service of the ROMANES, and very skillfull in Battell by Sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other side rowed against him with great force, commanding his Pilot that he should so order his Galley, that he might stemme him right in the Prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the Kings Galley, which was very strong and heavey, and furthermore well armed with points and spurres of Brasse before, durst not encounter her with his Prowe, but nimble made his Galley to winde about, and turned his Poop towards him. Whereby the Galley being low at the end, received the blow without hurt, considering that they hit upon the dead Workes, and those parts which are alwaies above water. In the meane time Lucullus other Shippes were come, who commanding his Master to turne the beake-head of his Galley forward, did many famous acts: so that he made his Enemies flie, and drave Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to seeke out Sylla even as he was ready to passe over the Seas, about CHERRONEUS: holpe him to waite his Army, and so passed him over with safety. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and that King Mithridates was come into his Realme and Countries againe, which lie upon the Sea Maior, Sylla condemned the Province of ASIA to pay the summe of 20000. Talents for a Fine, by reason of their rebellion. And for leavying of his Fine, he left Lucullus there with Commission to coyne Money: which was a great comfort and hearts ease unto the Cities of ASIA, considering the extremity that Sylla had used towards them. For in so grievous and odious a Commission unto them all, as that was, Lucullus did not onely behave himselfe uprightly and justly, but also very favourably and courteously. For, astouching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in Armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for satisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue in their naughtinesse, he went against them, and having overcome them in Battell, compelled them to keepe within their Walls, and laid siege unto their City, where he used this policy with them. At noone dayes he lanced into the Sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and sailed towards the City of ELEA: howbeit in the night time secretly returned backe, and making no noise, layed an Ambush neare unto the City. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothing, went on the next morning very rashly without order, and without any manner Watch or Warde, to spoyle the Campe of the ROMANES, supposing every man had bene gone: but Lucullus coming suddenly upon them, tooke a great number Prisoners, slew about five hundred such as resisted, and wanne fixe thousand Slaves, with an infinite quantity of other Spoile. Now did the gods happily preserve Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALY suffer, even then when he was occupied in the Warres of ASIA: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and favour with

Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For, as we have said before, he dedicated his Commentaries unto him, for the good will he bare him, and by his last Will and Testament appointed him Tutor unto his Sonne, leaving Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, because they were both young men; and vehemently desirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Confull with Marcus Cotta, about the threescore Olympiades, and then they began to revive the matter againe, that it was very needfull to make Warres against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gave out that it was not ended, but onely slept for a while. Wherefore, when the Consuls came to draw Lots what Provinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was marvellous sorry that the Province of GAULE, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALY, fell to his lot, because he thought it no Countrey wherein any great Exploits were to be done: and againe, the glory of Pompey grieved him greatly, whose honour daily increased by the famous Battels he wanne in SPAIN. So that it was most certaine, that so soone as Pompey had ended the Warres there, they would have chosen him Generall in the Warres against Mithridates. Wherefore, when Pompey sent to Rome in earnest manner, to require Money to make pay to his Souldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not send him Money the sooner, he would leave both Sertorius and SPAIN behinde him, and bring his Army backe into ITALY: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to have it quickly sent him, fearing lest he should returne into ITALY upon any occasion, while he was Confull. For he thought that if he returned againe to Rome with so great an Army, he would easily doe what he list: and the rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at Rome, because he spake and did all that pleased the common People, being a vicious liver, and dissolutely given, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was another common Orator among the People, called Lucius Quintus, and he would have had all Sylla's doings revoked and broken: a matter to alter even the whole state of the Common-wealth, and to turmoyle the City of Rome againe with civill dissention, which then lived quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintus Lucullus talked withall apart, to perswade him, and openly reproved him with such words, that he was dissuaded from his evil purpose, and by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wisely and cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the Common-wealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to grow. While these things were thus in hand, newes came that Octavius the Governour of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselves to sue for this Charge, and to court Cethegus, as the onely man who above all other might make any man Officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckoning of the Government of CILICIA in respect of the Countrey, but because CAPPADOCIA was hard adjoining to it: and perswading himselfe that if he could obtaine the Government thereof, they would give none other (but himselfe) the Authority to make Warres with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none should have it but himselfe. And having proved sundry waies, was compelled in the end against his owne nature, to practise a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly devise to obtaine his desire. There was a Woman in Rome at that time called Præcia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant grace in talke and discourse, howbeit otherwise unchaste after Curtizan manner. But because she employed the credit and favour of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and service of the Common-wealth, and of them that loved her: she wanne the report (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very loving Woman, and ready to favour and further any good enterprise, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after he had once wonne Cethegus (who ruled all the Common-wealth at his pleasure) and brought him so far to be in fancy with her, that he could not be out of her sight: then had she all the whole Power and Authority of Rome in her hands, for the People did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did whatever Præcia would will him to doe. Thus Lucullus sought to come in favour with her, sending her many Presents, and using all other courtesies he could offer unto her: besides that it seemed a great reward for so proud and ambitious a Woman as she, to be sued unto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meane came to have Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all Assemblies of the People, to procure him the Governement of CILICIA: who after it was once granted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Præcia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the People wholly of themselves with one consent did grant him the charge to make Warre with Mithridates, because he knew better how to overcome him then any other Captaine, and because that Pompey was in the Warres with Sertorius in SPAIN, and Metellus also growne too old, both which two were the onely men that could deservedly have contended for this Office with him. Nevertheless, Marcus Cotta his fellow Confull, made such suite to the Senate, that they sent him also with an Army by Sea, to keepe the Coasts of PROPONTIDE, and to defend the Countrey of BITHYNIA. Thus Lucullus having this Commission, went into ASIA with one Legion onely, the which he leaved anew at Rome: and when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through covetousnesse and delicacy of the Countrey. For amongst others, were the Bands which they called the Fimbrian Bands, men given over to selfe-will, and very ill to be ruled by Martiall Discipline, because they had lived a long time at their owne liberty, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe Souldiers that together with Fimbria, slew their Generall Flaccus, Confull of the ROMANE People, and

and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria himselfe, and forsooke him, leaving him unto Sylla, being Mutiners, Traitors, and wicked People, howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painefull Souldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldnesse meely well and reformed the others also, who before had never proved (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall meant, that knew how to command: but were used to flattering Leaders, that commanded the Souldiers no more then they themselves liked of. Now concerning the State of the Enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very brave and bold (as these flourishing Sophisters commonly are) undertaking Warre against the ROMANES, with a vaine unprofitable Army, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the Eye: after he was once foyled and overcome, with no lesse shame then losse, when he came to make his second Warre, he cut off all superfluous Pompe, and brought his Army into a convenient Furniture to serve for Warres at all assaies. For he put by the confused multitude of sundry Nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous People in so many sundry Tongues, and clearly banisht also the rich graven Armour with Goldsmiths Worke, and set with precious Stones, as things that more enriched the Enemies that wan them, then gave strength or courage to those that ware with them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe Swords to be made after the ROMANE fashion, and great heavy Shields, and brought to the Field a marvellous number of Horse, more ready for Service then rich in Furniture. Then he joynd sixscore thousand Footmen together, appointed and set in order like unto the Battell of the ROMANES, with sixteene thousand Horse of Service, besides those that drew his armed Carts with Sitches about, which were in all to the number of an hundred. And besides all this Land preparation, he brought also a great number of Ships and Gallies together, which were not decked with goodly Golden Pavilions, as at the first, neither with Stoves nor Bathes, nor with Chambers and Cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and Gentlewomen: but furnished full of Armour, Artillery, and Slings, and with Moeay also to pay the Souldiers. With all this Army and preparation, he went first to invade BITHYNIA, where the Cities received him very gladly, and not those onely, but all the other Cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miseries and diseases, by the cruelty of the ROMANE Farmers and Usurers, who raising Taxes and Imposts upon them, made them abide untollerable things. It is true that Lucullus drave them away afterwards, like the Harpye, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouths: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he used unto them, and qualified a little the inclination of the People unto rebellion, being every one of them in manner willing to revolt. Now Lucullus being busie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Confull (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered him to do notable Service, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had Newes brought him from sundry places, that Lucullus was with his Army in PHRYGIA, and coming towards him: yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honour of Triumph assured already in his hands, and because Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he advanced forwards to give Battell. But Mithridates overcame him both by Sea and Land: so that Cotta by Sea lost threescore of his Ships with all the men in them, foure thousand Footmen by Land, and was after with shame shut up and besieged in the City of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelesse to escape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meane. Howbeit there were in Lucullus Campe, that were very earnest with him to leave Cotta, and to goe further, assuring him that he should finde the Realme of Mithridates both without men of Warre, or any defence at all: so that hemight easily be Lord of the whole. And these were the words of the Souldiers that spited Cotta, because his foolish rashnesse and fond imagination had not onely brought those men to the shambles to be flaine and cast away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them also, that they could not overcome him, and end this Warre without blowes, for that they were driven to go to his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration unto them, answered, that he had rather save the life of one ROMAN Citizen, then winne all that his Enemies had in their Power. And when Archelaus (who had been Mithridates Lieutenant in BORTHIA in the first Warres against Sylla, and now in the second Warre tooke part with the ROMANES) assured him that so soon as they saw him in the Realme of PONTUS, they would all rise against Mithridates, and yeeld themselves unto him: Lucullus answered him thus, that he would not shew himselfe more fearefull then the good Hunters, which never suffer the Beast to recover his Denne. And when he had so said, he marched with his Army towards Mithridates, having in all his Campe thirty thousand Footmen, and two thousand five hundred Horse. When he came so neare unto his Enemies, that he might easily at Eye discern all their Host, he wondered at the great multitude of Souldiers that were in their Campe, and was in minde to give Battell, supposing yet that the better way was to prolong time, and draw these Warres out in length. But one Marinus a ROMANE Captaine, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAIN unto Mithridates with a certaine number of Souldiers, came forwards, and provoked him to Battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in readinesse to fight: but even as both Battels were prepared to joyne, the Element opened upon the sudden, without any shew of change of weather discerned before, and they plainly saw a great flake of fire fall betwene both Armies, in forme and shape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten Silver. This Celestiall Signe put both the Armies in such a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroke: and this wonderfull sight fortun'd (as they say) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Oryes. Now Lucullus afterwards considering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor provision provision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall so many thousands of People as Mithridates had in his Campe any long time together, having his Enemies Campe so lying before them: willed that one of the Prisoners should be brought into his Tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a Cabbin, then what Corne he had left in their Cabbin. And when the Prisoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to Prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their Corne, and other proportion of Victuals they had, with the number of men the same should maintaine: he found that all would be spent in three or foure daies at the uttermost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of Battell. So he caused a marvellous deale of Wheate to be brought into his Campe out of every quarter, that the same being thoroughly victualled, he might easily tarry the occasion which his Enemies necessity should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, sought which way he might take the City of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene overthrowne before with Cotta at the Battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thousand men, and ten of their Ships. And because that Lucullus should not understand of his enterprise, Mithridates stole away by night after Supper, taking the opportunity of a darke rainy night, and marched thitherwards with such speed, that he was before the City of CYZICUS by breake of day, and pitched his Campe, where the Temple of the goddesse Adrastra standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall Destinies. Lucullus receiving intelligence of Mithridates departure from his Campe, followed him straight waies step by step, and being glad that he was not met withall of his Enemies in disorder, lodged his Army in a Village called THRACIA, in a place of great advantage for him, and commodiously seated also upon the high-waies, and throughfare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessity to victuall Mithridates Campe. Wherefore Lucullus wisely foreseeing what would follow, would not keepe his purpose secret from his Souldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his Campe, called them to Counsell, and there making an Oration unto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of assured hope, that ere many daies passed, he would give Victory into their hands, and that without losse of one drop of Bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates environed the GRECIANS round about by Land, having divided his Army into ten Campes, and stopped up the mouth of the Arme of the Sea, which divided the City from firme Land with his Ships from one side to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were Valiant men, and determined to abide all extremity for the ROMANS sakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they hear any news of him, though his Campe stood in such a place, where they might easily discern it from the City. But Mithridates Souldiers deceived them; for shewing them the ROMANS Campe that lay above hard by them, they said unto them: do ye see yonder Campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath sent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the CYZICENIANS in a marvellous feare, seeing such a multitude of Enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Dimonax, whom Archelaus sent unto them, but they would not believe him at the first, taking it for a Tale, onely to make them to be of good courage, and Valiantly abide the fury of the Siege: untill such time as a little Boy of theirs escaped from the Enemies that before had taken him Prisoner, was come againe unto them. Of whom they inquired where Lucullus was: the Boy laughed at them, thinking they jested to ask that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMANS Campe with his finger: then they beleevied it indeed, and were courageous againe. There is a Lake neare unto the City of CYZICUS called Dasylyide, and it is navigable with convenient bigge Boats. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in a Cart, and so carried it to the Sea, and there put as many Souldiers in her as she could well carry, who by night entered into the City, the Skout of the Enemies never descrying them. This small supply did marvellously comfort the besieged CYZICENIANS: and it seemeth that the gods, delighting to see their noble courage, would further increafe and assure the same, by many manifest tokens which they sent from Heaven, and specially by one, which was this. The day of the Feast of Proserpina was at hand, and the Citizens had never a black Cow to offer in solemne Sacrifice, as their antient Ceremonies required: so they made one of Paste, and brought it hard unto the Altar. Now, the Cow that was Vowed to this Sacrifice, and which they reared up of purpose to serve for that day, was feeding amongst the Heard of the City in the Fields, on the other side of the Arme of the Sea, and came into the City: where she went off her self unto the place of the Sacrifice. Furthermore, the goddesse Proserpina he self appeared unto Arifagoras in his Dreame, Secretary of the State and Common-wealth of the CYZICENIANS, and said unto him: I am come hither to bring the Flute of LYBIA against the Trumpet of PONT, and therefore tell the Citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretary had told them this Vision, the CYZICENIANS marvelled much at the goddesses words, and could not imagine what they meant. Howbeit at the breake of day there arose a great whistling winde, that made the Sea-billowes rise very high: and the Kings Engines of battery which were brought to the Walls of the City to pluck them down (being wonderfull Workes that one Niomedes a THESSALIAN Engineer had made and devised) began to make such a noise, and to break in pieces by the roughness of the winde, that a man might easily judge what would follow upon it.

it. Then all at one instant, the Southwind was become so vehement bigge, that in a moment it burst all these Engines asunder, and specially a Tower of Wood of the height of an hundred Cubits, which the winde shooke so vehemently, that it overthrew it to the ground. And it is said furthermore, that in the City of ILIUM the goddesse Minerva appeared unto divers in their sleep, all in a sweat, and shewing part of her Veile torne, as if she had bene newly returned from giving aid unto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the Inhabitants of ILIUM have a Pillar yet unto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetual memory. Now was Mithridates marvellous sorry for the breaking and losse of his Engines, by means whereof, the CYZICENIANS had escaped the danger of assault, and of the Siege in like manner, untill he truly understood of the great Famine that was in his Campe, and the extreme dearth to be such, as the Souldiers were compelled to eate mans Flesh, which (his Captaines abusing him) had for a time kept secret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left off his vaine ambition obstinately to continue Siege: knowing well that Lucullus made not Warres with therats and bravery, but (as the common Proverb saith) leapt on his belly with both his feete, that is to say, he did what he could possible to cut off all the Victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to assault a Castle that troubled him, very neare unto his Campe, Mithridates because he would not lose that opportunity, sent the most part of his Horfemen to get Victuals in BITHYNIA, with all the Carts, and Beasts of Carriage, and his most unprofitable Footmen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the selfe same night unto his Campe, and the next morning betimes being in the Winter season, followed them by the tracke with ten Ensignes of Footmen onely, and all his Horfemen. But the Snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sharpe, and the Weather so rough, that many of his Souldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on still, till he overtook his Enemies about the River of Rindacus, where he gave them such an Overthrow, that the very Women came out of the City of APOLLONIA, and went to steale the Victuals they had loden, and to strip the dead, which were a marvellous great number as a man may judge in such a case: and nevertheless there were taken six thousand Horfe of Service, an infinite number of Beasts for Carriage, and fifteene thousand men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his Campe, and passed hard by the Campe of his Enemies. But I wonder much at the Historiographer Salust, who writing of this matter saith, that here was the first time that ever the ROMANS saw any Camels. Me thinks its strange how he should thinke so, that they who long before had overcome Antiochus the Great under Scipio, and the others that a little before had fought against Archelaus, neare unto the Cities of ORCHOMENE and CHARONEA, should not have seene Camels. But to returne againe to our matter, Mithridates being feared with this Overthrow, resolved with himselfe immediately to flee, with all the speed he could possibly make: and to entertain and stay Lucullus for a time behind him, he determined to send Arifonius his Admirall with his Army by Sea, into the Sea of GRECE. But as Arifonius was ready to hoise saile, his owne men betrayed him, and delivered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thousand Crownes which he carried with him, to corrupt (if he could) part of the ROMANS Army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by Sea, leaving the rest of his Army by Land in the hands of his Captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed unto the River of Granicus, where he set upon them, and after he had slaine twenty thousand of them, tooke an infinite number Prisoners. And they say there died in that Warres, what Souldiers, what Slaves, what Lackies, and other stragglers that followed the Campe, about the number of three hundred thousand People. This done, Lucullus returned to the City of CYZICUS, where after he had spent some daies, enjoying the Glory due unto him, and received the Honourable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visit the Coast of HELLESPONT, to get Ships together, and to prepare an Army by Sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the Temple of Venus: where, as he slept in the night, it seemed to him he saw the goddesse appeare before him, which said these Verses unto him:

O Lyon fierce and stout, why sleepest thou so sound?
Since at thy hand so faire a Prey, is ready to be found.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet dark night, and calling his friends to him, told them the Vision he had in his Dreame: and about that very time also there came some unto him from the City of ILIUM, that brought him news of fifteene Gallies of King Mithridates, having five Oares to every Bank, that were seene in the Haven of the ACHAIA, and that sailed towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke Ship straight, and went afterwards to the other Marriners that lay at Anker on the Coast side, who seeing him come drew towards Land with their Ships, in purpose to run them all ashore, and fighting above hatches, hurt many of Lucullus Souldiers, because they could not compasse them in behind, and for that also the place where they had laied their Ships was such, as there was no way to force them before, their Gallies floating in the Sea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much ado all this notwithstanding, found means in the end to put ashore certain of the best Souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily land. These Souldiers went straight and set upon the Enemies behind, slew some of them even at their first coming, and compelled the rest to cut asunder the Cables that fastned the Gallies to the Banks. But when they thought to flee from Land, the Gallies bruised and broke one another: and that worst of all was, ran upon the Points and Spurres of Lucullus Gallies: and so many of them as well, that Lucullus greatly esteemed his Wifedome, and commended his diligence in such sort, that he did him this Honour, to call him sometimes unto the Councell, and make him sit at his Board. One day when this DARDARIAN Prince Othacius thought to have found fit occasion to execute his enterprise, he commanded his Footmen to be ready with his Horse out of the Trenches of the Campe: and at noon daies when the Souldiers tooke rest, and slept here and there in the Campe, he went unto Lucullus Tent, thinking to have found no body there to keepe him from coming in, considering the familiarity Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and sure he had gone in immediately unto him, if sleepe that casteth away so many other Captaines, had not then preserved and saved Lucullus that slept. For one of the Groomes of his Chamber called Menedemus, who by good Fortune kept the door of the Tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lucullus being wearied with travell and lack of sleep, was but then newly layed down to rest. Othacius, whatsoever the other said to him, would not be so answered, but told him, he would come in whether he would or not, for he must needs speake with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus answered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessary, then the preservation of his Masters Life and health, who had need to take rest: and with these words he thrust him back with both his hands. Othacius was afraid then, and withdrew himselfe secretly out of the Trenches of the Campe, tooke his Horse back, and rode straight to Mithridates Campe without his purpose he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and opportunity of time, even in great matters delivereth meanes to save or destroy the Life of man, like as drugges and Medicines given unto the sicke and diseased Persons. Shortly after, Lucullus sent one of his Captaines, called Sornatius, to get Victuals, with ten Ensignes of Footmen. Whereof Mithridates being advertised, sent presently at his taile one of his Captaines also, called Menander, unto whom Sornatius gave Battell, and slew him, with great slaughter of his men beside. And afterward Lucullus sent another of his Lieutenants, called Adrianus, with a great company of Souldiers, to get Victuals into his Campe more then he should need. Mithridates did not let slip this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines also, called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well Footmen as Horsemen: all which were slaine, two onely excepted, that brought News back to Mithridates Campe: the which he sought to save as well as he could, saying that the losse was much lesse then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and rashnesse of his Lieutenants. But Adrianus at his returne passed by Mithridates Campe with great Pompe and Majesty, carrying a huge number of Carts loaden with Corne and Spoyle he had won: which drove Mithridates selfe into so great a dispaire, and all his People into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remove thence. Whereupon, the Nobility and such as had place of credite about him, began to fend before, and secretly to convey their Stuffe out of the Campe, but utterly prohibiting others to doe the same. The rest of the Souldiers seeing the stoutnesse of the Kings Minions, began to set upon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once to issue out of the Campe. This mutiny grew to such a fury, that they overthrew their carriages and sumpter Moyle, and slew them presently. Amongst others there was slaine Dorilus one of the chiefe Captaines of all their Campe, who had nothing about him but a Purple Gown, for the which they killed him: and Hermans the Priest of the Sacrifices was troden under foote, and smothered at the Campe Gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great disorder. The King himselfe amongst others fled; but having never a one of his guard about him, nor any of the Squires of his Stable to bring him a Horse, Ptolemie, one of the Groomes of his Chamber, perceiving him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne Horse, and gave him the King, but even in manner too late. For the ROMANS that followed him were then even hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of speed they missed the taking of him, for they were very neare him; but the covertnesse of the Souldiers was the losse of the Prey they had so long fought for, with so great paine and hazard of Battels, and deprived Lucullus of the Honour and reward of all his Victories. For they were so neare unto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates never so little further, they had out of doubt overtaken him and his Horse, and carried him away. But one of the Moyle that carried his Gold and Silver (whether by chance, or of pretended policy of Mithridates, as a matter purposely abandoned to them that pursued) was found in the midst of the high-way betwixt him that fled, and the ROMANS that followed, who stayed there to rob the Gold and Silver, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes was ground so far before them, as they could never after come neare him againe. And this losse was not all which the covertnesse of the Souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For, one of the chiefe Secretaires of the King being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucullus commanded to be brought unto him to his Campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had five hundred Crownes in a Girdle about him, for greedinesse of them, slew him by the way; and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoile and destroy the whole Campe of their Enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the City of CABIRA, and many other Castles and strong places, where he found great Treasure, and the Prisons full of poore Prisoners of the GRECIANS, and many Princes akinne unto the King himselfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then seeing themselves delivered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with themselves they were not onely taken out of Prison, but revived and turned againe unto a second Life. There was also taken one of King Mithridates Sisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her: because because all Mithridates other Wives and Sisters, whom they placed furthest off, as out of all danger (and sent into a Countrey of greatest safety, neare unto the City of PHARNACIA) died pitifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sent one of the Groomes of his privy Chamber unto them, called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must all dye. Amongst many other Noble Ladies, there were two of the Kings Sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty years old a piece, and yet had never bene married: and two of his Wives also whom he had married, both of the Countrey of IONIA, the one called Bernice, borne in the Isle of CHIO, and the other Monime, in the City of MILETUM. Monime she was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding King Mithridates importunate dealing, being far in love with her, in so much as he sent her fifteene thousand Crownes at one time, yet she would never give care unto his suite, untill such time as the marriage was agreed upon betweene them, and that he had sent her his Diademe or Royall band, and called her by the Name and Title of Queen. This poore Lady after the marriage of this Barbarous King, had long lived a wofull Life, bewailing continually her accursed beauty, that in stead of a Husband, had procured her a Master: and in stead of the matrimoniall company which a Noble Woman should enjoy, had gotten her a guard and Garrison of Barbarous men, that kept her as a Prisoner, far from the sweet Countrey of GREECE: in change whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, having unfortunately left them within her owne Countrey she happily enjoyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come unto them, and had commanded them from the King to chuse what manner of death they would, and which every one of them thought most easie, and least painefull: Monime pluckt off the Royall Band from her head, and tying it owne a knot about her neck, hung her selfe, but the Band not being strong enough, brake in continently. Whereupon she cryed out: O cursed and wicked tiffue, wilt thou not yet serve me to end my sorrowfull daies? And speaking these words, cast it on the ground, and spit upon it, and held out her throat to Bacchides to be cut asunder. The other Bernice, she tooke a Cup full of poyson, her Mother being present, who prayed her to let her have half, the which she did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyson was strong enough to kill the old Mother weake with age, but not so quickly to destroy the Daughter, because she had not taken that proportion which would have served her turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, untill such time as Bacchides hasting to dispatch her, she in the end did strangle her selfe. As for the Kings two Sisters, Roxane and Statira, which were Virgins yet unmarried, they say, that one of them also dranke poyson, cursing and detesting the cruelty of her Brother: howbeit Statira gave never an ill word, nor was faint-hearted or sorrowfull to dye, but contrarily did commend and thanke her Brother highly, that seeing himselfe in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was careful to cause them dye, before they should fall as slaves into the hands of their Enemies, and before they could come to dishonour them, or doe them villany. These pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle of nature: nevertheless he went on far: her, still following Mithridates as the heeles: unto the City of TALURA. And there understanding that he was fled foure dayes before unto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned back againe, having first subdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARIANS, taken ARMENIA the lesse, and brought the Cities, Castles and strong places unto his obedience. That done, he sent Appius Clodius unto King Tigranes to summon him to deliver Mithridates unto him: and himselfe tooke his journey towards the City of AMISUS, which was yet besieged. The cause why this siege continued so long, was the sufficiency and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the King, called Callimachus, who undertook so well how all sorts of Engins of Battery were to be used, and was so subtil besides in all inventions that might serve to defend a place besieged, as he troubled the ROMANS much in this attempt: but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour, but also outreached by Lucullus for all his finenesse. For where before he had alwaies used to found the retreat at a certaine houre, and to call his men back from the assault to rest them: one day he brake that order on the sudden, and coming to assault the Wall, at the first charge wan a piece of it before those within could come in time to resist them. Callimachus seeing that, and knowing it was now impossible to keepe the City any longer, forsooke it. But before his departing he set the City on fire, either for malice to the ROMANS, because he would not they should enrich themselves with the lacke of so great a City: or else for a policy of Warre to have the more leisure to save himselfe, and flye. For no man gave eye to them that fled by Sea, because the flame was so great, that it dispersed it selfe even to the very Walls, and the ROMAN Souldiers, they onely prepared to spoyle: Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compassion of the City within, and would gladly have holpen it, and for that purpose prayed the Souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, every one gaping after the spoyle, making great noise with clashing of Harneisse, and being very loud besides otherwise, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gave the City wholly to spoyle, hoping thereby to save the Houses from fire, but it fell out cleane contrary. For the Souldiers themselves in seeking all about with Torches and Linkes lighted, to see if any thing were hidden, they set a number of Houses on fire. So as Lucullus coming into the City the next morning, and seeing the great delolation the fire had made, fell a weeping, saying unto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he never wondred more at his good Fortune, then that day he did. For Sylla said he, desired to save the City of ATRENS, the gods granted him that favour that he might doe it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and save this City, Fortune thwarting my desire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that caused Co-RINTH to be burnt. Nevertheless he did his best endeavour at that time to helpe the poore City againe. For touching the fire, even immediately after it was taken, by Gods providence there fell a shower of Raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus selfe before he left the City, made a great number of the Houses which were spoyled by fire, to be built up againe, and courteously received all the Inhabitants that were fled; besides them, he placed other Grecians there also, that were willing to dwell amongst them, and increased the bounds and confines of the City which he gave them; one hundred and twenty furlongs in the Countrey. This City was a Colonie of the ATHENIANS, who had Built and Founded it, in the time that their Empire flourished, and that they ruled the Seas: by reason whereof, many flying the Tyrannie of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the City, as the naturall Inhabitants of the same. This good hap fell upon them, that forsaking their owne goods, they went to possesse and enjoy the goods of other men: but the very Citizens of ATHENS it felte that had escaped from this great defolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gave them two hundred Drachmas apiece, and sent them againe into their Countrey. Tyrannion the Grammarian was taken at that time, whom Murena begged of Lucullus and Lucullus having granted him unto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt very discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and Gift unto him. For in bestowing this Prisoner upon him, who was a famous Learned man, he did not meane Murena should take him for a bondman, whereby he should need afterwards to make him free. For seeming to make him free, and restore him to liberty, was no more then to take that Freedome and liberty from him, which he had from his Birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Murena laid himselfe open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Capitaine should have in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISUS, he went to visite the Cities of ASIA, to the end that whilst he was not now occupied with Warres, they might have some refreshing of Laws and justice. For, by reason that Law was not executed of long time in ASIA, the poore Countrey was so afflicted and oppressed with so many evils and miseries, as no man living would scant believe, nor any Tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible covetousnesse of the Farmers, Customers, and ROMANE Usurers, did not onely devoure it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore Fathers were driven to sell their goodly young Sonnes and Daughters in marriage, to pay the interest and usury of the Money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall; and publicly the Tables dedicated unto the Temples, the Statues of their gods, and other Church Jewels: and yet in the end, they themselves were also to be judged bondmen and slaves to their cruell creditors, to weare out their Bodies in miserable servitude. And yet the worst of all was, the paine they put them to before they were so condemned: for they imprisoned them, set them on the rack, tormented them upon a little Brazen Horse, set them in the Stockes, made them stand naked in the greatest heate of Sommer, and on the Ice in the deepest of Winter, so as that bondage seemed unto them a reliefe of their miseries, and a rest of their torments. Lucullus found the Cities of ASIA full of such oppressions, but in a short time after he delivered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he tooke order, they should account for the usury that was payed monthly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly, he cut off all usuries that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor and usurer should enjoy the fourth part of the profits and revenues of his debtor. And he that joynd usury with the principall, that is to say, tooke usury upon usury, should lose the whole. So that by this order, all debts were payed in lesse then foure yeares, and the owners Lands and revenues set cleare of all manner payments. This surcharge of usuries, came of the twenty thousand Talents, wherein Syha had condemned the Countrey of ASIA: the which Summe they had payed twise before unto the Farmers and Collectors of the ROMANES, who had raised it, still heaping usury upon usury to the Summe of sixscore thousand Talents. Wherefore these Collectors and Farmers ranne to ROME, and cryed out upon Lucullus, saying, that he did them the greatest wrong that could be: and by means of Money, they procured certaine of the common Counsellors to speake against him: which they might easily doe, because they had divers of their Names in their Books that dealt in the affaires of the Commonwealth of ROME. But Lucullus was not onely beloved of those Countreys whom he did good unto, but was wished for and desired also of others, who thought the Countreys happy that might have such a Governour. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had sent before from TALURA unto King Tigranes in ARMENIA, and whose Sister at that time was Lucullus Wife: he first tooke certaine of the Kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high Countrey, making him fetch a great compassse about, by many daies journeyes spent in vaine: untill such time as one of his infranchized bondmen that was borne in SYRIA, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these Barbarous guides and leaving the wrong waies they had led him, within few daies past over the River of Euphrates, and arrived in the City of ANTIOCH, surnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commandement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the Countrey of PHOENICIA, where he subdued certaine Cities, and had some other yet to Conquer: Appius in the meane time wan secretly divers of the Princes and Noble-men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN King but for feare, by force, and against their wills, amongst whom was Zarbiemus, King of the Province of GORDIENA: and promised the aide of Lucullus also to many of the Cities that sent unto him (which had not long before bene subdued and brought into bandage) to whom nevertheless he gave in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once stir, nor alter alter any thing. For the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the Grecians, and specially the pride and arrogancy of the King. Who, by reason of his great prosperity, was growne to such pride and presumption, that whatsoever men did commonly esteeme best, and make most reckoning of, he would not onely have it, and use it as his owne, but also rooke it that all was made for himselfe whatsoever: and this great overweening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and favour towards him. For at the beginning he had but very little, and yet with this little (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great Nations, and plucked down the Power of the PERSIANS as much as any man that ever was before him. He replenished the Countrey of MESOPOTAMIA with Grecian Inhabitants, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabit there. He made the ARABIANS change their manner of living, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as Tent dwellers, because they are vagrant People that dwell in no other Houses but Tents, which they ever use to carry with them; and brought them out of their naturall Countrey, and made them follow him, using them for his commodity in trade of Merchandize. There were ever many Kings in his Court that waited on him: but amongst others, he had foure Kings that waited continually on his Person as his Footemen: for when he rode abroad any whether, they ranne by his stirrop in their shirts. And when he was set in his Chaire of State to give audience, they stood on their feete about his Chaire holding their hands together, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could doe unto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their liberty, and offered their Bodies unto their Lord and Master, more ready to suffer, then any thing to do. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this Tragical Pompe, when audience was given him, told King Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carry King Mithridates away with him, who was due to the Triumph of Lucullus: and therefore did summon him to deliver that King into his hands, or else that he proclaimed Warres upon himselfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well enough, that Tigranes (although he set a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quick, and lit at the heart. For Tigranes having reigned (or to say better, Tyrannically governed) five and twenty yeares space, had never heard any bold or franke speech but that. Notwithstanding, he answered Appius, that he would not deliver Mithridates, and if the ROMANES made Warres with him, that he would defend himselfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his Letters gave him not the Title, King of Kings, but onely King simply: in the Letters he wrote back to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Capitaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leave, he sent him goodly rich Presents, which he refused. Whereupon the King sent others againe unto him, of the which Appius tooke a Cup onely, because the King should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest againe unto him, made great haste to returne to his Capitaine Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once see King Mithridates his so neare kinsman, who by fortune of Warres had lost so puissant and great a Kingdom, but proudly kept him under, in Fenny Marish and unwholsome Grounds, without any Honour given unto him, as if he had beene a very Prisoner indeed: howbeit then he sent for him honourably, and received him with great courtesie. When they were neare together in the Kings Pallace, they talked secretly one with another, and excusing themselves, clearing all suspitions conceived betweene them, to the great hurt of their Servants and Friends, whom they burthened with all the occasion of unkindnesse betweene them: amongst which number Metrodorus the SCYTHIAN was one, a man excellently well Learned, Eloquent in speech, and one whom Mithridates so much loved and esteemed, that they called him the Kings Father. Mithridates at the beginning of his Warres had sent him Ambassadour unto Tigranes, to pray aid of him against the ROMANES. At which time Tigranes said unto him: but what sayest thou to it Metrodorus: what advice wilt thou give me? Metrodorus either because he had regard unto Tigranes profit, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him again: As Ambassadour, O King, I would wish you should doe it: but as a Counsellour, that you should not do it. Tigranes now reported this speech unto Mithridates, not thinking he would have hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he presently put him to death upon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily sorry, and repented him greatly to have told him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, having but onely revived Mithridates evill will before conceived against him: for he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret Papers and Writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his Body honourably, sparing no cost at all unto the dead Body of him, whom living he had betrayed. There died in King Tigranes Court also an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deserve that mention should be made of him, for the City of ATHENS sake wherein he was borne: for it is said, that he was banished out of his Countrey, he fled into the City of SELEUCIA, which standeth upon the River of Tigris. When the Inhabitants of the same praised him to teach them the Art of Eloquence in their Countrey, he would not vouchsafe it, but answered them proudly: that a Platter was too little to hold a Dolphin in; meaning that their City was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went unto Cleopatra, Mithridates Daughter, and King Tigranes Wife; where he was quickly suspected and accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieved him so much that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honourably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neare unto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that Countrey. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in ASIA, and had established good Lawes among them, he was not carelesse also of Games, Feasts, Wrestlinges, and Fence-plays at the sharpe for joy of his Victory, delighting all the Cities of ASIA with them; the which in recompence thereof did institute a solomne Feast also in the Honour of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great joy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the Honour they could devise to give him. But after that Appian Clodius was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Lucullus that he must make Warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went back againe unto the Realme of PONTUS, where he tooke his Army which he had left in Garrison, and brought it before the City of SINOPE to lay Siege unto it, or rather to besiege certaine CILICIANs that were gotten into the City in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they saw Lucullus come against them, they slew a great number of the Citizens, and setting fire on the City, fled their way by night. Lucullus being advertised of it, entred the City, put eight thousand of the CILICIANs to the sword which he found there, and restored the naturall Citizens and Inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserve the City, was this Vision he had. He thought in his nights Dreame that one came to him, and said: go a little further Lucullus, for Antolycus cometh, who is desirous to speake with thee. This Dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the Vision meant. It was the selfe same day on the which he tooke the City of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANs that escaped by flying, he found an Image lying on the ground upon the Sea side, which the CILICIANs would have carried away: but they were taken and followed so neare, that they had no leisure to ship it. This Statue (as it is reported) was one of the goodliest and notablest Workes of Sydenes the Image graver. And some say it was the Image of Antolycus, who Founded the City of SINOPE. For Antolycus was one of the Princes that went out of THESSALY with Hercules to go against the AMAZONS, and he was the Sonne of Demachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the Ship in the which Antolycus was imbarked, with Demolou and Phlogius, made Shipwracke upon a Rocke of the Coast of CHERONEUS, where she was cast away: howbeit that he and his men escaping with all their Furniture, came to the City of SINOPE, which he tooke from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they say) of one Syrus the Son of Apollo, and of the Nymph Sinope Afopus Daughter. Lucullus understanding this matter, called a saying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his Commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may give more credit unto, then that which is signified to us by Dreames. In the meane season he was advertised that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come down into LYCAONIA and CILICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus marvelled much at Tigranes Councell, that sithence he was minded to Warre with the ROMANES, he did not use Mithridates aid in his Wars at such time, as when he was in his best strength and force: and that he did not then joyne his Power with Mithridates, rather then suffer him to be destroyed and overthrowne, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new Warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselves. While these things passed in this sort, Mithridates King Mithridates Sonne, that kept the Realme of BOSPHORUS, sent a Crowne of Gold unto Lucullus, of the weight of a thousand Crownes, praying him that he would name him a Friend and confederate of the ROMANES. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first Warre, and leaving Sornatinus with six thousand men to keepe the Realme of PONTUS, he departed with twelve thousand Footmen, and lesse then three thousand Horsemen, to go to the second Warre. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him, to goe with so small a company to fight with so many Warlike Nations, and to put himselfe unto the hazard of so many thousands of Horsemen, in a marvellous large Countrey, and of a wonderfull length, environed round about with deepe Rivers and Mountaines, covered with Snow all the yeare through: so that his Souldiers, which otherwise were no speciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an evil will, and did stubbornly disobey him. And on the other side, the Common-Councillors at ROBE cryed out on him continually, and openly protested before all the People, that out of one Warre he sowed another, which the Common-wealth had nothing to doe withall; and that he looked after none other thing but still to raise new occasions of Warres, to the end he might alwaies have Armies at his commandement, and never leave the Warres, because he would make himselfe great with the Cost and perill of the Common-wealth. These crying Councillers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his Army with all the possible speed he could, so that he came in few daies unto the River of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough, by reason of the Winter season: which troubled him marvellously at that present, doubting lest it would hold him there a long time in finding out of Boats, and making of Posts and Plancks to build a Bridge to passe over his Army. But towards night the water began to fall a little, and in the night fell so much, that the next morning the River was come to her ordinary fream: and moreover the Countrey-men themselves discerning certaine little Islands that appeared unto them in the midst of the Water-courfe, and the River Lucullus came to the River of Euphrates, and found it very high and rough. The strange and sudden fall of the River of Euphrates from her great swelling.

River very calme as a Marsh round about them, did Honour Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing they had never seene chance before: as though at his coming the River had suddenly yeilded unto him, and was become gentle to give him safe and easie passage. And because he would not lose that opportunity, he passed over his Army immediately: and was no sooner on the other side, but he met with a happy token of good luck, which was this. On the other side of the River, there was a certaine number of Kine consecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous People inhabiting beyond the River of Euphrates, do reverence and honour above all the other gods: and these Kine they employ to none other use, but only to Sacrifice them unto this goddesse. They wander all about the Countrey where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling otherwise, having onely the marke of the goddesse, which is, a Lampe printed upon their Bodies, and they are not easie to be taken when one would have them, but with great ado. One of these consecrated Kine, after that Lucullus Army was passed over Euphrates, came to offer her selfe upon a Rocke which they suppose is Hallowed or Dedicated unto this goddesse, bowing down her head, and stretching out her neck, like those that are tyed short, as if she had come even of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as she was. And besides her, he sacrificed a Bull also unto the River of Euphrates, in token of thanks for his safe passage over. Lucullus the first day did nothing but incampe himselfe onely, on the other side of the River: but the next morning and the other daies following, he went further into the Countrey by the River of SOPHENE, hurting none that came and yeilded unto him, or that willingly received his Army. For when his men would have had him to have taken a Castle by force, where they said was great store of Gold and Silver, he shewed them Mount Taurus as farre off, and told them, it is that which he must rather go to take: as for the things which be in this Castle, they be kept for them that vanquish. And going on still with great Joyneys, passed over the River of Tigris, and so entred the Realme of ARMENIA with a maine Army. Now for Tigranes, the first man that ventured to bring him Newes of Lucullus coming, had no joy of it: for he cut off his head for his labour. And therefore from thenceforth there durst no man say any thing unto him, untill such time as he was at the last environed round with fire, which Lucullus Army had raised about him, before he could hear any thing thereof. For he was sporting and gauding with his Familiars, hearing their flattering Tales, that Lucullus indeed were a Noble Captaine, it he durst but tarry Tigranes coming down in the City of ERPHUS onely, and how he would straight flie out of ASIA, so soon as he might but hear tell of his coming against him, with so Triumphant an Army, of so many thousand men. And thus may we see, that like as all Bodies and braines, are not alike strong nor able to carry much Wine: so in like case, all Wits be not resolute and constant, never to do amisse, nor to swarve from reasons bounds in great prosperity. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes Familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the truth: whose boldnesse had little better reward for his Newes then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediately with three thousand Horse, and a good number of Footmen, commanding him that he should bring Lucullus alive unto him, and that furthermore, he should march upon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus already camped with part of his Army, and the other part coming after, when his Skoutes brought him Newes of the barbarous Captaines approach: which at the first put him in feare, that if the Enemy should come and assaile them thus scattered in Companies, and not ranged in Battell and ready to fight, he might overthrow them while they were in disorder. And therefore he remained within his Campe to fortifie the same, and sent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thousand six hundred Horse, and as many Footmen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commanding him to approach as near to his Enemy as he could without fighting, onely to stay him there, untill such time as he heard Newes that all his Army was come together into his Campe. Sextilius went to doe his commandement, but he was compelled to fight, (though against his will) Mithrobarzanes came so bravely and lustily to assaile him. So was the Battell stricken betweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was slaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying saved themselves. After this overthrow Tigranes forsooke his great Royall City of TIGRANOCERTA that he built himselfe, and went to Mount Taurus, where he Assembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would give him no leisure to prepare himselfe, but sent Murena on the one side to cut them off by the way, and to overthrow those that were Assembled about him: and on the other side Sextilius to stop a great company of the ARABIANs that were coming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius set upon as they were ready to lodge, and overthrow them in manner every man. And Murena following King Tigranes at the heeles, spied an occasion to give the Charge as he passed along a narrow Valley, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and specially for an Army of such length: and taking the opportunity, set upon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiving, fled straight upon it, making all his Carriage to be thrown down in the way before the Enemies to stay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANs slaine in this overthrow, and many of those things having this successe, Lucullus went to the City of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he besieged round. In that City were a marvellous number of GRECIANs that had been brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous People also whom they had used in the like forcible manner, as they had done the ADIABENIANs, the ASSYRIANs, the GORDIANIANs, and the CAPADOCIANs, whose Townes and Cities Tigranes had destroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabit there. By reason whereof, this City of TIGRANOCERTA was full of Gold and Silver, of Metals, Statues, Tables and Pictures, because every man (as well private, as Princes and Lords) studied to please the King, to enrich and beautifie this City with all kinds of Furniture and Ornaments fit for the same. And hereupon Lucullus straightened the Siege as much as he could, perswading himselfe that Tigranes would never suffer that it should be taken, but (though he had otherwise determined) yet for very anger would present him battell, thereby to enforce him to raise his Siege. And surely he guessed right, had it not been that Mithridates had dissuaded him by expresse Letters and Messengers that he should in no case hazard Battell, and perswaded him rather to cut off the Victuals on all sides from the ROMANES with his Horsemen. The selfe same councill and advice did Taxiles (the Captain whom Mithridates sent) give him in his Campe, and prayed him very earnestly, that he would not prove the invincible force of the ROMANES. Tigranes patiently hearkened to their reasons at the first; but when the ARMENIANS were come, and all the force of the Countrey beside, and the GORDIENIANS, and that the Kings of the MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were come also with all their Power, and that on the other side there came a marvellous great Host of the ARABIANS that dwell upon the Sea of BABYLON, and a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN Sea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbours, besides a great company of free People living without a King, that dwell by the River of Araxes, some coming freely to do him pleasure, other for their Pensions and Pay which he gave them: then was there none other talk neither at his Table, nor in Councell, but of assured hope of Victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, so that Taxiles was in great danger of himselfe, because he was against the determination taken in Councell for giving of the Battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did envy the Glory of King Tigranes, and therefore did thus dissuade him from Battell. For which respect Tigranes would not so much as tarry for him, and because also Mithridates should have no part of the Honour of his Victory: but went into the Field with all his great Army, vaunting amongst his Familiars as they report, that nothing grieved him but one, that he should fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all other ROMANES Captaines. Now this bravery was not so fond, nor so far out of square, but that there was great likelihood of it when he saw so many sundry Nations about him, so many Kings that followed him, so many Battels of armed Footmen, and so many thousands of Horsemen. For he had in his Army of Bow-men and Slings onely, twenty thousand: five and fifty thousand Horsemen, whereof seventeen thousand men of Armes armed from top to toe, as Lucullus himselfe wrote unto the Senate: and an hundred and fifty thousand armed Footmen, divided by Ensignes and Squadrons: of Pyoners, Carpenters, Mafons, and such other kinde of handicrafts men, to plaine waies, to make Bridges to passe over Rivers, to stop Streames, to cut Wood, and to make such kinde of Workes; of this sort of People, the number of five and thirty thousand, who followed in Battell ray in the reeward of the Army, making their Campe seeme far greater, and by so much the more stronger. When Tigranes shewed on the top of Mount Taurus, and that they might plainly see his whole Army from the City, and that himselfe also might easily discern Lucullus Army that besieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous People that werewithin the City were so glad of this sight, that they made wonderfull shoutes of joy, and great clapping of hands, threatening the ROMANES from their Walls, and shewing them the Army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time fate in Councell to consider what was to be done: where in some were of opinion that he should raise his Siege, and go with his whole Army undivided against Tigranes. But others liked not that he should leave so great a number of Enemies at his backe, neither that he should raise his Siege. Lucullus made them answer, that neither of them both did counsell him well, but both together did counsell right. Whereupon he divided his Army, and left Murana at the Siege of TIGRANOCERTA with six thousand men: and he with foure and twenty Cohorts (in the which were not above ten thousand armed Footmen) and all his Horsemen, with a thousand Bow-men and Slings, or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad Field by the Rivers side. The ROMANES seemed but a handfull to Tigranes Campe, so that for a while Tigranes Parasites made but a May-game of them to sport withall. For some laughed them to scorne, other drew Lots, and played away their part of the Spoyle, as if they had already wonne the Field: and every one of the Kings and Captaines came and offered themselves to Tigranes, and besought him every man for himselfe, that he would give him the Honour alone to leade his Battell, and that it would please him to sit by in some place to see the sport. Tigranes then, because he would shew that he could be as pleasant as the rest, spake a thing known to every man: If they come as Ambassadors (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as Enemies, they be but few. And thus they played upon the ROMANES, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the Field, and put them in order of Battell. Now the Campe of the barbarous People lay on the other side of the River toward the East, and by chance the Streame of the River turned sodainly towards the West, where there was a better Foord to passe over. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his Army by the Rivers side, following the Streame to meete with some Foord, casting to get over, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and said unto him, laughing: Doeest thou see Taxiles those goodly ROMANES Legions, whom thou praist to be men so invincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles answered the King again: I would your good Fortune (O King) might worke some maracle this day: for doubtlesse it were a strange thing that the ROMANES should flie. They are not wont to wear their brave Coates and Furniture upon their Armour, when they meane onely but to march in the Fields. neither do they they carry their shields and targets uncased, nor their burgenets bare on their heads, as they doe at this present, having throwne away their leather cases and coverings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we see so bright and glistering in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they march towards us. Taxiles had no sooner spoken these words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his Ensigne-bearer turn suddainly that carried the first Eagle, and the bands took their places to passe the river in order of battell. Then Tigranes secretly come to himselfe, as out of drunkenesse, cryed out aloud twice or thrice, Come they then to us? But then was there no small stirre and tumult, to put such a world of people in battell. The King Tigranes himselfe undertooke to leade the middle battell, gave the left wing unto the King of the ADIABENIANS, and the right unto the King of the MEDES: in the which were the most part of the compleate armed men, who made the first front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to passe the River, there were certaine of his Captains that came unto him, to wish him to take heed that he fought not that day, because it was one of those which the ROMANES thought unfortunate, and call them Atri, as to say, blacke: for upon one of those dayes, one Cepio was overthrowen in a let battell with all his Army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gave them a pretty answer againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (said he) for the ROMANES. It was the sixteenth day of the month of October. And so with those words encouraging his men, passed over the River, and went himselfe the foremost man, and marched directly towards his enemy, armed with an Anima of Steele, made with scallop shels, shining like the Sunne, and upon that an arming coate fringed round about holding his sword drawn in his hand: to let his men understand, that they they must suddainly joyn with their enemies, and fight at the swords point that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with shot and slings, and that he would so quickly winne the distance of ground they had to march ere they could joyn, that they should have no leisure to shoot. And furthermore, perceiving that the strength of their men of Armes (whereof they made so great account) was ranged in battell under a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and even, and the way up the hill not passing foure furlongs travell, and not very hard nor steep to climbe: he sent thither certain horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAULES which he had in pay, and commanded them to give a charge on the flankes to disorder them, and assaie to cut their haunces with their swords. For all the strength of these men of Armes consisteth in their haunces and they can do nothing of themselves, nor against their enemies, they are so heavily armed and laden: so as it seemeth they are locked up in their Armour, as in an iron prison. And he himselfe therewithall taking two Ensignes of footmen, strove also to gaine the top of the hill: his souldiers following him hard at the heels with a notable courage, because they saw him the foremost man travelling on foot, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten up to the top, he stayed a little in the highest place he could finde, and cryed out with a loud voice: O companions, the victory is ours. And as he spake those words, he led them against these men of Armes, commanding them they should not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their swords in their hands they should strike at their thighs and legges, because they have no other parts of their bodies naked. Howbeit, there was no need of such fight, for they carried not the ROMANES, but with great crying out turned their horse heads immediately, and ran cowardly (themselves and their horses, heavy armed as they were) through the midst of the bands of their footmen, before they had stricken one stroke. And thus were so many thousand of men broken without any stroke stricken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of blood seen to be spilt. But the great slaughter was when they began to flie, or (to say better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ran so one upon anothers neck, by reason of the marvellous length and breadth of their battels. Tigranes, amongst the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, and seeing his son running the same fortune, flying as himselfe did, took off his Diademe or royal band from his head, and it gave him weeping, commanding him to save himselfe as well as he could by some other way. But the young Prince durst not put it on his head, but gave it to one of his trusty servants to keep, who by chance was taken and brought unto Lucullus: so that amongst the other spoile and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes Diadem. It is thought that there were slaine at this overthrow, above an hundred thousand footmen, and very few of all the horsemen saved. On the ROMANES side, there were about an hundred hurt, and five slaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a Treatise he made of the gods; writeth that the Sunne never saw the like overthrow. And Strabo another Philosopher in a certaine abridgement he made of stories, said, that the ROMANES were ashamed and laughed at themselves, that they had drawne their swords against such dastardly slaves. And Titus Livius declareth also, that the ROMANES were never in any battell with so small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in all the world the twentieth part (nothing like) of those that were overcome. Wherefore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the ROMANES did highly commend Lucullus, because he had overcome two of the greatest and most mighty Princes of the world, by two sundry contrary meanes: the one by tract and delay, and the other by speed and swiftnesse. For he undetermined and consumed Mithridates by holding backe and delaying; at that time when all his strength was whole: and to the contrary he destroyed Tigranes with great speed and hast. And thus did he that which few Captaines could ever do: that is, used delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to winne the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no haste to come to the battell, thinking still that Lucullus had used his wonted pollice, to delay and give backe alwayes: and therefore he came by small journeyes unto Tigranes Campe. But meeting at the first with a few of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his way, like men that had been frayed, he straight mistrusted the overthrow: but afterwards meeting greater Troopes of them naked, and fore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to seek out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forsaken of his men, and in very poor estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in adversity with that pride and disdain he had used him before in his misery: but lighted off his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gave him all his Officers, and traine of a Kings Court, that followed him to serve him, comforting him, and exhorting him to pluck up his heart againe, and to be courageous thenceforth. Hereupon they both leaved afresh the whole force and power they could from all the parts of their Dominion. In the mean season, there fell out great sedition in the City of TIGRANOCERTA, between the GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would have yeelded up the Town into Lucullus hands. Whereupon Lucullus giving an assult to the City at that very instant, won it, and seized upon the Kings treasure there, leaving all the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gave of the spoile that was won upon the enemies, eight hundred Drachmaes unto every souldier. And understanding that there were divers Musicians, common players, Minstrels, and such kinde of people meet for feasts and sport, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all parts, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this City: he caused all them to serve at the sports and feasts of this Victory. After the solemnization whereof, he sent the GRECIANS home againe unto their Countrey, and gave them money to defray their charges by the way, and the Barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their native Countries. And so it fortun'd, that by the desolation and destruction of City forsaken, many others were built againe, and stored with people: because those Cities had thereby recovered their naturall inhabitants againe, who ever after did love and honour Lucullus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also according to his vertue and merits. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of justice, and of clemency, then that that came by force of martiall prowesse and Chivalry. For in deeds of Armes, he said his Army partly deserved praise, and fortune also carried the best part away: but the praise of the other, was onely due unto himselfe. Whereby he shewed the valour of an excellent good man, well taught and trained up in vertue: and so reaped the fruit of his worthy deserts. For by those good parts, he wan the hearts of the Barbarous people in such sort, that the Kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themselves and their goods into his hands. So did the Nation of SOPHENIANS also yeeld themselves unto him. The GORDIENIANS, in like manner, they liked Lucullus so well, that they would willingly have forsaken their Cities, houses and Countrey, to follow him with their wives and children, upon this occasion: Zarbius King of these GORDIENIANS, as we have recited before, had privily entered amity with Lucullus, by means of Appius Claudius, who could no longer away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed unto Tigranes, who put Zarbius, his wife and children to death, before the ROMANES maine Army came into the Countrey of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but passing through this Realme, gave him very royall funerals: for having heaped up a huge pile of Wood, sumptuously set out with cloth of Gold and Silver, and other rich spoiles of Tigranes: he himselfe in person would needs set it on fire, and made the funeral effusions and accustomed sprinklings at funerals, with his friends and kinsmen, doing him this honour, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMANE people, and appointed also a great sum of money besides to erect a sumptuous Tombe for him. For they found great store of Gold and Silver in the Kings Castle, and there was plenty of provision also of 300000 bushels of Wheate: the which did enrich his souldiers marvellously, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that having received not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at ROME, he notwithstanding made the war entertain it self. About the same time also, the King of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors unto him, to offer him friendship and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambassadors to him also of acceptance, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the King of the PARTHIANS stood doubtful how to resolve which part he would take, and that secretly he sent unto Tigranes, to aske the Realme of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aide him against the ROMANES. Lucullus being truly enformed of the King of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leave Tigranes and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied and overcome, and a little to prove the force and power of the PARTHIANS by making warres upon them, thinking it great honour unto him, if he might discomfit and overthrow three so mighty Kings, one after another, like a valiant conquerour that had overcome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the Countries of three of the greatest Princes under the Sunne, alwayes a conquerour, and never conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediately unto Sornatius and other of his Captaines which he had left to keep the Realme of PONTUS, that they should repair to him with all speed with the bands they had under their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the Countrey of GORDIENIA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenants that had many times before found their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commandments, knew plainly then their cankred stomackes, and incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or persuasions they could use: but contrarily they cried out, and told him plainly, that they would no longer tarry where they were, but would go home to their Countrey, and leave the Realme of PONTUS without guard or garrison at all. And further, that worst of all was, when these news were brought to Lucullus Campe, they gave a full example of boldnesse to his souldiers there, to mutine mutine in like sort, having good will and disposition thereunto of themselves before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with finenesse, were become so dull and lazy, that they could endure no paines nor hardnesse of warres, but desired to live in all idlenesse and ease. And hearing the report of their fellows stoutnesse, called them lusty laddes, saying, they must needs take the like course, and do as they taught them, vinting of their good service of long time done, which well deserved leave now to depart home with safety, and thenceforth take their rest. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, and many other their words, worse and fuller of sedition then these, brake off his enterprize against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the midst of Summer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieved him to see the fields so full of wheat yet standing, which came by the season of the year, and coldnesse of the aire, being so slack and flow in all those parts. Nevertheless, he come down into the vally, and at two or three skirmishes overthrow the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his coming downe: and ran over all the valley, and destroyed the whole Countrey without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the provision of necessity of victuals which himselfe feared, and yet ceased not to provoke them (by all other means) to come to battell: sometime inclosing their Campe with trenches about, as if he meant to famish them: sometime againe destroying and spoiling the whole Countrey before their face. But because they had so oft been discomfited, they would no more stir, nor once move against him. Lucullus perceiving that, in the end raised his Campe, and went and laid siege unto ARTAXATA, the chief City of the Kingdome of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull Wives and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battell, then suffer that City to be lost. It is said, that Hannibal of CARTHAGE (after King Antiochus was overthrowne in battell by the ROMANES) went unto King Artaxates, whom he taught many necessary and profitable things for his Realme, and amongst others, considering that one of the goodliest and pleasantest places of all his Kingdome lay waste and no reckoning made of it, drew a plot of a City, brought the King thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The King liked his device marvellous well, and prayed him to take the charge upon him to see the work finished. And thus was this noble and famous City built, and called after the Kings name, ARTAXATA: and held ever after the reputation of the chiefe place of the whole Realm of ARMENIA. Tigranes being advertised that Lucullus went to lay siege therunto, could not endure it, but went with all his Army to follow the ROMANES, and the fourth day came and Camped hard by them: in such sort as there was but the River of Arsanias between them, which the ROMANES of necessity must pass over to go to ARTAXATA. Lucullus having first sacrificed unto the gods, assuring himself of the victory, as if he had it already in his hands, made his Army passe over in order of battell, putting twelve Cohorts in the front, and the other behind, fearing lest the enemies having a great number of men of armes should environ them at their backs. They had against them also the MARDIAN bowmen on horseback, and the IBERIANS with their Lances, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best souldiers he had in pay: and yet for all that they did no notable service. For when they had skirmished but a little with the horsemen of the ROMANES, they durst not tarry the legionaries or footbands that came behind them, but dispersed themselves, some flying one way, some another, which inticed the ROMANE horsemen to follow the chase. But when the men of Armes that were about Tigranes person, saw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to break upon the footmen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afraid thereof: sent in halt to call in his horsemen that followed the chase, and in the meane time himselfe marched foremost, against these Lords and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the Nobility of their hoast, whom he put in such a fear, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three Kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly was Mithridates King of PONTUS, who had not the heart so much as to abide the cries of the ROMANES. The chase was very long: for it continued all night, untill such time as the ROMANES were wearied with killing, taking of prisoners, and packing up of all kinds of spoiles. Titus Livius saith, that there were flaine more men in the first battell, but greater personages in the second: and the chief of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus heart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the Countrey, even utterly to destroy this barbarous King. But in the time of the equinoctiall Autumne (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that season have thought) there fell out so great a cold, that for the most part, it did nothing but snow: and if the element did any thing cleare, then froze it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the Rivers were so extreemly congealed with ice. And there could no man passe over by foord: for they did not so soone enter, but the ice brake and cut the veines and sinewes of the horse legs asunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the Countrey being full of Trees, Woods and Forrests, and the wayes very narrow, not being able to passe by the fields, they were through wet with snow that fell upon them: and when they came to their lodging, then it was worse; for there they were constrained to lye in soft and moist places. And therefore the souldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refused to go any farther. And first they sent their Colonels and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leave off this journey. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in Troopes, and in the night time began to murmure and groine in their Tents (which is a certaine signe and token of a mutinous Army, that hath a mind to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus used all gen-

the persuasions to win them with patience to abide this journey, at the least, till time they might take the City of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there destroy the work and memory of the greatest enemy that ever the ROMANS had in the world, meaning Hannibal. But when he saw all this would not prevail, he brought them back again, and passed over mount Taurus another way, and came down into the Country called MYGDONIA, a very hot and fertile soile, where there is a great City, and marvellously replenished with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GREECIANS call it ANTIOCH of MYGDONIA. In that City Gonras was Governour, who was Tigranes owne brother: but for experience in Engines of battery, and for sufficiency and skill in such matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so marvellously troubled Lucullus before at the siege of the City of AMISUS. Lucullus placing his Campe before this City besieged the same by all such means as might enforce it, and that so valiantly, that in very short time he took it by assault.
And as for Gonras, who submitted himselfe to Lucullus mercy, he was very curteously intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once hear him speak, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would save his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but himself only. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gyves to receive the punishment he had justly deserved, for setting the City of AMISUS on fire, and taking from him the means to shew the GREECIANS his goodnes, affection and liberality towards them. Untill this present time, it might be truly said, that good fortune ever favoured and followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affairs: but from that time forwards, it was quickly seen that the favourable blast of fortune failed him, he did
but from that time forwards, it was quickly seen that the favourable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great pain, and all that he did, fell out contrary unto him, and to very ill purpose.
Indeed he did ever shew the valiancy, patience, and great courage that should be in a valiant Generall, or Lieutenant of an Army. But his exploits and doings had never after, that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to have: but to the contrary, he was like to have lost all that he had won before, through the misfortunes that fell upon him, and for the bralles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose. But the worst was, that they made himselfe the only Author of all these evils: because he could not, or would not entertaine the good-will of the multitude of his souldiers: thinking that whatsoever a Generall, or any other Officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath under his charge, is to dishonour himselfe, and to give cause unto his souldiers to despise his authority. But that which made most against him was this: that he gave no estimation to Gentlemen, and men of like quality to himselfe, but disdaind them, and thought them unworthy to become with him. For these they say were his faults and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted no virtues, nor generall gifts and good conditions that could be possibly wished for or desired. For he was a tall Gentleman, of goodly prence, well spoken, wise and discrete, as well in matters of governement, as in warres: and as well to persuade the people in peace, as to encourage his souldiers in warre. Salust writeth of him, that his souldiers began to mislike with him, even from the first entry into these warres, because he made them lie out two Winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the City of CIZICUS, and the other before the City of AMISUS. And even as much did the other Winters following vex and trouble them: for either they lay in their enemies Country, or else if they lay in their friends, yet he made them Campe abroad in the field, and throw themselves in their Tents: for Lucullus never entred with his Army into any City or confederate Town of GREECE. Now if the souldiers of themselves misliked Lucullus, the Orators at ROME that were his enemies, and envied his prosperity and glory, gave them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they continually accused him to the people in their Orations, that he drew out his warre in length, purposely because he would always have occasion to rule, and means to get, having in his hands in manner all CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTUS, ARMENIA, and all the Provinces and Regions as far as to the River of Phafis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the Princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had been sent thither onely to sack and spoile, and not to destroy and overcome those Kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintus, one of the Prætors that spake these words. It was he also that most moved the people to take order that Lucullus should be called home, and other sent to succeed him in the charge and Government of the Countries he had subdued. By the self same mean it was also ordained, that divers which were under his charge, should be dispenced withall for their Oathes, and licensed to leave the warres when they thought good. But besides these and such like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that most overthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other evils being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, and a harebrained man. He was Lucullus wives brother, and she was so light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinency with her. This Clodius being at that time in Lucullus Campe, carried not that estimation and credit he thought himselfe worthy of. For he took himself equal with the best, and would needs have been holden for chiefe: when indeed there were many of far better desert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he began for spite to suborne the band called FIMBRIANS, and to stirre them up against Lucullus, sowing sweet and pleasant words amongst the souldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked still to be flattered.
For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consul Flaccus, and chuse him in his stead for their Capitaine. By reason whereof they gave good eare to Clodius words, and called him a Noble Capitaine, and a lover of souldiers. For when he spake unto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should never see an end of their great paines and warres, but should miserably consume their dayes in fighting continually, sometime with one Nation, and some-sometime with another: and that they wandred through all the Countries of the world, receiving no worthy reward of so long and painful service, serving onely to guard Lucullus Carts and Campels laden with plate and vessels of gold and silver, and other precious stones. Where the souldiers that had served under Pompey, took now their ease at home in their Country with the wives and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire Cities, as rich Burgeses and wealthy Citizens: and yet they had not driven Mithridates and Tigranes out of their Kingdomes, into desert places un-habitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of ASIA, but onely made a little warre in SPAIN against those that were banished, and in ITALIE against fugitive slaves. Shall we then, said he, carry harnesse on our backs all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped untill this present, reserve our selves, our bodies and lives for that noble Capitaine, who esteemeth the greatest honour and glory he can achieve unto, is to make his souldiers rich that serve under him?

Lucullus Army was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against Tigranes, nor against Mithridates who went presently out of ARMENIA into his Realme of PONTUS, and began to conquer it again, whilst the ROMANE souldiers mutining against their General, remained idle in the Province of GORDIENE, excusing themselves by the Winter season, and tarrying untill Pompey or some other Capitaine should quickly come to raise the siege, and succed Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they understood that Mithridates had overthrown Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went against Sornatius and Triarius: they were then ashamed of themselves, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a bravery, when he heard that Lucullus drew near, made hast to win the victory, as if it had been cock-sure before Lucullus came, and was himself overthrowne in a great battell, where some say there died above seven thousand ROMANS, amongst the which were a hundred and fifty Centurions, and twenty four Captaines or Colonels of a thousand men apiece, and yet besides, Mithridates took their Campe also. Shortly after this overthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the souldiers fought in their anger by all the means they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proved sundry means to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once stirre abroad, because he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereupon he determined againe to go against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he joyned forces together. But as he was in his journey towards him, the FIMBRIAN souldiers began to rebell anew, and would not follow his Ensignes, saying, and alledging for themselves, that by decree of the people they had leave to depart, and were discharged from their oath: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more ado to command them, considering that the Government of the Provinces which he had, was given unto others. Lucullus perceiving this, did so humble himselfe unto them, supposing that way to win them, as there was no kind of uncomely humility, but he submitted himselfe unto it: inso much as he went into their Tents to pray and intreate them one after another, with water in his eyes, and with so great lowlinesse, as even to shake hands with them. But they fiercely rejected all his courtesies and faire intreaties, casting their pennies purses before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone; since he had with the spoile of them all so well enriched himselfe alone. Nevertheless, at the intercession and earnest request of the other souldiers, these FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promise, that they would yet tarry all that Sommer, so that if no man in the mean time offered them battell, at the end of the terme they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or else to remaine alone, and consequently to forsake the Country of the Barbarous people. With much ado thus he kept them together, but in such sort, as he durst no more venture to compell them to come to battell, contenting himselfe that they were willing onely to stay with him, being forced to suffer Tigranes in the meane time to destroy and over-runne the Country of CAPPADOCIA, and Mithridates also to brag againe, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had utterly overcome him: inso much as there came Commissioners and Deputies from ROME by his own procurement, to order the state of the Realme of PONTUS with him, as of a Kingdome already won to the ROMANE Empire. But when they were come, they found him not master of himselfe, and that his own souldiers scouted him, and did him all the spite and injury they could. For they were so unruly towards their Capitaine, and did so much disdain him, that when the end of Sommer was come, they Armed themselves with Armour and weapon, and drawing out their swords in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the field: and after they had made the noise and cries accustomed when they joy-ned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling and swinging their swords in the aire, they went from the Campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promised Lucul-lus to tarry. On the other side, Pompey had written unto the other souldiers that were yet in Campe, to come unto him: for through the peoples favour at ROME, the practises and flatteries of the Common-Councillers there, he was substituted Generall in Lucullus place: which much misliked the Senate and Nobility, for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to have a successor sent, not to succeed him in troubles and dangers, but in glory and honour of triumph. And that they should compell him not onely to resigne up the Office of a Generall to another, but (for the good service he long time had done) the reward of his honour due for the same: and this also more misliked them that were then about him. That so soon as Pompey was arrived in ASIA, he took all power and authority from Lucullus, to punish or reward any man for good or ill service done to the Commonwealth in those warres; and did moreover prohibite by publike Billes set up in every common place, that they should no more repaire unto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten

Commiſſioners ſent to diſpoſe of the ſtate of the Provinces wonne by him, ſhould command or ordaine: and becauſe Pompey came with a greater power and Army then his, he was in ſome feare of him. Their friends thought good nevertheleſſe they ſhould meet together: and ſo they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at the firſt meeting they ſaluted each other very courteouſly, rejoycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of great dignity, becauſe he had been General of the ROMANE people in many warres, and had already triumphed twice. The bundels of Roddes which the Seagants carried before them, were wreathed about with Laurell branches for the victories they had both achieved: but Pompey's bundels were withered away, becauſe they had come a long journey through hot and dry Countries. Lucullus Officers ſeeing theirs withered, courteouſly gave them of theirs freſh and new gathered: which Pompey's friends tooke for a ſigne of good lucke. For to ſay truly, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cauſe of the honour that Pompey afterwards wan. Howbeit in the end, for all their talk, they were no whit the better friends: but departed the one from the other more ſtrange then they met. For Pompey by a plain Edict, brake, revoked and diſannulled all Lucullus Ordinances, and taking from him all his other ſouldiers, left him but only ſixteen hundred to accompany his Triumph, and yet they followed him with unwilling minds: ſuch was Lucullus imperfection and maime, either by nature or frowardneſſe of fortune, that he lacked the chieffeſt thing a Generall ſhould have, which was, to be beloved of his ſouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongſt many other his excellent virtues, magnanimity and wiſdome, judgement and juſtice, the River of Euphrates had not been the utmoſt confines of the Empire of ROME ON ASIA ſide, but it had extended as far as the ſea Hyrcane, yea even unto the utmoſt part of the world. For King Tigranes had already conquered the other Nations that lie beyond that, ſaving the Country of PARTHIA, which then was not ſo great nor ſtrong, as it appeared afterwards in Craſſus time: nor ſo joynt and knit together, but (what through civill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and ſorraine warres of their neighbours abroad) was ſo weak, that with great difficulty they could defend themſelves from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their ſkins. But to take things rightly as they be indeed, me thinks that Lucullus did more hurt unto his Country by other, then he did benefit the ſame by himſelfe. For taken of triumph and victories which he wan in ARMENIA ſo neare unto the PRTHIANS, the Cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIABIS, which he had ſacked and ſpoiled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe alſo of Tigranes, which was ſhewed in triumph as a priſoner with the reſt: moved Craſſus with ſuch a marvellous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had been nothing but an aſſured ſpoile, and a prey expoſed unto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus far otherwiſe finding himſelfe gauled and troubled with the Arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by prooffe, that Lucullus had not ſo much overcome his enemies for that they wanted ſkill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſdome and valiantneſſe. But that ſhall be ſeen hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marcus accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his Office of Treafurer in Syllaes time, and by his commandment, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the Judges. But Memmius of ſpite turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring up the people againſt him, and letting them underſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treaſure, which ſhould have come to the Common-wealth; and that to worke his feate the better, he had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them ſtately to deny him the honor of his triumph. And truly Lucullus was in great danger to have loſt it utterly, but that the Noblemen of the City, and they that were of greateſt authority, intermeddled themſelves with the Tribes when they came to paſſe it by voices of the people; whom they intreated ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much ado, the people ſuffered him to enter the City in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, not terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhew or fight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he had brought thither with him, as many other Capitaines had done before him. For he cauſed the ſhew-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefly with Armour and weapons of the enemies to a marvellous number: and with the Kings Engines and inventions of battering pieces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhew, there was a certaine number of his men of Armes bravely armed, ten Cartes of warre armed with Sythes that paſſed by, and threeſcore of the chieffeſt friends and Capitaines of the two Kings that were led priſoners through the City. And there were alſo drawn after them, an hundred and ten Gallies all armed in the Prores with ſtrong ſpurs of Copper, and a ſtatue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, ſixe foot high, with a rich Target ſet with precious ſtones. Beſides all theſe, there were twenty Cupbords as full of ſilver Plate as could be, and thirty Cupbords full alſo of golden Veſſels, Armour and Coine of gold, carried upon mens ſhoulders. After them followed eight Mules laden with golden beds, and ſixe and fifty other Mules that carried ſilver Bullion, and a hundred and ſeven other Mules that carried ſilver Coine, amounting to the ſumme of two hundred threeſcore and ten thouſand Seſtertios. Furthermore, there were books of account carried alſo, wherein were particularly written the ſummes of money which Lucullus had delivered before unto Pompey for the warre againſt Pirates on the ſea, and unto the Treafurers and high Treafurers, to put in to the ſparing coſſers of the Common-wealth at ROME. And afterwards in an Article by it ſelfe, that he had given nine hundred and fifty Drachmaes to every ſouldier by the polle. After the ſhew of this triumph was ended, he made a generall Feaſt, in the which he feaſted all the City and Villages thereabouts, which the ROMANEſ call Vicos. And afterwards forſook his wife Clodia for her unchaſt and wanton life, and married Servilia, Caioes ſiſter: howbeit he wan nothing by the exchange; for he ſped as evil with the ſecond as he did with firſt. For, ſaving that ſhe was not flandered with the inceſt of her owne brethren, otherwiſe ſhe was as diſhoneſt and unchaſte as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers ſake, but at the length grew weary of her, and put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filled the Senate with a marvellous hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withſtand Pompey's tyranny, and to uphold and maintain the Authority of the Nobility and Senate againſt the people, for that by his noble deeds he had atchieved ſo great fame and reputation) he ſuddenly gave over all dealings in the affaires of the Common-wealth: either becauſe he ſaw it ſo beſt, being a hard thing now to keep it from ruine: or elſe (as other ſaid) for that he felt himſelfe ſufficiently furniſhed with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to live quietly all at his eaſe, after ſo great paines, travels and troubles, the end whereof fell not out over fortunately. And ſurely ſome were of his mind; and liked this great change of his marvellous well, becauſe he did not as Marinus did, neither happened on the ill ſucceſſe and end that Marinus had. For Marinus after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMBRES, and after his valiant Aets in warres which had won him great honour, yet would he not ſo leave off, when he might have been Chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an unſatiable mind, and ambitions deſire to rule and beare ſway (being withall a very old man) went and forced himſelfe amongſt young men deſirous of Government, who brought him not only to commit many outrages, but made himſelfe alſo to ſuffer greater cruelties. It is thought alſo that Cicero had ended his aged courſe more happily, if afterwards he had quenched Catiline conſpiracy, he had then taken his eaſe. And ſo had Scipio in like caſe, if when he had joynted NUMANTIA unto CARTHAGE, he would then have quieted himſelfe. And therefore, ſome ſay, that there is a certaine revolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wife man ſhould meddle any more with the affaires of the Common-wealth: no more then a man whoſe youth and ſtrength is gone and decayed, is any more fit to juſt, waſtle, or enter into ſuch exerciſes of the body. But contrarily, Craſſus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, becauſe he gave himſelf ſo much to pleaſure and paſtime: as if to live pleaſantly and delicately did not worke become his age, then to command an Army, or to governe the affaires of a Commonweale. And for my part, reading Lucullus's life, me thinks that I reade an ancient Comedy, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end joyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you finde notable exploits, done by him in wars, and great good government alſo in peace: but in the end they all turned into feaſts and bankets, and lacking little of maſkes and mummeries, dancing with torches, and all other ſuch delights fit for young men. For I bring within the compaſſe and reckoning of his fineneſſe and pleaſures, his ſumptuous buildings, his ſtately walks and Galleries, his hot-houſes and ſtoves, his tables and pictures, his ſtatues alſo, and the great workmanſhip and curioſity he had beſides of all other Arts by him gotten together out of all parts, to his infinite charge: abuſing therein the world of goods and treaſure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and Office of General, and otherwiſe. Inſomuch, that notwithstanding exceſſe and ſuperfluity hath ever ſince increaſed untill this preſent time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the moſt ſumptuous and delicateſt places that the Emperors have. And therefore Tuſerius the Stoicke Philoſopher, having ſeen theſe ſtately works, which Lucullus had cauſed to be made neare unto NAPLES, by the ſea ſide (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged upon vaults) and great ditches caſt by force, to make the ſea paſſe and run through his houſes, to keep fiſh therein; and lodgings alſo that he built in the ſea it ſelfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the Gownman, as if he would have ſaid, Xerxes the ROMANE. For even ſo did Xerxes in old time cauſe the mountain Atho to be cut in ſunder, and a channell to be digged there to paſſe his ſhips through. He had alſo many other pleaſant places within the territories of ROME neare unto THUSCULUM, where there were great large halles ſet upon Terraſſes to ſee round about far off in the day time. And Pompey going thither ſometime to ſee him, reproved him greatly, telling him that he had built a marvellous faire Summer houſe, but not to be dwelt in in the Winter ſeaſon. Lucullus laughing, answered him: Do ye think me to have leſſe wit and reaſon then Storckes or Cranes; that I cannot ſhift houſes according to the ſeaſon? And another time there was a Prator of ROME, that making Playes to ſhew the people paſtime, ſent unto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple cloaks to ſet forth his Players: Lucullus made him answer, that he would cauſe his folks to looke if he had any. And the next morning demanding of him; how many he ſhould need; the other answered; that a hundred would ſerve his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furniſh him with two hundred, if his caſe ſo required. And therefore the Poet Horace writing this ſtory; addeth to a notable exclamation againſt ſuperfluity, ſaying: that men think that a poore houſe where there is no more riches then neceſſary, and where there is not more then appeareth in ſight, and that the maſter knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinary ſervice at his board, not only in that his beds whereon he fed, were covered with rich Carpets of Purple, and himſelfe ſerved in Gold and Silver veſſels ſet with precious ſtones; and that there was dancing, muſicke, playes, and other ſuch like paſtimes of ordinary: but alſo for that he was continually ſerved with all ſorts of fine dainty diſhes, with works of Paſtry, banqueting diſhes; and fruit curiouſly wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered at of men of ſimple underſtanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey marvellouſly eſteemed, and ſpecially for a word he ſpake one day when he was ſicke, and that the Phyſician had willed him to eate of a Thruſh. For when his ſervants told him, they were hard to come by in Sommer, but at Lucullus house, where they brought them up all the yeare through: he would in no wife they should aske any of him, but said unto his Physitian: What, if Lucullus were not given to pleasure, could not Pompey live? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend and kinsman both, and yet he so much misliked his manner of living and ordinary expence, that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpose) touching mean diet, sobriety, and temperance of life; Cato could no longer abide him, but rose up, and said unto him: What, wilt thou not leave babbling to us all day; thou that art rich as Crassus, that livest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirm that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: nevertheless it is certain, by the noble sayings they have gathered of Lucullus, he did not onely delight to live so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feasted certain Grecians many dayes together in his house, that were come out of Greece to Rome: and that they being men brought up with the sobriety and simplicity of Greece, after they had been feasted there divers times, were ashamed, and refused to go thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made them this great chere for their own sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: My Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that; indeed I must needs grant that there is somewhat more then ordinary to welcome you withall; but I tell you truly, the most part is for Lucullus sake. Another time when he supped all alone, and his men had laid but one board, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and call for his steward, to know why he was so served: the Steward answered him: My Lord, because I saw you fend for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What said he againe, knewest not thou that Lucullus should sup to night with himself? In fine, Lucullus fare was so well known through Rome, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble house-keeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the prooff thereof, came one day to him in the Market-place seeing him at leisure: for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey (though there was some jarre between them for matters of warres) did not let for all that to come unto him, and to speake gently one to another. And Cicero after he had saluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, said he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, said Cicero, Pompey and I will come and suppe with you to night, with condition that you provide no more then your ordinary: Lucullus told them againe, they should then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they tarried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor suffer him to speak with his men, for fear he should command them to provide somewhat more then for himselfe. Nevertheless, at his desire they suffered him onely in their prefence allowed to tell one of his men, that he would sup that night in Apollo: (for so was one of the most stately and sumptuous halles of his house called) and with that word onely he finely deceived them both, and they never found him. For every Hall had his certaine fumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of every supper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and service for the same. So that when his servants had their watch-word but in what Hall he would suppe, they knew straight what charge he would be at for his supper, and what orders should be observed therein. Now Lucullus manner was to spend when he made any feast in the Hall of Apollo, fifty thousand pence, and that selfe day the supper was prepared according to that value: inso much as Pompey marvelled how it could be possible that a supper of so exceeding great charge could be so suddenly prepared. In such things therefore did Lucullus lavishly and riotously spend his goods, like spoiles gotten of slaves and barbarous people. But that especially which he bestowed upon Books, was a very commendable and honest expence. For that he gathered together a great number of notable Histories, the use whereof was more honour unto him, then the having of them. For his Library was ever open to all comers, and and they suffered the Grecians to come into his goodly tarrasses and faire walkes, or other pleasant places thereabouts convenient to sit and reason together, and never shut doore against them: where Learned men met commonly, and oftentimes spent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses; being very glad when other matters were dispatched, they had so much leisure as but to go thither. And Lucullus selfe would also many times be amongst them, in those tarrasses and pleasant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did ever helpe to dispatch them that had any businesse with him, and granted the thing they requested of him. To conclude, his house was a common receipt for all them that came from Greece to Rome. He loved all manner of Philosophy, and refused no Sect of the same. But from his youth upward, he ever loved and esteemed best the Academicke Sect, not that which they call the new Academicke (although it flourished at that time through Carnades workes, which Philo made such estimation of) but the old Academicke, which the Philosopher Antiochus of the City of Ascalon did defend and maintaine at that time, being an Eloquent Rhetorician and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to winne by all meanes, to make him his friend, and to have him in house with him: because he might inveigh against *Philo*s hearers and followers, whose Scholer Cicero among the rest was, that wrote a notable booke against this old Academicke sect. And in the same he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Academicke: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend something, and called that Catalepsis: but Cicero defended the contrary. The book is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we have rehearsed before) very good friends, and had both one selfe desire for Government in the Common-wealth. For Lucullus did not so withdraw himselfe from matters of state, that he would no more meddle at all, nor heare speake of them: but he betimes gave over all ambition and contention, as a thing of no small danger, and breeding great reproach and dishonour to Marcus Crassus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And these two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raised up to withstand *Pompey*s greatnesse, being affraid of him, after that Lucullus had refused the chiefe place of authority. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in the Market-place at Courts and Common counells, to pleasure his friends when they requested him: and would go to the Senate also, when there was occasion to breake any new practise, or to overthrow *Pompey*s ambitious policy. For he overthrew all the orders and constitutions that Pompey had made, after had he overcome the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the help of Cato hindred a distribution of money which Pompey had written for to Rome, to be bestowed amongst his souldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in friendship (or to speak more plainly, in conspiracy) with Crassus and Caesar, by whose help and assistance, he filled Rome with Armes and souldiers: and made the people by force to passe and confirme what he would have done, after he had violently expelled Lucullus and Cato out of the Market-place. Whereat the Noble men were much offended, and misliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus and Cato, *Pompey*s followers suborned a Brutian, and said he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the said Brutian being examined by the Senate, named certain: but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, saying that he had hired him to kill Pompey. But no man believed him: for they perceived openly in the Market-place, that he was procured by themselves falsely to accuse Lucullus, and *Pompey*s other adversaries. And this was proved more plainly within a few dayes after, when they threw the body of this Brutian (dead in the midst of the street, out of the prison, who they said died of himselfe with sicknesse. Howbeit the markes being plainly seen of the halter wherewith they had strangled him, and the stripes appearing also which they had given him, did plainly shew that they themselves did it, whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they slew in this manner. This was the cause why Lucullus did more then before absent himself from meeting in publicke causes: but after, when he saw that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes also to convey Cato far enough off, under pretenced colour to send him with charge into the Isle of Cyprus: then he gave up altogether. Some write that a little before his death, he was not perfit in his wits, decaying through age by little and little. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos saith, that it was not for age nor sicknesse that his wits did altare, but through poison which one of his slaves had given him, whom he had made free, called Callisthenes: who gave it him, not of any evil intent, but because his master should love him the more, supposing that this poison had power to make him love him. But he troubled his wits so with this poison, that Lucullus while he lived was faine to have his brother Marcus to oversee his goods. Notwithstanding this, when he was dead, he was as much bewailed and lamented of all the people, as if he had died in his best credit, and greatest prosperity. For all the people ran to honor his funerals, and his body was carried to the place, by the young Noble men of the City. The people would in any case have buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But because no man thought of it before, and also for that things necessary were not easily to be provided for the place: his brother Marcus besought the people they would be content his funerals might be at a Town of his own, neare unto the City of Tusculum, where his Tombe was prepared: and he himselfe lived not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honour, had not left him far behind him: so did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwayes dearely loved him, he could not then long live, and survive him.

Lucullus death blest.

Nothing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happy, then to die when he did, before he saw the change and alteration of the Common-weale, which the fatall destinies plagued the ROMANS withall, with sedition and civill warres: and that he died in his Countrey yet enjoying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that (above all other things) he was like unto Cimon: who died whilest the GRECIANS were in good love and peace with other, and not in broile of discord and civill warres. Indeed Cimon died in his Campe, being Generall of his Countrey, at the siege of the City of CITTUM in CYPRUS; not withdrawn to his home, as one wearied, living idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feasts and banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: butas Plato said (when he wisely blamed and reproved Orpheus, who promisseth perpetuall drunkenness in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that lived well in this life) merrily. And truly it is a great comfort and contentation of minde, for an old man feeble with age, and compelled by weakness, to withdraw himselfe from the world, as well in matters of government in peace, as in warres: and quietly to passe his time in study, where delight is joynd with honest contemplations. But to finish his vertuous deeds, by referring them to pleasure, as unto their onely end, and moreover, to grow old by pleasure and vanity, solemnizing Venus feast all the rest of his life, after he had made such warres, and commanded such Armies: that me thinkes a thing unworthy of an honest ACADEMICKE, and altogether unmeet for one professing old Xenocrates doctrine, but fit rather for a man given over altogether to Epicurus discipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be considered of in these two men, that the ones youth was altogether vicious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrary, honest and vertuous. But he is the better that changeth for the better: and that nature is alwayes more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time sheweth still the contrary. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one selfe meane: but they did not both alike use their riches. For it were to no purpose to compare the buildings of the Wall that standeth South within the Castle of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither, with the fine built Chambers, and high raised Turrets to gaze as far, and environed about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the spoiles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table also of moderate fare and diet, but yet open to every man, comparable to Lucullus board, which was sumptuously furnished, and shewed the greatness of his Lord. For Cimons board fed many mouths daily with a small charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feed a few, with superfluous dainties. Unlesse they will say, that time caused this difference between them. But who can tell, if Cimon had been at leisure to have withdrawne himselfe to quiet in age from Government and Armes, he also would not have led a more sumptuous and dissolute life, given to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loved wine, banquets, and playes, and was also given to women, as we have told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate successe of things do bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises, that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus died abroad in the warres, whilest he commanded armies, there had not been that living man, how curious soever he had been to reprove other mens faults, that could have detected him of any reproachfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land.

decay vice, and

land. And like as in games of prize and exercises of body which are shewed in GREECE, they that in one selfe day win the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a strange custome, not conquerers onely, but victours also, to honour them withall: even so me thinkes that Cimon in like case having in one selfe day crowned GREECE with two notable markes of triumph, for two battells he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by land, deserveth to have some place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreover, Lucullus received the Authority to command, of his Countrey and Common-weale: but Cimon gave his Countrey both authority and ability to command. Lucullus found his Countrey a commanding people to all their friends and confederates: through whose aide he overcame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his Countrey marching under anothers Ensigne, and through his valiantnesse did so behave himselfe, that he made his City go before her confederates, and triumph over her enemies: compelling the PERSIANS by force to give them the rule by sea, and perswading the LACEDÆMONIANS willingly to give place unto them by land. Now if the chiefe thing that can be in an excellent Captain, is to make himselfe to be beloved of his soldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, and Cimon esteemed and wondred at, even of the confederates themselves. For Lucullus was forsaken of his own men: and Cimon was followed by very strangers, for the confederates did joyne together with him, Lucullus returned home into his Countrey forsaken of those he carried out with him. Cimon returned again, commanding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his Countrey three notable things, and hard for them to have compassed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, given them authority and rule over their confederates, and joynd friendship with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them undertook to destroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA: but neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the sudden being Generall, and when his affaires prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be said also, that in this fault he was like unto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his Citizens, and at the length banished his Countrey for the space of ten yeeres, because that in ten yeeres space (as Plato saith) they should no more heare him speak. For to say truly, it seldom times happeth, that the grave wits of Noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable unto the common people: because they striving continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieve them as much, as Surgeons do their patients when they bind up their fores with bands to cure them. For though by that binding they restore and bring to their naturall places againe the broken bones and members out of joynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus went a great deal farther with his Army, then ever Cimon did. For he was the first ROMANE Captaine that passed over mount Taurus, and the River of Tigris with an Army. He took and burnt almost in the sight of both the Kings, the Royall Cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE and NICIBIS. Towards the North, he went as far as the River of Phasis: towards the East, into MEDIA and Southward, even to the Red Sea, and unto the Realmes of ARABIA, subduing all unto the ROMANE Empire. And having overthrown all the power of these two mighty Kings, he tooke from them all, but their persons onely: who fled and hid themselves like wild beastes, in infinite Deserts and unpasseable Forrests. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor overthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediately after against the GRECIANS, and overthrew the greatest part of their Army in AEGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did never any notable act. For the one finding himselfe altogether pulled down on his knees, and broken by the former battells: durst never once only shew his Army unto Pompey, out of the strength of his Campe, but fled into the Realme of BOSPHORUS, where he died. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himselfe on his knees, unarmed and without weapon, unto Pompey: and taking his Diademe off from his head, layed it at his feet, not flattering him for the victories he had won, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason whereof he escaped good cheap, and thought himselfe happy, when Pompey gave him onely the marke and title of a King, the which before had been taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthy Captaine, and stoutest Champion, that leaveth his enemy in weak estate for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwards with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the King of PERSIA over harried the pride and fiercenesse of the PERSIANS layed aground, by many great battells they had lost before unto Themistocles, King Pausanias, and Leotychides, who had overthrown them: and going now again to fight afresh with them, it was an easie thing to overcome the bodies of those, whose hearts were already vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had never been overcome, but bare a marvellous lofty mind with him, for the many great battells and conquests he had won. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison between those that Cimon overthrew, and those that were ranged in battell against Lucullus. So that all things weighed and considered, it were hard to judge which of them two proved the worst man: for that it seemeth, that the gods did favour both the one and the other, telling the one what he should do, and the other what he should not do.

And thus it appeareth by testimony of the gods, they were both good men, and that they both obtained everlasting glory.

Cimon two victories obtained in one day.

Great difference betwixt Cimon and Lucullus.

Thucydides.

Have reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Crassus and the events that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that befell the other in CICILE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to read my writings, not to think me in intermeddling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond himself, both for variety and liveliness of narration, as also in choice and excellent words) to have the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the Historiographer had. Who, hoping by the gravity and life of his words and reports, to darken the glory of Thucydides, and make Philistus (in comparison of himself) appear ignorant, and without any grace of historical narration: hath in his History of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battells by sea and by land, and the report of those speeches and narrations, which are delivered by them with great judgement and eloquence. Wherein he cometh as near them whom he contends to passe, as doth the footman to the LYDIAN Coach, as saith Pindarus: and besides sheweth himselfe fond and of small judgement, or as Diphilus saith:

Timæus follies.

And in divers places he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he saith, that he thinkes it was an evil token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whose name was derived of this word Nice, signifying victory) dissuaded their attempts against SICILE: and that by the throwing down and mangling of the Hermes (to say, the images of Mercury) it was foreshewed that they should receive great overthrowes by the Generall of the SYRACUSANS, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermion. And further, that it was not unlikely that Hercules did favour the SYRACUSANS, by reason of the goddesse Proserpina (protector and defender of the City of SYRACUSA) to requite her for that she gave him Cerberus the dogge, Porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, because they tooke the ÆGESTEANS parts (who came of the TROIANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promise and faith with him, whose City himselfe had overthrowne in revenge of the wrong that Laomedon King of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus shewes as much wit and judgement, in delivering us such toys in an history, as he doth in correcting the stile of Philistus, or in condemning and railing on Plato and Aristotle. But in my fancy, this ambition and contention to write or to speake more clearly then others, sheweth alwayes a base envious minde, like a Scholler full of Schoole points. But when it striveth with things that for their excellencie are past imitation, then is it extreame folly and madnesse. Since therefore I may not passe over nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philistus have already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the variety of his successes and fortune did cover: I must lightly touch them, and report so much as is necessary and convenient, lest men condemne me for sloath and negligence. And in the rest I have endeavoured together and propound things not commonly marked and knowne; which I have collected as well out of sundry mens Workes and ancient Records, as out of many old Antiquities: and of them all compiled a Narration, which will serve (I doubt not) to decipher the Man and his Nature. Of Nicias therefore may be said that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous Citizens of ATHENS, very honest men, and which favoured the Commonalty with a naturall fatherly love: Nicias the Sonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the Sonne of Milcesias, and Theramenes the Sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account: for he is flouted as a Forreigner borne in the Isle of Ceos; and challenged besides for inconstancy and irresolute in matters of State and Government: and inclining sometimes to one Faction, sometimes to another: he was called Cosbhrmas; a kinde of Buskin indifferently serving for both legs, and in old time was used of common Players of Tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in favour of the Nobility against Pericles; who alwaies tooke part with the inferior sort. Nicias that was the younger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time; for he was joynd Captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himselfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the Nobility raised him to great Authority, to be as a strong Bulwarke for them, against Cleons insolency and boldnesse: and withall he had the love of the People to advance and prefer him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the People, he did so flatter and dandle them, like an old man, still feeding their humour with gaine: but yet they themselves whom he thus flattered, knowing his extreme covetousnesse, impudency and boldnesse, preferred Nicias before him, because his gravity was not severe nor odious, but mingled with a kinde of modesty, that he seemed to feare the presence of the People, which made them thereby the more to love and esteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearfull and mistrustfull nature and disposition, in Warres he cloaked his feare with good Fortune, which ever favoured him alike in all his Journeys and Exploits that he tooke in hand, where he was Captaine. Now being much afraid of Accusers, this timorous manner of his proceeding in the City, was found to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good will of the People: and by meanes thereof rose daily more and more, because the People commonly feare those that hate them, and advance them that feare them. For the greatest honour Nobility can do to the Commonalty, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfect vertue onely, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole State and Common-wealth of ATHENS, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificial flattering of the People, to winne their favour and good will: but Nicias lacking that, and having Wealth enough, sought thereby to creepe into the Peoples favour. And where Cleon would entertaine the ATHENIANS with pleasant toys and devices, and could feede the Peoples humour that way: Nicias finding himselfe no fit man to worke by such encounter, crept into the Peoples favour with liberality, with charges of common Playes, and with such like sumptuousnesse, exceeding in cost and pleasant Sports, not onely all those that had bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine Monuments of his consecrating unto the gods, as the Image of Pallas in the Castle of ATHENS, the gilt being worne off: and the Chappell which is under the Festivall Table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe price in Bacchus Dances, and never went away without some gaine. And touching this matter, there goeth a report, that at certaine Playes, whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth upon the Players Stage before the People, apparelled like Bacchus: and being a goodly tall young man, without any haire on his face, the ATHENIANS tooke such pleasure to see him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for joy. Therewithall Nicias stode up, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leave the body of a man in bondage; that openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young Slave a Freeman. Men write also of certaine sumptuous and devout acts he did in the Isle of DELOS, where the Dancers and Singers, which the Cities of GREECE sent thither to sing Rhimes and Verses in the honour of Apollo, were wont before to arrive disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of People that ranne to see them, who made them sing straight without any order, and landing in haste out of their Shippes, they left their Apparell, and put on such Vestments as they should weare in Proceffion, and their Garlands of Flowers on their heads, all at one present time. But Nicias being commanded to go thither to present the Singers of ATHENS, landed first in the Isle of RENTA, hard adjoyning to the Isle of DELOS, with his Singers, his Beasts for Sacrifice, and with all the rest of his Traine, carrying a Bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATHENS, upon measure taken of the Channell, betwixt the one and the other Isle, set out with Pictures and Tables, with gilding, with Nosegays and Garlands of Triumph, and with excellent wrought Tapistry, which in the night he set up upon the Channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his Singers to passe over upon it, singing all the way as they went in his Proceffion so nobly set forth, even unto the very Temple of Apollo. And when the Sacrifice, the Feast, and Games that were to be played were finished, he gave a goodly Palme-tree of Copper, which he offered up to Apollo, bought Lands besides that cost him tenne thousand Drachmas, which he consecrated also unto the god Patron of the Isle: and ordained, that the profits of the same should be yearly bestowed upon the DELIANS, upon an open Sacrifice and Feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and prosperity of Nicias: and so caused it to be written and graven upon a Pillar he left in DELOS, as a perpetuall Monument and Keeper of his Offering and Foundation. Afterwards, this Copper Palme-tree being broken by windes, it fell upon the great Image of the NAXIANS Gift, and threw it downe to the Ground. Surely in this Ceremony and act of his, there was a marvellous pompe, and great shew of popular ambition: nevertheless, he that shall consider of his Life and Actions, may easily persuade himselfe, that above all, he did it of very pure zeale and devotion, and secondly, to give pleasure and pastime to the People. For by Thucydides report of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly given to Religion. We finde written in one of the Dialogues of Aeschylus, that Nicias did sacrifice daily to the gods, and kept a Soothsayer continually in his House, giving out abroad, that it was to counsell with him what should happen about the affaires of the Common-wealth: but in truth it was to inquire of his owne businesse, and specially of his Mines of Silver. For he had many great Mines about LAUREN side, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great danger, and he was driven continually to keepe a marvellous number of Slaves at worke there. The most part of Nicias Riches was in ready Money, and thereby he had many cravers and hangers on him, whom he gave Money unto: for he gave as well unto the wicked People that might doe mischief, as unto them that deserved reward, and were worthy of his liberality. Thus was his feare a Rent to the wicked, as his liberality was also a Revenue to the good: and hereof the Comical Poets doe deliver us ancient testimony. For Eucleides speaking of a certaine Informer, said thus:

The bruising of his secret birth, conveyed close away:
But Nice, the Sonne of Nicerate, did willingly bestow A brace of Mina's double told. And though I well do know The cause of his so doing, yet I will not him bewray:
For Why? the man is my good friend, and Wife, I dare well say.*

And he, whom Empolis mocketh in his Comedie intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine simple man upon the Stage, doth aske him:

The informer:

How long is it ago since thou didst speake with Nicias?

The plaine man:

I saw him standing even right now upon the Market-place.

The Informer:

*This man affirmes he saw him there. And wherefore should he say He saw him, but of some intent his lewdnesse to bewray?
Now Sirs, ye see how Nicias here is taken in the trap,

The Authour:

*O foolish folke, suppose ye that so good a man as he,
In any fault or shamefull fact will tardie taken be?*

And Cleon threatening in the Comedie of Aristophanes, intituled the Knights, faith these words:

*The Orators if by the throat I take,
Then sure I am, that Nicias straight will quake.*

Phrynichus selfe telleth us also glaunfingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frayed, when he said, speaking of another man:

*A good stout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward, like to Nicias.*

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to give any little occasion to the Orators to accuse him, kept himselfe so warily, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with any man in the City, nor yet put forth himselfe in company to talke, or passe the time amongst them, but altogether avoided such Sports and pleasures. For when he was in Office, he would never out of the Councell-houle, but still busied himselfe in dispatching Causes, from morning till night, and was ever the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of State in hand, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no access unto him, but kept close in his House: and some of his friends did ever answer them that came to his Gate, and prayed them to pardon him, saying: that he was busie then about Affaires of the Common-wealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought up in his House, and had himselfe taught him both Learning and Musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this Reputation of Greatnesse and Gravity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the Sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they finde certaine Poeticall words at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of men that were sent to dwell in Italy, did builde there the City of Thurvis. Hieron I say did serve his turne, and holpe him secretly to enquire what he would understand of the Soothsayers, and gave out these words among the People: that Nicias led too miserable and painefull a life, for the over-great care he tooke to serve the Common-wealth: inasmuch, as though he were in his Hot-houle to wash him, or at his Table at Meate, his minde ran still of some matters about the Common-wealth, and to serve the State did neglect his owne private Affaires: so that he scant began to sleepe and take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growne crabbed and uncourteous, even to such as before had bene his familiar friends: so that, said he, he loseth them together with his Goods, and all for service of the Common-wealth: where others grow rich, and winne friends, by the credit they have to be heard of the People, and can make merry among them, and sport with the the matters of State which they had in their hands. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truly say that which Agamemnon spake of himselfe in the Tragedy of Enripides, called Ephigene in Aulide.

*In outward shew of stately pompe, all others I exceed,
And yet the Peoples underling I am in very deed.*

And Nicias perceiving that the People in some things did serve their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, and wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking their Authority from them: as for prooffe, the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damou, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNUSIAN, and moreover by what they did unto Paches (that tooke the Isle of LES BOS) who being brought before the Judges in open Councell to give up an account of his charge, drew out his Sword, and slew himselfe in presence of them all. Nicias, I say, remembering these examples, fought ever to flie from those Offices which were either too great or too small; and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his Enterprizes that he tooke in hand, as we may easily conjecture, prospered marvellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisdom, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiency, but thanked Fortune ever for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himselfe to lessen his glory, and that onely to avoid envie: as the event of things falling out even in his time doe sufficiently witness unto us. For the City of ATHENS having sustained many great losses and overthrowes, he was never a Party, nor had ought to doe in any of them. As once for example: the ATHENIANS were overcome in THRACIA by the CHALCIDIONIANS, howbeit it was under the leading of Calliades and Xenophon, who were their Captaines. Another time, the losse they had in ÆTOLIA under the charge of Demosphenes. Moreover, at DELIUM, a City of BOEOTIA, where they lost a thousand men at one Conflict, Hippocrates then being Generall there. And as touching the Plague, the greatest number laid the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of Warres kept the men that came out of the Countrey, within the Walls of the City of ATHENS: and so by changing of aire, and their wonted manner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias ever burthened: but contrariwise he being Captaine, tooke the Isle of CYTHERA, which the LACEDÆMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for scituation to molest and destroy the Countrey of LACONIA. He wanne divers Cities that had rebelled in THRACIA, and brought them once more under the obedience of ATHENS. At his first coming, having shut in the MEGARIANS within their Walls, he tooke the Isle of MINOA: and at his departure thence, shortly after wanne the Haven of NISSEA also. Furthermore, landing in the Countrey of the CORINTHIANS, he overcame them that offered him Battell, and slew a great number, and among others Lycophon the Captaine. At this Battell he chanced to forget to bury two of his men that were slaine, whose bodies could not be found in gathering up of the rest: howbeit, so soone as he heard of it, he caused all his Fleece to stay, and sent an Herald to the Enemies, to pray leave to fetch away those two bodies. Now, though by Law of Armes, they that sent to aske leave to take away their dead to bury them, did thereby lose the honour of their Victory, and were barred to set up any Marke or Token of Triumph, because it seemed by the Suite, that they which had them in their power were Conquerors, and not the Petitioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed not to have made demand of them: Nicias notwithstanding was contented rather to forsake the honour of his Victory, then to leave the bodies of two of his Countrey-men in the Field without buriall. So, after he had destroyed all the Coast of LACONIA, and had overcome certaine LACEDÆMONIANS, that came against him in Battell, he tooke the City of THYREA, which the ÆGINETES kept at that time, whom he brought Prisoners unto ATHENS. And when the PELOPONNESIANS had prepared great Armies both by Sea and by Land to besiege the Fort of PYLE, the which Demosphenes the Captaine had fortified: Battell being given by Sea, it chanced there remained foure hundred naturall Citizens of SPARTA within the Isle of SPACTERIA. Now the ATHENIANS thought it a noble exploit of them (as indeed it was) to take those foure hundred alive: howbeit the Siege was very fore, because they lacked water even in the middle of Summer, and were forced to fetch a marvellous compass to bring Vintualls to their Campe; which when Winter should be once come, would be very dangerous, and almost an impossible thing to do. Whereupon they then became sorry, and repented them much that they had sent away the Ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS which came to them to treat of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) suffered them to depart in that fort without resolution taken: who was against them altogether onely to doe Nicias a despight, being his Enemy, and did earnestly sollicite the matter the LACEDÆMONIANS requested. This was the cause why Cleon perswaded the ATHENIANS to refuse their offer of peace. But when the People saw that this Siege drew out in length, and that their Campe suffered grievous wants and necessities, then they fell out with Cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, saying, that through his feare he would let the besieged SPARTANS escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not have holden out so long. Thereupon the ATHENIANS said aloud to Cleon: And why dost thou not goe thither then to take them? Moreover Nicias selfe also rising up, openly gave him his Authority to take this PYLE, and bade him leavie as many Souldiers as he would to goe thither, and not to bragge with such impudent words where was no danger; but to doe some notable service to the Common-wealth. Cleon at the first shrunke backe, being amazed withall, little thinking they would have taken him so suddenly at his word: but in the end,

perceiving the People urged him to it, and that Nicias also was importunate with him, ambition so inflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge upon him, but in a bravery said, That within twenty daies after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the Sword, or bring them Prisoners unto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Cleon say so, had more lust to laugh a good, then to believe that he spake: for it was their manner ever to laugh at his anger and folly. For it is reported of him, that the People on a time being solemnly assembled in Councell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would say, and having tarried long for him, at the length he came with a Garland on his head, and prayed the Assembly to dismisse the Court till the next morning: for (quoth he) I shall not be at leisure to day, because I have sacrificed, and do feast also certaine strangers my friends that are come to see me. So the People burst out in a laughing, and brake up the Assembly. This notwithstanding, Fortune favoured him at that time, and he handled himselfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, saving such as were slaine: and having made them yeeld, brought them Prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproach. For it appeared not onely a casting away of his Shield, but worse then that, a voluntary forsaking of his Province upon a base timorous minde, giving his Enemy occasion thereby to do some noble Exploit, depriving himselfe of his honourable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his Comedy of Birds, saying:

*It is no time to sleepe and linger still,
As Nicias doth, without good cause or skill.*

Also in another place of his Comedie of Plowmen, he saith:
*I faine would follow husbandry. Who lets thee? Marry you.
A thousand Drachma's I will give to be discharged now.
Of Office in the Common-wealth. Content so shall we have Two thousand Drachma's just, With those which Nicias lately gave.*

The immediate liberty of Cleon.

Cleons lewd and light gestures in his Orations.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the Common-wealth, suffering Cleon in that fort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that Victory, Cleon grew to so haughty a minde and pride of himselfe, that he was not to be dealt withall: whereupon fell out the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the City of ATHENS, which most grieved Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things tooke away the modesty and reverence used before in publick Orations to the People: he of all other was the first that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his Gowne, and flung up and downe the Pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiousness, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Oratours and Counsellors fell into, that dealt in matters of State and Common-wealth, and was in the end the overthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practice in the State, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither himselfe evil, but as they say of the Land of EGYPT, that for the fatnesse and lustinesse of the Soyle:

It bringeth forth most wholesome herbes, and also noysome weeds.

Alcibiades divers wits.

Cleon and Brasidas, the two Peace-breakers generally of all Greece.

Even so Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was rid of Cleon, he could not yet bring the City of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnesse. For when the Common-wealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into Warres, through Alcibiades extreme fury of ambition. And thus it began. The onely Peace-breakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GREECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas: for Warre cloaked the wickednesse of the one, and advanced the valiantnesse of the other, giving to either occasion to doe great mischief, and also opportunity to worke many noble exploits. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a Battell fought by AMPHIPOLIS, Nicias straight perceiving the SPARTANS had long desired Peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so hotly given to Wars, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet, devised what meanes he might use to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the Cities of GREECE also from broyle and misery of Warre, that thenceforth they might altogether enjoy a peaceable and happy life. The rich men, the old men, and the Husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to Peace, and talking privately also with divers others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of Warre. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to Peace, if they sought it, the SPARTANS believed him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very soft and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their Prisoners of SPARTA (who had bene taken at the Fort of Pyle) were gently intreated, and had made their miserable Captivity more tolerable. So, Peace was concluded betwene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one another againe, and beginning to taste the sweetnesse and pleasures of Peace, and the safety of free access one to see anothers friends that were strangers, began then to wish that they might still continue in Peace and Amity together, without effusion of blood of either Party, and tooke great delight in their Dances, to heare them sing such Songs:

And let my Speare be overgrowne, With dusky Spiders webs.

They did also with great joy and gladnesse remember him which said, that in Peace no sound of Trumper, but the crowing of a Cocke doth wake them that be asleepe: and on the other side, they cursed and tooke on with them that said it was predestined, the Warre should continue thrice nine yeeres.

And

And so, upon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an universall Peace throughout all GREECE. Now most men thought, that surely all their forrowes and miseries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, saying, that he was a man beloved of the gods, and for his devotion towards them, had this speciall gift given him, that the greatest blessing that could come unto the World, was called after his Name. For to confesse a troth, every man was certainly perswaded, that this Peace was Nicias worke, as the Warre was Pericles procurement, who upon light causes perswaded the GRECIANS to runne headlong into most grievous calamities: and Nicias on the other side had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurts the one had received of the other in former Warres. And even to this present day that Peace is called Nicias, as who would say, Nicias Peace. The Capitulations of the Peace were thus agreed upon: That of either side they should alike deliver up the Cities and Lands, which each had taken from other in time of Warres, together with the Prisoners also: and that they should first make restitution, whose lot it wasto begin. Nicias (according to Theophrastus report) for ready Money secretly bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the first that should make restitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that disliked of this Peace, sought by the complaints they made, to renew the Warre againe, Nicias then perswaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they should adde for strength unto their Countrey, the Alliance and Peace offensive and defensive made betweene them, for a more sure knot of friendship, whereby they might be the better assured the one of the other, and also the more dreadfull to their Enemies that should rebell against them. These things went cleane against Alcibiades minde: who besides that he was ill borne for Peace, was enemy also unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they fought to Nicias, and made none account of him, but despised him. Here was the occasion that caused Alcibiades to prove from the beginning what he could do to hinder this Peace, wherein he prevailed nothing. Yet shortly after, Alcibiades perceiving that the ATHENIANS liked not so well of the LACEDÆMONIANS as they did before, and that they thought themselves injured by them, because they had lately made League with the BOEOTIANS without their privy, and had not wholly rendred up the Cities of PANACTUM and AMPHIPOLIS, according to the Conditions articulated betweene them: began then to enlarge and aggravate the Peoples complaints, and to make them offended with every one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambassadors from the City of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and so handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made League offensive and defensive with them. While these matters were thus in hand, there came to ATHENS also Ambassadors from LACEDÆMON, with full Power and Authority to set all things at stay, and to compound all controversies: who having first spoken with the Senate, propounding things unto them both very honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being afraid that they letting the People understand so much, should thereby bring them to yeeld to what they desired: he finely deceived the poore Ambassadors by this device. He promised upon his Oath to helpe them in that they went about, so far forth as they would not confesse themselves to have absolute power from the Ephores: making them to believe it was the onely way to bring their matters to passe. The Ambassadors giving credit to his words, relied upon him, and so forsooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the People, being set in Councell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full Power and Authority to accord all matters, yea or no? Whereunto they make him answer with a loud voyce, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrary both to their expectation, and his owne Oath and Promise made unto them, began to call the Councell to witnesse, whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary, and so advised the People not to trust nor give credit unto such men, as were openly taken with so manifest a lye, and that in one selfe-matter would one while say one thing, another while another. It boots not to aske whether the Ambassadors were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himselfe wist not what to say to the matter, the suddenesse of the cause did so confuse and grieve him, being a thing he least looked for. Now the People they were so moved besides, that they became indifferent whether to have sent for the Ambassadors of ARGOS presently to have made League with them; or not: but there fell out an Earth-quake upon this matter, that greatly served Nicias turne and brake up the Assembly. The People meeting againe in Councell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could do or say, could scant with-hold them from making League with the ARGIVIS: and to get leave in the meane time to go to the LACEDÆMONIANS, promising he would make all well againe. Thereupon, Nicias going to SPARTA, was received and honoured there like a Nobleman; and as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he prevailed nothing, and being overcome by those that favoured the BOEOTIANS, returned againe to ATHENS as he departed thence: where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, but was also in danger of his Person, through the fury of the People, that at his request and counsell had redelivered such men Prisoners, and so great a number of them. For indeede, the Prisoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the Fort of Pyle, were all of the chiefest Houses of SPARTA, and their Kinsmen and Friends were the noblest men of the City. Notwithstanding, the People in the end did none other violence to him, saving that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and made League with the EPIANS and MANTINEANS (which had revolted from the LACEDÆMONIANS) and with the ARGIVES also: and sent Pyrates to the Fort of Pyle, to spoile the Countrey of LACONIA. Upon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell againe into Wars. Now when the quarrell and controversies was greatest betwene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracism (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the People banished for tenne yeares any such of their Citizens as they thought either of too great Authority, or that was most envied for his Wealth and Substance. Alcibiades and Nicias, were then not a little perplexed, considering their present danger, being sure that the one of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the People hated Alcibiades life, and were afraid of his valiantnesse: as we have more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be envied: besides they disliked his strange manner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conversant with the People then he was, and counted him too stately: moreover they hated him also because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the People desired, and had enforced them against their wills to agree to that which was profitable for themselves. In fine, to speake more plainly, there fell out great strife betweene the young men that would have Warres, and the old men that coveted peace, some desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades, but

And so it fell out then. For the ATHENIANS being divided in two Factions, gave authority to certaine of the most impudent and insolent persons that were in all the City: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the Towne of PERITHUS, a man of no haviour nor value, why he should be hold: but yet one that grew to some credit and power, dishonouring his Countrey by the honour they gave him. Now Hyperbolus thinking himselfe free at that time from any danger of banishment, (having rather deserved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well enough that remained behinde: shewed openly that he was glad of their discord and variance, and busily stirred up the People against them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practises, having secretly talked together, joyned both their factions in one: whereby they brought it so to passe, that neither of them were banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for tenne yeares. Which matter for the present time made the People very merry, though afterwards it grieved them much, seeing their Ordinance of the Ostracism blemished by the unworthinesse of the person: which punishment was an honour unto him. For this banishment was thought a meete punishment for Thucydides, Aristides, and such like men of account as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honour, and too manifest an occasion of glory to be given to him, that for his wickednesse had the selfe-same punishment, which was to be inflicted upon the chiefest Estates for their greatnesse. And the Comical Poet Plato himselfe saith in a place:

*Although his lewd behaviour deserv'd as much and more, Yet was not that the punishment he should have had therefore,
The Ostracy devised was for men of noble fame,
And not for varlets, whose lewd life deserved open shame.*

The taking away of ten yeares banishment.

After this Hyperbolus, there was never man banished with the Ostracism. For himselfe was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, and nearest Kinsman to the Tyrant was the first. Sure, Fortune is a very uncertaine thing, and without conceit of reason. For had Nicias frankly put himselfe to the hazard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs have happened him: either to have remained in the City with Victory, his adversary being banished: or being convicted by his banishment, to have scaped those extreme miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the same he had wonne of a wife Captaine, though he had bene overcome. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus writeth, how Hyperbolus nor Nicias was banished through the dissention that fell betwixt Phaax and Alcibiades: albeit most Writers agree with that I have told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGYPTIANS and LEONTINES being come to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA, Nicias being against it, was overcome by Alcibiades craft and ambition. For he, before they were called to Councell, had already through false surmizes filled the Peoples heads with a vaine hope and perswasion of conquest. Incomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, and the old men also in Artificers Shops, and in their compassed Chaires, or halfe circles where they late talking together, were every one occupied about drawing the Platforme of SICILIA, telling the nature of the SICILIAN Sea, and reckoning up the Havens and places looking towards AFRICK. For they made not their account that SICILE should be the end of their Warres, but rather the Store-houise and Armoury for all their Munition and Martiall Provision to make Warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICK, and consequently all the AFRICK Seas, even to Hercules Pillars. Now all their mindes being bent to Warres, when Nicias spake against it, he found very few men of quality to stand by him. For the rich, fearing lest the People would thinke they did it to avoid charge and the cost they should be at about these Warres, they held their peace, though indeede not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leave still to counsell them to the contrary. But when they had past the Decree in Councell for the Enterprize of SICILE, and that the People had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next Session of the Councell holden in the City, Nicias rose up againe, to see if he could turne the People from this Journey with all the Protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and private commodities, he brought the Common-wealth into so farre and dangerous a Warre. But all his words prevailed not. Himselfe before all others was thought the meekest man for this Charge, partly, because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater safety, when his timorous foresight should be joyned with

Alcibiades valiantnesse, and with Lamachus softnesse, which indeede most confirmed the Election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demofratu one of the Oratours that most procured the ATHENIANS to undertake this Enterprize, stepped forth, and said: It were good that Nicias left off and set aside all these excuses and devices, and preferred a Decree, That the People should thoroughly authorize the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswade the People to passe and authorize it. Yet it is said that the Priests objected many things to hinder the Journey. But Alcibiades also having suborned certaine Soothsayers alledged in like case some ancient Oracles that said the ATHENIANS should have great honour from SICILE: and further had enticed certaine Pilgrims, who said they were but newly come from the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence: That the Athenians should take all the Syracusans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, lest it should seeme they intermeddled to prognosticate evil for affections sake, seeing that the signes themselves, which were most plaine and notorious, could not remove them from the Enterprize of this Journey. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes and Images of Mercury, which in one night were all to be mangled, saving one Image onely called the Hermes of Andocides, which was given and consecrated in old time by the Tribe of the EGEIDS, and was set up directly over against a Citizens Houise called Andocides. Furthermore, the chance that happened by the Altar of the twelve gods: where a man leaping suddenly upon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his Genitories with a stone. And in a Temple also in the City of DELPHES, where was a little Image of Minerva of Gold, set upon a Palme-tree of Copper, which the City of ATHENS had given of the Spoyle wonne of the MEDES. Upon that Palme-tree fate certaine Crows many daies together, and never left pecking and jobbing at the Fruite of it, which was all of Gold, until they made the same to fall from the Tree. But the ATHENIANS said, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACUSANS had subdued) had finely feigned this device. There was a Prophecy also that commanded them to bring one of Minerva's Nunnes to ATHENS, that was in the City of CLAZOMENES. So they sent for this Nunne called Hefychia, which is, rest: and it seemeth it was that which the gods by this Prophecy did counsell them unto, that for that time they should be quiet. Meton the Astronomer having charge in the Army leaved for the Warre of SICILE, being afraid of this Prophecy, or otherwise milking the Celestiall signes and successe of the Journey, reigned himselfe mad, and set his house on fire. Others say he counterfeited not madnesse, but did one night indeed set his house on fire, and that the next morning looking rufully on it, he went into the Market-place as a man brought to pitifull state, to sue to the People, that in consideration of his great misfortune hapned him, they would discharge his Sonne of the Voyage, who was to take charge of a Galley at his owne cost, and ready to make saile. Moreover, the familiar spirit of wife Socrates, that did use to tell him before what should happen, told him then, that this Journey would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumour became common. And this also troubled a number of them, for the unlucky daies on the which they did imbarque. For they were the very daies on the which the women celebrating the Feast and yeare-day of Adonis death: and there were also in divers parts of the City, Images of dead men carried to buriall, and women following them, mourning and lamenting. So that such as did put any confidence in those signes, said they mistook it much, and that they were afraid lest the same signified, that all the goodly preparation of this Army, (the which was set out with such pompe and bravery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this Warre in open Councell, whilst they were deliberating upon it, and that he was not carried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed up with the glory of so honourable a charge to make him change his minde: therein surely he shewed himselfe an honest man, wise and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remove the People from the Enterprize of this Warre, neither yet by suite nor intreaty get himselfe discharged from being a Captaine thereof, but that they would in any case make him one of the Heads of the Army: then was it out of time to be fearful, and still giving backe, turning his head so oft like a childe to looke upon his Galley behinde him, and ever to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of his Journey. For indeede this was enough to discourage his companions, and to marre all at the first setting out: where, to say truly, he should suddenly have set upon his Enemies, and have gone to it with a lusty courage, to have assayed Fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first coming to goe straight to SYRACUSA, and to give them Battell as neare the Walls as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other side was of opinion, first of all to go about to winne the Cities that were in league with the SYRACUSANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to go against the SYRACUSANS themselves: Nicias to the contrary spake in Councell, and thought it better to go on faire and softly, discrediting the Coasts of SICILE round about, to view their Gallies and preparation, and so to returne straight to ATHENS againe, leaving onely a few of their men with the EGYPTIANS to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning marvellously cooled the courage of the Souldiers, and quite discouraged them. Shortly after also the ATHENIANS having sent for Alcibiades to answer to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in sight, but Nicias selfe in Power and Authority the Lieutenant Generall of all the Army) still used delays, running up and downe, and spending time so long in consultation, till the Souldiers were left without both hope and courage: and the feare the Enemy had of them at their first coming, to see so great an Army, was now in manner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the Army, before he was sent for from ATHENS, they went with threecore Gallies to SYRACUSA, of the which they placed fifty in Battell ray out of the Haven, and sent the other ten into the Haven to discover: which approaching neare the City, caused an Herald to make open Proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their Lands and Possessions, and tooke a Ship of the Enemies, in the which among other things they found Tables, wherein were written the names of all the Inhabitants of SYRACUSA, according to their Tribes and Houles. These Tables were kept far from the City, in the Temple of Jupiter Olympian, but at that time they had sent for them to know the number of men of service, and of age to beare Weapon. The same Tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and carried to the Generals of the Army: the Soothsayers seeing this long roll of names, at the first misliked it, fearing lest the Prophecy had beene fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACUSANS. Howbeit it is reported this Prophecy came to passe in another Exploit, when Callippus ATHENIAN having slaine Dion, wonne all the City of SYRACUSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the Campe, Nicias bare all the sway, and commanded the whole Army. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stout man, an honest man, and very valiant of his hands, and one that would not spare himselfe in time of neede: nevertheless he was so poore and miserable, that even when he was in state of a Generall, and gave up an account of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his Bookes, so much for a Gowne, and so much for a paire of Pantophles. Where Nicias authority and reputation contrariwise was of another manner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in Councell with his companions in the Councell-house at ATHENS about the dispatch of certaine Causes he spake unto Sophocles the Poet, then present among them, and bade him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him againe: Indeed I confesse I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom every man regardeth best. So having at that time Lamachus under him, a better Captaine and man of Warre then himselfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the Army under his charge, by deferring of time still, and hovering about SICILE as farre from his Enemies as he could: he first gave the Enemies time and leisure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to besiege Hyccara, being but a peltin little Towne, and raising the Siege without taking of it: he fell into so great a contempt with every man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him. At last, he retired to CATANA with his Army, without any other exploit done, saving that he tooke Hyccara, a baggage Village of the barbarous People, and where it is said Lais the Curtizan was borne, and that being then a young Girle, she was sold among other Prisoners, and afterwards carried into PELOPONNESUS. And in fine, the Sommer being far spent, Nicias was informed that the SYRACUSANS had taken such courage to them, that they would come and enterprife the Charge upon them first: and that their Horsemen were approached already before his Campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into SICILE to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to restore the LEONTINES to their Lands againe. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to go to SYRACUSA, and because he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hazard: he sent one of CATANA before to SYRACUSA, to tell them (as if he had beene a Spie) that if they would suddenly come and set upon the Campe of the ATHENIANS and take all their Carriage, he wistheth them to come with all their Power to CATANA at a certaine day which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (said he) for the most part are within the City, wherein there are certaine Citizens, which favouring the SYRACUSANS, have determined so soone as they heare of their coming, to keepe the Gates of the City, and at the same time also to set the ATHENIANS Ships on fire: and how there were also a great number in the City of this Confederacy, that did but looke every houre for their coming. And this was the noblest Stratagem of Warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this device he made the SYRACUSANS come into the Field with all their Power, so that they left their City without Guard: and he himselfe departing in the meane time from CATANA with all his Fleete, wonne the Haven of SYRACUSA at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his Enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and might without lett or difficulty set upon them with that wherein he most trusted. The SYRACUSANS returning straight from CATANA, and offering him Battell hard by the Walls of SYRACUSA, he came out into the Field, and overthrew them. There were not many of the SYRACUSANS slaine at this Battell, because their Horsemen did hinder the chafe: but Nicias breaking up the Bridges upon the River, gave Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For comforting and encouraging the SYRACUSANS, he told them Nicias deserved to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from ATHENS to SYRACUSA to fight. This notwithstanding, he made the SYRACUSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fiftene Capitaines, they chose out three onely, to whom the People were sworne, that they would suffer them to have full Power and Authority to command and take order for all things. The Temple of Jupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS Campe, which they would gladly have taken, for that it was full of rich Jewels and Offerings of Gold and Silver, given unto the Temple aforetime. But Nicias of purpose still drave off time, and delayed so long, till the SYRACUSANS at last sent a good Garison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with himselfe, that if his Souldiers came to take and spoile the Temple, his Countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and himselfe besides should beare all the blame of Sacriledge. So, having obtained victory without profit profit, (which ranne straight through SICILE) within few dayes after he returned unto the City of NAXOS, where he lay all the Winter, consuming a wonderfull masse of Victuals with so great an Army, for the doing of things of small moment, upon certaine SICILIANS that yielded to him. The SYRACUSANS in the meane time being in heart againe and courageous, returned to CATANA, where they spoyle and over-ran all the Countrey, and burnt the Campe of the ATHENIANS, Wherefore every man blamed Nicias much, because through his long delay and protracting of time to make all things sure, he let slip sundry occasions of notable Exploits, wherein good service might have beene done. Yet when he would do a thing inderd, he did it so thorowly as no man could take exception at his doings, for that he brought it to so good a passe: and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all speede, though he was both slow to determine and a Coward to enterprife. Now Nicias beseeched when he removed his Army to returne to SYRACUSA, he brought it so orderly, and also with such speede and safety, that he was come by Sea to THAPSUS, had landed and taken the Fort of EPIPOLIS, before the SYRACUSANS had any intelligence of it, or could possibly helpe it. For the choice men of the SYRACUSANS being set out against him, hoping to have stopped his passage, he overthrew them, tooke three hundred Prisoners, and made their Horsemen flye, which before were thought invincible. But that which made the SYRACUSANS most afraid, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this, that in a very short space he had almost environed SYRACUSA with a Wall, which was as much in compasse about, as the Walls of ATHENS, and worke to performe, by reason of the woody Countrey, and for the Sea also that beareth upon the Walls, besides that there were divers Marishes hard by it: and yet (sticke as he was of the Stone) he had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, unto his sicknesse. For mine owne part I wonder marvellously both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiantnesse and dexterity of the Souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Eurypides after their overthrow and utter ruine, made a Funerall Epitaph in Verse, and said thus:

So long as with indifferency the gods did use their might.*

But we finde it written, that the SYRACUSANS were not onely eight times, but many times more overthrowne by them: a time at length there was indeede, that both the gods and Fortune fought against them, even when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power. Now Nicias in his owne person was ever in the greatest and most weighty affaires, living with his sicke body. Howbeit one day when his disease grew sore upon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his Campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone having charge of the whole Army, fought with the SYRACUSANS, who then had brought a Wall from the City, unto the Wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purposed to have shut them in, to keepe that they should not compasse it round. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these Skirmishes, they many times over-raftly followed the chafe of their Enemies that fled: as it chanced one day that Lamachus went so far, that he was left alone to encounter a Company of Horsemen of the City, before whom Callicrates marched foremost, a valiant man of his hands, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the Conflict was first hurt: but he gave Callicrates also such a wound there-withall, that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. At that time the SYRACUSANS being the stronger side, tooke up his body, and carried it away with them: but they spurred out for Lamachus, life to the ATHENIANS Campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without any Guard or succour at all: nevertheless Nicias rose with speede out of his bed, and perceiving the danger he was in, commanded certaine of his friends to set the woode on fire which they had brought within the Trenches of the Campe, to make certaine devices for battery, and the Engines of Timber also that were already made. That device onely stayed the SYRACUSANS, saved Nicias, and the strength of their Campe, together with all the Silver and Carriage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACUSANS perceiving afar off, betwixt them and the strength of their Campe, such a great flame as rose up in the aire, upon the sight of it turned taile straight, and made towards their City. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left sole Captaine of the Army without any Companion, in great hope notwithstanding to doe some good: divers Cities of SICILE yielded unto him, Shippes fraught with Corne came out of every quarter to his Campe, and many submitted themselves, for the good successe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACUSANS also sent to parle with him of Peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their City any longer against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the LACEDAMONIANS, comming to aide the SYRACUSANS, understanding by the way how the City of SYRACUSA was shut in with a Wall round about, and in great distresse: held on his Voyage notwithstanding, not with any hope to defend SICILE (supposing the ATHENIANS had wonne the whole Countrey) but with intent nevertheless to helpe the Cities of ITALY, if he could possibly. For it was a common rumour abroad, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wisdom and good fortune was invincible. Nicias himselfe now contrary to his wonted wisdom and foresight, trusting altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, but specially believing the reports that were told him of SYRACUSA, and the newes that were brought him thence by some of themselves which came secretly unto him, perswading himselfe that within few dayes he should have SYRACUSA by composition, tooke no care to withstand Gylippus coming thither, neither sent any man to keepe him from landing in SICILE. By which negligence Gylippus landed in a Passenger, without Nicias knowledge.

knowledge: so small reckoning they made of him, and so much they did fondly despise him. Gylippus being thus landed far from SYRACUSA, began to gather men of Warre together, before the SYRACUSANS themselves knew of his landing, or looked for his coming: insomuch as they had already appointed the assembly of a Councell to determine the Articles and Capitulations of Peace, which they should conclude upon with Nicias. Moreover, there were some that perswaded they should doe well to make haste to conclude the Peace, before the inclosure of Nicias Wall was altogether finished, which then lacked not much to performe, having all the stufte for the purpose brought even ready to the place. But as these things were even thus a doing, arrived one Gongylus at SYRACUSA, that came from CORINTH with a Galley. At whole landing, the People upon the Peere flocking about him, to heare what newes: he told them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other Galleys after to their aide. The SYRACUSANS would hardly believe him, untill there came another Messenger also sent from Gylippus selfe of purpose, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the Field. Thereupon the SYRACUSANS being inmarvellously revived went all straight and armed themselves. And Gylippus was no sooner come into SYRACUSA, but he presently put his men in Battell ray, to set upon the ATHENIANS. Nicias for his part had likewise also set the ATHENIANS in order of Battell, and ready to fight. When both the Armies were now approached neare to each other, Gylippus threw downe his Weapons, and sent a Herald unto Nicias to promise them life and baggage to depart safely out of SICILE. But Nicias would make the Herald none answer to that Message. Howbeit there were certaine of his Souldiers that in mockery asked the Herald, if for the coming of a poore Cape and Wand of LACEDÆMON, the SYRACUSANS thought themselves strengthened so much, that they should despise the ATHENIANS, which not long before kept three hundred LACEDÆMONIANS Prisoners in Irons, far stronger and more haire on their heads then Gylippus had, and had also sent them home to their Citizens at LACEDÆMON. And Timæus writeth also, that the SICILIANS themselves made no reckoning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, because they saw his extreme covetousnesse and misery: and then, for that he came so meanly apparelled, with a thread-bare Cape, and a long bush of haire, which made them scorne him. Yet in another place he saith, that so soone as Gylippus arrived in SICILE, many came to him out of every quarter with very good will, like Birds wondering at an Owle. This second report seemeth truer then the first: for they swarmed about him, because in this Cape and Wand they saw the tokens of the Majesty of the City and Seignory of SPARTA. Thucydides also saith, that it was Gylippus onely that did all there. And much like doth Philistus selfe a SYRACUSAN confesse, who was present then in person, and saw all things that were done. Notwithstanding at the first Battell the ATHENIANS had the upper hand, and slew a number of the SYRACUSANS, among the which Gongylus the CORINTHIAN was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wife Captaine. For with the self-same Weapons, with the same Men, with the same Horses, and in the same places, changing onely the order of his Battell, he overthrew the ATHENIANS: and (fighting with them still) having driven them even into their Campe, he set the SYRACUSANS a worke to build up a Wall overthwart (with the very self-same stones and stufte, which the ATHENIANS had brought and laid there for the finishing of their Inclosure) to cut off the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it joynted not together. So, all that the ATHENIANS had done before untill that present, was utterly to no purpose. Things standing in these termes, the SYRACUSANS being couragious againe began to arme Galleys; and running up and downe the Fields with their Horfemen and Slaves, tooke many Prisoners. Gylippus on the other side, went in person to and fro through the Cities of SICILE, perswading and exhorting the Inhabitants in such sort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke Armes by his procurement. Nicias seeing things thus fall out, began to his old trade againe; and considering the change of his state and former good lucke, his heart feeling to faint, wrote straight to the ATHENIANS to send another Army into SICILE, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any case to give him leave to returne, and to discharge him of his Office, for cause of his sicknesse. The ATHENIANS were indifferent before he wrote, to send aide thither: howbeit the envie the Nobility bare unto Nicias good fortune, did ever cause some delay that they sent not untill then, and then they determined to send with speede. So Demosthenes was named to be sent away immediately after Winter, with a great Navie. In the middelt of Winter Eurymedon went to Nicias, and carried him both Money and News, that the People had chosen some of them for his Companions in the Charge, which were already in service with him, to wit, Euthydemus and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane time being suddenly assailed by his Enemies both by Sea and Land; though at the first he had fewer Galleys in number then they, yet he budged divers of theirs, and sunke them. But by Land againe, he could not aide his men in time, because Gylippus at the first onset had taken a Fort of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay the Store and Tackle for many Galleys, and a great masse of ready Money, which was wholly lost. Besides, in the same Conflict also were many men slaine, and many taken Prisoners. Yet further, the greatest matter of weight was, that thereby he tooke from Nicias the great commodity he had to bring his Victuals safely by Sea to his Campe. For while the ATHENIANS kept this Fort, they might at their pleasure bring Victuals without danger to their Campe, being covered with the same: but when they had lost it, then it was hard for them so to do, because they were ever driven to fight with the Enemies that lay at Anker before the Fort. Furthermore, the SYRACUSANS did not thinke that their Army by Sea was overthrowne, because their Enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed the the ATHENIANS disorderedly: and therefore were desirous once againe to venture, in better fort and order then before. But Nicias by no meanes would be brought to fight againe: saying, that it were a madnesse, looking for such a great Navie and a new supply as Demosthenes was coming withall, rashly to fight with a fewer number of Ships then they, and but poorly furnished. But contrarily Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines, (Nicias and Demosthenes that was then coming) desired to prevent Demosthenes, in performing some notable service before his arrivall, and thereby also to excell Nicias doings: Howbeit the cloake they had to cover their ambition withall, was the honour and reputation of the City of ATHENS, the which (said they) were shamed and dishonoured for ever, if they now should they themselves afraid of the SYRACUSANS, who provoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his will to Battell, in the which the ATHENIANS were slaine and overcome, by the good counsell of a CORINTHIAN Pilot called Arifon. For the left Wing of their Battell (as Thucydides writeth) was clearly overthrowne, and they lost a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, considering on the one side that he had taken marvellous paines, whilst he was sole Captaine of the whole Army: and on the other side, for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had given him companions. But as Nicias was in this great despaire, they discried Demosthenes upon a Peere of the Haven, with his Fleet bravely set out and furnished, to terrifie the Enemies. For he had threescore and thirteene Galleys, and in them he brought five thousand Footmen well armed and appointed, and of Darters, Bow-men, and Hurlers with Slings, about three thousand, and the Galleys trimmed and set forth with goodly Armours, numbers of Ensignes, and with a world of Trumpets, Howboyes, and such Marine Musick, and all set out in this triumphant shew, to feare the Enemies the more. Now though the SYRACUSANS themselves were againe in a peeke of troubles, perceiving they strove against the streame, and consumed themselves to no purpose, when by that they saw there was no likelihood to be delivered from their troubles. And Nicias also rejoiced, that so great aide was come: but his joy held not long, for so soone as he began to talke with Demosthenes of the state of things, he found him bent forthwith to set upon the SYRACUSANS, and to hazard all with speede, that they might quickly take SYRACUSA, and so dispatch away home againe. Nicias thought this more haste then good speede, and feared much this foole-hardinesse. Whereupon he prayed him to attempt nothing rashly nor desperately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the Warre against the Enemies, who were without Money, and therefore would soone be forsaken of their Confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of Victuals, that they would then quickly seeke to him for Peace, as they had done aforetime. For there were many within SYRACUSA that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of Warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but frightened a little more with want of Victuals, they would yeeld straight. Nicias delivering these perswasions somewhat darkly, and keeping somewhat also from utterance, because he would not speake them openly, made his Colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardinesse, and that he returned againe to his former delays to keepe all in security, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his Army, for that he had not at his first coming set upon the Enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the courage of his Souldiers was cold and done, and himselfe also brought into contempt with his Enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his Colleagues and Companions with him in the Charge) Euthydemus and Menander, stucke to Demosthenes opinion: whereunto Nicias was also forced against his will to yeeld. So Demosthenes the selfe-same night taking the Footmen, went to assault the Fort of Epipolis: where, before his Enemies heard any thing of his coming, he slew many of them, and made the rest flee that offered resistance. But not content with this Victory, he went farther, till he fell upon the BOEOTIANS. They gathering themselves together, were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, bating their Pikes with such fury and loud cries, that they caused the former to retire, and made all the rest of the Assailants afraid and amazed. For the foremost flying backe, came full upon their Companions; who taking them for their Enemies, and their Flight for a Charge, resisted them with all their force, and so mistaking one another, both were wounded and slaine, and the hurt they meant unto their Enemies, did unfortunately light upon their owne fellows. For this multitude meeting thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, and what for that they could not discern one another in the night, the which was neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleare, as they might certainly judge by sight what they were that met them: (for then the Moone declined apace, and the small light it gave was diffused with the number of men that ranne to and fro) the feare they had of the Enemy, made them mistrust their Friends. All these troubles and disadvantages had the ATHENIANS, and beside the Moone on their backs, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and glistering of Armour: and contrarily, the Enemies Targets glaring in their eyes, by the reflection of the Moone that shone upon them, increased their feare, and made them seeme a greater number, and better appointed then they were indeede. At last, the Enemies giving a lusty Charge upon them on every side, after they once began to give backe, and turne taile, some were slaine by their Enemies, others by their owne Company, and others also brake their neckes falling from the Rockes. The rest that were dispersed abroad in the Fields, were the next morning every man of them put to the Sword by the Horfemen. So the account made, two thousand ATHENIANS were slaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their Armours backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was marvellously offended.

offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashness. But he excusing himself as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoise faire homewards. For, said he, we must looke for no new aide from ATHENS, neither are we strong enough with this Army to overcome our Enemies: and though we were, yet must we of necessity avoid the place we are in, because (as it is reported) it is alwaies unwholsome for an Army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the Autumpe and season of the year, as they might plainly see by experience. For many of their People were already sicke, and all of them in manner had no minde to tarry. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, because he feared not the SYRACUSANS, but rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations and condemnation. And therefore in open Council he told them, that as yet he saw no such danger to remaine, and though there were, yet that he had rather die of his Enemies hands, then be put to death by his owne Countrey men. Being therein of a contrary minde to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that, said to his Citizens, I had rather suffer death by you, then to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for removing their Campe to some other place, they should have leisure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had delivered this opinion in Council, Demosthenes having had all lucke at his first coming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Nicias durst not so hard against their departure, but that he relied upon the trust and confidence he had of some within the City, they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new supply come unto the SYRACUSANS, and that they saw the Plague increased more and more in their Campe: then Nicias selfe thought it best to depart thence, and gave notice to the Souldiers to prepare themselves to shipp away. Notwithstanding, when they had put all things in readinesse for their departure, without any knowledge of the Enemy, or suspicion thereof, the Moone began to eclipse in the night, and suddenly to lose her light, to the great feare of Nicias and divers others, who through ignorance and superstition quaked at such sights. For, touching the Eclipse and darknesse of the Sunne, which is ever at any conjunction of the Moone, every common person then knew the cause to be the darknesse of the body of the Moone betwixt the Sunne and our sight. But the Eclipse of the Moone it selfe, to know what doth darken it in that sort, and how being at the full it doth suddenly lose her light, and change into so many kindes of colours: that was above their knowledge, and therefore they thought it very strange, perswading themselves that it was a signe of some great mischiefs the gods did threaten unto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that ever determined and delivered any thing for certaine and assured, concerning the light and darknesse of the Moone, his Doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity, nor was generally knowne but onely to a few, who durst not talke of it, but with feare, even to them they trusted best. And the reason was, for that the People could not at that time abide them that professed the knowledge of naturall Philosophie, and inquired of the causes of things: for them they called then Misopologists, as much to say, as curious inquirers and talkers of things above the reach of reason, done in Heaven and in the Aire. Because the People thought they ascribed that which was done by the gods onely, unto certaine naturall and necessary Causes that worke their Effects not by Providence nor Will, but by Force and necessary Consequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished from ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in Prison: from whence Pericles had much ado to procure his delivery. And Socrates also, though he did not meddle with that part of Philosophie, was notwithstanding put to death for the suspicion thereof. In fine, the Doctrine of Plato being received and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessity of Naturall Causes unto the controllment and disposition of Divine Power, as unto a more excellent and supreme Cause: tooke away all the ill opinion which the People had of such Disputations, and gave open passage and free entry unto the Mathematicall Sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Plato's Scholars and Friends, an Eclipse of the Moone chancing even at the very same time that he was weighing up his Ankers to saile from ZAZYNTH, to make Warre with the Tyrant Dionysius: being nothing afraid nor troubled therewithall, made saile notwithstanding, and when he came to SYRACUSA, drove out the Tyrant. But then it fell out unfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilfull Soothsayer: for the party which he was wont to use for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his Superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this Signe of the Eclipse of the Moone (Philochorus saith) was not hurtfull for men that would fie, but contrarily very good: for, said he, things that men do in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemy unto them. But this notwithstanding, their custome was not to keepe themselves close above three daies in such Eclipses of the Moone and Sunne, as Antocides selfe prescribeth in a Booke he made of such matters: where Nicias bare them then in hand, that they should tarry the whole and full revolution of the course of the Moone, as though he had not seene her straight cleare againe, after she had once passed the shadow and darknesse of the Earth. But all other things laid aside and forgotten, Nicias disposed himselfe to sacrifice unto the gods: untill such time as the Enemies came againe as well to besiege their Forts, and all their Campe by Land, as also to occupie the whole Haven by Sea. For they had not onely put men aboard into their Gallies able to weare Armour, but moreover young Boyes into Fisher-boats and other light Barques, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reviled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble House, called Heraclides, whose Boate being forwarder then his Companions, was in danger of taking by a Galley of the ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Pollichus his Uncle being afraid of it, lanchd forward with tenne Gallies of SYRACUSA for his rescue, of the which himselfe was Captaine. The other Gallies doubting also least Pollichus should take hurt, came on likewise amaine: so that there fell out a great Battell by Sea, which the SYRACUSANS wanne, and slew Eurymedon the Captaine, and many other. This made the Souldiers of the ATHENIANS so afraid, that they began to cry out, it was no longer tarrying, there and that there was none other way but to depart thence by Land. For after the SYRACUSANS had won that Battell, they had straight shut up the Havens mouth. Nicias could not consent to such a retire: for, said he, it would be too great a shame for them to leave their Gallies and other Ships to the Enemy, considering the number not to be much lesse then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and ten Gallies with the best and valiantest of their Footmen, and Darters, that were in the Army, because the other Gallies had spent their Oars. And for the rest of the Army, Nicias forsaking their great Campe and Walls (which reacheth as far as the Temple of Hercules) did let them in Battell ray upon the peere of the Haven. Inasmuch as the SYRACUSANS which untill that day could not performe their wonted Sacrifices unto Hercules, did then send their Priests and Soothsayers came and told them. The Souldiers being imbarked into the Gallies, the Priests and Soothsayers came and told the SYRACUSANS, that undoubtedly the signes of the Sacrifices did promise them a noble Victory, so that they gave no charge, but onely stood upon their defence: for so did Hercules ever overcome, defending when he was assailed. With this good hope the SYRACUSANS rowed forward, and there was such a hot and cruell Battell by Sea, as had not been in all this Warre before: the which was as dreadful to them that stood on the Shore to behold it, as it was mortall unto them that fought it, seeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themselves by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranks of their Ships, as they were hurt by their Enemies. For they had placed all their great Ships together, fighting with the heavy against the Enemies that were light and swift, which came on every side of them, hurling stones at them, which were made sharpe to wound how ever they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS onely casting their Darts, and using their Bowes and Slings, by meanes of their rowing up and down, could not lightly aime to hit with the head. That manner of fight Aristo CORINTHIAN (an excellent Ship-master) had taught the SYRACUSANS, who was himselfe slaine valiantly fighting, when they were Conquerors. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driven to fight, having sustained a marvellous slaughter and overthrow, (their way to fie by Sea being also clearly taken from them) and perceiving moreover that they could hardly save themselves by Land: were then so discouraged, as they made no longer resistance, when their Enemies came hard by them and carried away their Ships before their faces. Neither did they ask leave to take up their dead mens Bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forsake their diseased and sore wounded Companions, then to bury them that were already slaine. When they considered all these things, they thought their own state more miserable then theirs, which were to end their lives with much more cruelty, then was their misery present. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiving the SYRACUSANS through all the City disposed themselves to sacrifice to the gods, and to be merry, as well for the joy of their Victory, as also for Hercules Feast, thought it bootlesse to perswade them, and much lesse to compell them to take Armes upon a sudden, to let upon their Enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates devising with himselfe how to deceive Nicias, sent some of his friends unto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all things during this Warre: and willed him to take heed not to depart that night, lest he fell into the ambushes which the SYRACUSANS had laid for him, having sent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe, Nicias being overreached by Hermocrates craft and subtilty, staied there that night, as though he had been afraid to fall within the danger of his Enemies ambush. Thereupon the SYRACUSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoised saile, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the Rivers mouths, and brake out the Bridges, and then cast their Horfemen in a Squadron in the next plaine Fields adjoining, so that the ATHENIANS had no way left to escape and passe by them without fighting. At last notwithstanding, having stayed all that day and the next night following, they put themselves in Journey, and departed with great cries and lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall Countrey, and not out of their Enemies Land, as well for the great distresse and necessity wherein they were (lacking all things needfull to sustaine life,) as also for the extreme sorrow they felt, to leave their sore wounded Companions and diseased Kinsmen and Friends behinde them, that could not for their weaknesse follow the Campe, but specially for that they looked for some worse matter to fall to themselves, then that which they saw present before their eyes to be happened unto their fellows. But of all the most pitifull sights to behold in that Campe, there was none more lamentable nor miserable then the Person of Nicias self: who being tormented, with this miserie, and waxen very leane and pale, was also unworthily brought to extreme want of naturall sustenance, even when he had most need of comfort, being very sickely. Yet notwithstanding his weaknesse and infirmity, he tooke great paines, and suffered many things which the foundest bodies do labour much to overcome and suffer: making it appeare evidently to every man, that he did not abide all that paines for any respect of himselfe, or desire that he had to save his own life, so much as for their sakes, in that he yielded not unto present dispaire. For where the Souldiers for very feare and sorrow burst out into teares and bitter wailing, Nicias selfe shewed, that if by chance he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather upon remembrance of the shame and dishonour that came into his minde, to see the unfortunate successe of his voyage, instead of the honour and Victory they hoped to have brought home, then for any other respect. But if to see Nicias in this misery, did move the lookers on to pity: yet did this much more increase their compassion, when they remembered Nicias words in his Orations continually to the People, to breake this Journey, and to dissuade them from the enterprise of this Warre. For then they plainly judged him not to have deserved these troubles. Yet furthermore, this caused the Souldiers utterly to dispaire of helpe from the gods, when they considered with themselves, that so devout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing undone that might tend to the honour and Service of the gods) had no better successe, then the most vile and wicked Persons in all the whole Army. All this notwithstanding, Nicias strained himselfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull words, and his kinde using of every man: to let them know that he fainted not under his burthen, nor yet did yeeld to this misfortune and extreame Calamity. And thus travelling eight daies journey out-right together, notwithstanding that he was by the way continually set upon, wearied and hurt: yet he ever maintained his Bands, and led them whole in company, untill that Demosthenes with all his Bands of Souldiers was taken Prisoner, in a certain Village called Polyzelios: where remaining behinde, he was environed by his Enemies in fight, and seeing himselfe so compassed in, drew out his Sword, and with his owne hands thrust himselfe thorow, but died not of it, because his Enemies came straight about him, and tooke hold of him. The Syracusans thereupon went with speed to Nicias, and told him of Demosthenes case. He giving no credit to them, sent presently certaine of his Horsemen thither to understand the truth: who brought him word that Demosthenes and all his men were taken Prisoners. Then he besought Gylippus to treat of Peace, to suffer the poore remaine of the Athenians to depart out of Sicille with safety, and to take such Hostages for the sure Payment of all such Summes of Money the Syracusans had disbursed by meanes of this Warre, as should like himselfe: which he promised he would cause the Athenians to performe and satisfie unto them. Howbeit the Syracusans would in no wise hearken to Peace, but cruelly threatening and reviling them that made motion hereof, in rage gave a new onset upon him, more fiercely then ever before they had done. Nicias being then utterly without any kinde of Victuals, did notwithstanding hold out that night, and marched all the next day following (though the Enemies Darts still flew about their eares) untill he came to the River of Asinarus, into the which the Syracusans did forcibly drive them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, entred the River of themselves, thinking to drink. But there of all others was the most cruell slaughter of the poor wretches, even as they were drinking: untill such time as Nicias falling down flat at Gylippus feete, said thus unto him: Since the gods have given thee (Gylippus) Victory, shew mercy, not to me that by these miseries have won immortall Honour and Fame, but unto these poor vanquished Athenians: calling to thy remembrance, that the fortunes of Warre are common, and how that the Athenians have used you Lacedaemonians courteously, as often as fortune favoured them against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias, and perswaded by his words, tooke compassion of him (for he knew he was a Friend unto the Lacedaemonians at the last Peace concluded betwixt them, and furthermore thought it great honour to him, if he could carry away the two Captaines or Generals of his Enemies Prisoners) shewed him mercy, gave him words of comfort, and moreover commanded besides that they should take all the residue Prisoners. But his commandement was not known in time to all: in so much as there were many more slaine then taken, although some private Souldiers saved divers notwithstanding by stealth. Now the Syracusans having brought all the Prisoners that were openly taken into a Troope together, first unarmed them, then taking their Weapons from them, hung them up upon the goodliest young Ttees that stood upon the Rivers side, in token of Triumph. And so putting on triumphing Garlands upon their heads, and having trimmed their own Horses in Triumphant manner, and also shorne all the Horses of their Enemies: in this triumphing sort they made their entrie into the City of Syracusa, having gloriously ended the most notable Warre that ever was amongst the Greekes one against another, and attained also the Noblest Victory that could be achieved, and that onely by force of Arms and Valiancy. So at their return, a Councell and Assembly was holden at Syracusa, by the Citizens and their Confederates: in the which Euclydes one of the Oratours (a practiser in publique Causes) first made Petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for ever thenceforth be kept Holy-day, without any manner of work, or labour, but onely to do Sacrifice to the gods; and that the Feast should be called, Asinarus Feast, after the Name of the River where the Overthrow was given. This Victory was had the six and twentieth day of the Moneth of July. And as touching the Prisoners, that the Confederates of the Athenians and their Slaves should be openly sold by the drumme: and that the naturall Athenians which were Freeman, and their Confederates of the Countrey of Sicille, should be clapped in Irons and laid in Prison, the Captaines onely excepted, whom they should put to death. The Syracusans, confirmed this Decree. And when the Captain Hermocrates went about to perswade them, that to be mercifull in Victory, would be more honour unto them, then the Victory it self: they thrust him back with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made suite that for the Captains of the Athenians, he might carry them alive with him to Sparta, he was not onely shamefully denied, but most vilely abused; so lusty were they grown upon this Victory, besides also that in the time of the War they were offended with him, and could not endure his straight severe Laconian government. Timaeus saith moreover that they accused him of covetousness and theft, which Vice he inherited from his Father. For Cleandrides his Father was convict for extortion, and banished

ATHENS.

ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe having stolen thirty Talents out of a thousand which Lyfander sent to SPARTA by him, and having hid them under the eavings of his House, being bewrayed, was compelled with shame to fle his Countrey, as we have more amply declared in the Life of Lyfander. So Timaeus writeth, that Nicias and Demosthenes were not stoned to death by the Syracusans, as Thucydides and Philistus report, but that they killed themselves, upon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the Assembly of the People was broken up) by one of his men, whom the Keepers of the Prison let in unto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the Jayle doore, for every man to behold. I have heard there is a Target at this present to be seene in a Temple at Syracusa, which is said to be Nicias Target, covered all over with Gold and Purple Silke, passing finely wrought together. As for the other Prisoners of the Athenians, the most of them died of sicknesse, and of ill handling in the Prison: where they had no more allowed them to live withall but two dishfuls of Barely for their bread, and one of water for each man a day. Indeed many of them were conveyed away, and sold for Slaves: and many also that scaped unknowne as Slaves were also sold for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a Horse, who notwithstanding besides their bondage, endured also this paine. But such, their humble patience and modesty did greatly profit them: for either shortly after they were made Freeman, or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated and beloved of their Masters. Some of them were saved also for Grecians sake. For the Sicilians liked the Verses of this Poet better then they did any other Grecians Verses of the midst Greece. For if they heard any Rimes or Songs like unto his, they would have them by heart, and one would present them to another with great joy. And therefore it is reported, that divers escaping this bondage, and returning again to ATHENS, went very lovingly to salute Eurypides, and to thank him for their lives: and told him how they were delivered from slavery, onely by teaching them those Verses which they remembered of his Works. Others told him also, how that after the Battell, they scaping by flight, and wandering up and down the Fields, met with some that gave them meate and drinke to sing his Verses. And this is not to be marvelled at, weighing the report made of a Ship of the City of CAUNUS, that on a time being chased in thither by Pirats, thinking to save themselves within their Ports, could not at the first be received, but had repulse: howbeit being demanded whether they could sing any of Eurypides Songs, and answering that they could, were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The newes of this lamantable Overthrow, was not beleaved at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the Haven of PIREA, went and fate him down (as the manner is) in a Barbers Shop, and thinking it had been commonly known there, began to talke of it. The Barber hearing the stranger tell of such matters: before any other had heard of it, ranne into the City as fast as he could, and going to the Governours told the newes openly before them all. The Magistrates thereupon did presently call an Assembly, and brought the Barber before them: who being demanded of whom he heard these Newes, could make no certaine report. Whereupon being taken for a forger of Newes, that without ground had put the City in feare and trouble, he was presently bound, and laid on a wheele, whereon they use to put offenders to death, and so was there tormented a great time untill at last there arrived certain men in the City, who brought too certain Newes thereof, and told every thing how the overthrow came. So as in fine they found Nicias words true which now they believed when they saw all those miseries light fully upon them, which he long before had prognosticated unto them.

How Crassus
came by his Goods.

MARCUS CRASSUS was the Sonne of a Censor, who had also received the Honour of Triumph: but himselfe was brought up in a little House with two other of his Brethren, which were both married in their Fathers and Mothers Life time, and kept House together. Whereupon it came to passe, that he was a man of such sober and Temperate Diet, that one of his Brethren being deceased, he married his Wife, by whom he had Children. For Women, he lived as continent a Life, as any ROMANE of his time: notwithstanding, afterwards being of riper yeares, he was accused by Plotinus to have deflowered one of the Vestall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cause of that suspicion grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleasant Garden hard by the Suburbs of the City, wherewith Crassus was marvellously in love, and would faine have had it good cheape: and upon this onely occasion was often scene in speech with her; which made the People suspect him. But for as much as it seemed to the Judges that his covetousnesse was the cause that made him follow her, he was cleared of the incest suspected, but he never left following of the Nun, till he had got the Garden of her. The ROMANES say there was but that only Vice of covetousnesse in Crassus, that drowned many other goodly Vertues in him: for mine owne opinion me thinks he could not be touched with that Vice alone without others, since it grew so great, as the note of that onely did hide and cover all his other Vices. Now to set out his extreme covetous desire of getting, naturally bred in him, they prove it by two manifest Reasons. The first, his manner and meanes he used to get: and the second, the greatnesse of his Wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then three hundred Talents. And during the time that he dealt in the Affaires of the Common-wealth, he offered the Tenth of all his Goods wholly unto Hercules, kept open House for all the People of ROME, and gave also to every Citizen of the same as much Corne as would keepe him three Moneths: and yet when he went from ROME to make Warre with the PARTHIANS, himselfe being desirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the summe of seven thousand one hundred Talents. But if I may with licence use evil speech, writing a troth: I say he got the most part of his Wealth by Fire and Bloud, raising his greatest revenue of publique Calamities. For when Sylla had taken the City of ROME, he made portsale of the Goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gave most, terming them his booty, onely for that he would the Nobility and greatest men of Power in the City should be partakers with him of this Iniquity: and in this open Sale Crassus never left taking of Gifts, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassus perceiving that the greatest decay commonly of the buildings in ROME came by Fire, and falling down downe of Houses, through the overmuch weight by number of Stories built one upon another: bought bond men that were Masons, Carpenters, and these devisors and builders, and of those he had to the number of five hundred. Afterwards, when the fire tooke any House, he would buy the House while it was a burning, and the next Houses adjoining to it, which the Owners sold for little, being then in danger as they were, and a burning: so that by proceesse of time, the most part of the Houses in ROME came to be his. But notwithstanding that he had so many Slaves to his Workmen, he never built any House from the ground, saving his own House wherein he dwelt: saying, that such as delighted to build, undid themselves without the helpe of any Enemy. And though he had many Mines of Silver, many Ploughs, and a number of Hinds and Ploughmen to follow the fame: yet all that commodity was nothing, in respect of the profit his Slaves and bondmen brought him daily in. As Readers, Scriveners, Goldsmiths, Bankers, Receivers, Stewards of households, Carvers, and other such Officers at the Table, taking paines himselfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to instruct them what they should doe: and to be short, he thought the greatest care a good Housholder ought to have, was to see his Slaves or Servants well taught being the most lively Carrell and best Instruments of a mans House. And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake: that all things must be done by Servants, and his Servants must be ruled by him. For we see that the Art and Skill to be a good Husband, when it consisteth in Government of things without life or sence, is but a base thing, onely tending to gaine: but when it dependeth upon good order and government of men, me thinks then it is to know how to Govern well a Common-wealth. But as his judgment was good in the other, so was it very bad in this: that he thought no man rich and wealthy, that could not maintaine a whole Army with his owne proper goods. For the Warre (as King Archidamus was wont to say) is not made with any certainty of expence: and therefore there must no sufficiency of riches be limited for the maintenance of the fame. But herein Marinus and he differed farre in opinion: who having allowed every ROMANE fourteen Acres of Land (called with them, Jugera) understanding that some were not pleased, but would have more, made them this answer: The gods forbid any ROMANE should thinke that Land little, which indeed is enough to suffice for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was courteous to strangers, for his House was open to them all, and he lent his Friends Moeay without interest: but when they brake day of Payment with him, then would he roundly demand his Money of them. So, his courtesie to lend many times without interest, did more trouble them, then if he had taken very great Usury. Indeed when he bade any man to come to his Table, his fare was but even ordinary, without all excess: but his fine and cleanly Service, and the good entertainment he gave every man that came to him, pleased him better, then if he had beene more plentifull of diet and Dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefly studied Eloquence, and that sort specially that best would serve his turne to speake in open presence: so that he became the best spoken man in ROME of all his time, and by his great industry and diligent indeavour excelled all them that even by nature were most apt unto it. For some say, he had never so small nor little a Cause in hand, but he alwaies came prepared having studied his Cause before for pleading: and oftentimes also when Pompey, Casius, and Cicero refused to rise and speake to matters, Crassus would defend every Cause, if he were requested. And therefore was he generally beloved and well thought of, because he shewed himselfe painefull, and willing to helpe every man. Likewise was his gentleness marvellously esteemed, because he saluted every body curteously, and made much of all men: for whomsoever he met in the Streets that spake to him as he passed and saluted him, were he never so meane, he would speake to him againe, and call him by his Name. It is said also he was very well studied in Stories, and indifferently scene in Philosophy, specially in Aristotles Workes, which one Alexander did reade unto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by using of Crassus company: for it were hard to say, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Crassus, or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his friends he would ever have Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a Hat to cover his head by the way: but so soone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to see that he making profession of Philosophy as he did, the poore man being in great poverty, did not place poverty in things indifferent. But hereof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marinus being now of greater Power, and coming on directly towards ROME, every man suspected straight their coming was for no good to the Common-wealth, but as appeareth plainly, for the death and destruction of the Noblest men of ROME. For it so fell out indeed, that they slew all the chief men they found in the City, among whom Crassus Father and his Brother were of the number, and himselfe being at that time but young, escaped the present danger onely by flight. Furthermore, Crassus hearing that they laied waite to take him, and that the Tyrants sought him in every place, Crassus tooke three of his Friends in his company and ten Servants onely, and fled into SPAIN with all possible speed, where he had been with his Father before, and had got some Friends when he was Prætor, and ruled the Countrey. Nevertheless, seeing every body afraid, and mistrusting Marinus cruelty; as if he had been at their doores, he durst not bewray himselfe to any man; but went into the Fields, and hid him in a great Cave being within the Land of one Vibius Piciacus by the Sea side, from whence he sent a man of his to this Piciacus, to seele what good will he bare him, but specially for that his Victuals began to fail him. Vibius hearing that Crassus was safe, and had escaped, became very glad of it: and understanding how many Persons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not himselfe to see him, but called one of his Slaves (who was his Receiver and occupied occupied that ground for him (and bringing him neare the place where Crassus was, commanded him every night to provide meate for Supper, to bring it ready dressed to this Rocke whereunder was the Cave, and make no words of it, neither be inquisitive for whom it was; for if he did he should die for it, and otherwise, for keeping the thing secret as he commanded, he promised to make him a free man. This Cave is not far from the Sea side, and is clofed in round about with two Rockes that meet together, which receive a soft coole winde into them. When ye are entred into the Cave, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownesse thereof are many other Caves of great receipt one within another, and besides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a Well of passing good water running hard by the Rocke, and the naturall rifts of the Rockes also receiving the light without, where they meet together, do send it inward into the Cave. So that in the day time it is marvellous light, and hath no dampe ay, but very pure and drie, by reason of the thickeffe of the Rocke, which fendeth all the moistnesse and vapour into that springing Well. Crassus keeping close in this Cave, Vibius receiver brought Victuals thither daily to relieve him and his company, but saw not them he brought it to, nor could understand what they were: and yet they saw him plainly, observing the houre and time of his coming when he brought the same. He provided them no more then would even necessarily serve their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheere withall: for Vibius was bent to entertaine Crassus as honourably as he could possiblie, in so much as he considered he was a young man, and therefore reason would he should offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to relieve his necessity only, he thought that rather a part of feare, then any shew of love towards him. One day he tooke two faire young Damfels, and brought them with him to the Sea side: and when he came to the Cave, shewed them where they should get up, and bad them not be afraid. Crassus at the first, when he saw the young Wenches, was afraid he had been betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whom they fought. They being instructed by Vibius what they should say, answered, that they fought their Master that was hidden there. Then Crassus knew this was Vibius mirth to shew him courtesie: so he received them into his Cave, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius understand by them what he lacked. Fenestella writeth, that he saw one of them when she was an old Woman, and that he had heard her tell him this Tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this Cave eight Moneths) understanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made himselfe to be known, there repaired a great number of Souldiers unto him, of whom he onely chose two thousand five hundred, and with them passed by many Cities, and sacked one called MALACA, as divers do write; but he flatly denied it, and stoutly contrariated them that affirmed it. And afterwards having gotten Ships together, went into AFRICK, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great Army together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but jarring with him, went unto Sylla, who welcomed and honoured him as much as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwards arriving in ITALY, intending to employ all the young Nobility he had in his company, gave every one of them Charge under him, and sent Crassus into the Countrey of the MARS IANS, to leave men of Warre there. Crassus desiring certaine Bands of Sylla to aide him, being driven to passe by his Enemies: Sylla answered him angrily againe: I give thee thy Father, thy Brother, thy Friends and Kinsmen to aide thee, whom they most wickedly have slaine and murdered, and whose deaths I pursue with more revenge of mine Army upon those bloody murderers that have slaine them. Crassus being nettled with these words, departed thence presently, and stoutly passing through his Enemies, leaved a good number of Souldiers: and was ever after ready at Sylla's commandement in all his Warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention betwixt him and Pompey. For Pompey being younger then Crassus, and borne of a wicked Father in ROME, whom the People more hated then ever they did man: came yet to great honour by his valiancy, and by the notable Acts he did in the Warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honour many times, which he feldome did unto them that were his Elders, nor yet unto those that were his equals: as to rise up when he came towards him, to put off his Cap, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant-Generall. And this galled Crassus to the heart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of Warre at that time, and also because these two Vices that were bred in him misery and covetousnesse, drowned all his Vertue and well doing. For at the sacke of the City of TUDER, which he tooke, he privily got the most part of the spoile to himselfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last Battell of this Civill Warre (which was the greatest and most dangerous of all other) even before ROME it selfe, the Wing that Sylla led, was repulsed and overthrowne: but Crassus that led the right Wing, overcame his Enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his Victory, and demanded Victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great desame, for buying, or begging, the confiscate goods of the Outlawes appointed to be slaine, for little or nothing. And it is said also, that he made one an Outlaw in the Countrey of the BAUR IANS, without Sylla's privy or commandement, onely to have his goods. But Sylla being told of it, would never after use him in any open Service. Surely this is a strange thing, that Crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, and could creep into any mans favour, was yet himselfe easie to be won through flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is said of him that he had this property: that though himselfe was as extremely covetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproved and utterly disliked them that had his own humor of avarice. Pompey's honour that he attained unto daily, by bearing great Charge and rule in the Warres, Warres, did greatly trouble Crassus: both because he obtained the Honour of Triumph before he came to be Senator, and also for that the ROMANS commonly called him, Pompeius Magnus, to say, Pompey the Great. Crassus being in place on a time when one said that saw Pompey coming, See, Pompey the Great is come. And how great I pray ye, said he scornfully? howbeit despairing that he could not obtaine to match him in the Warres, he gave himselfe unto the affaires of the City: and by his paines and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of Money to them that needed, and by helping of them that sued for any Office, or demanded any thing elle of the People, he attained in the end to the like estimation and Authority that Pompey was come unto, by his many Noble Victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For Pompey's Fame and Power was greater in ROME, when himselfe was absent: and contrariwise when he was there present, Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed then he. Pompey carried a great Majesty and gravity in his manner of Life, would not be seen often of the People, but kept from repairing to open places, and would speake but in few mens causes, and that unwillingly: all to keepe his favour and credite whole for himselfe, when he stood in need to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to many, because he kept continually in the Market-place, and was easie to be repaired unto by any man that required his helpe, daily following those exercises, endeavouring himselfe to pleasure every man: so that by this easie access and familiarity, for favour and good will, he grew to exceed the gravity and Majesty of Pompey. But as for the worthinesse of their Persons, their Eloquence of speech, and their good grace and countenance: in all those (it is said) Pompey and Crassus were both able. And this envie and emulation never carried Crassus away, with any open malice or ill will. For though he was sorry to see Pompey and Cesar honoured above him: yet the worne of ambition never bred malice in him. No, though Cesar when he was taken by Pirates in ASIA (as he was once), and being kept Prisoner cried out aloud: O Crassus, what joy will this be to thee, when thou shalt hear I am in Prison! This notwithstanding, they were afterwards good friends, as it appeareth: for Cesar being ready on a time to depart out of ROME for Prætor into SPAIN, and not being able to satisfie his Creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to stay and arrell his Carriage: Crassus, in that time of need forooke him not, but became his surety for the summe of eight hundred and thirty Talents. In fine, all ROME being divided into three Factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cesar and Crassus (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his fidelity was greater then his Authority: and his Vertue more wondered at then practised) in so much as the gravest and wisest men tooke part with Pompey. The liveliest youthes, and likeliest to run into desperate attempts, they followed Cesar's hope. Crassus keeping the middelt of the Streame, was indifferent to them both; and oftentimes changed his minde and purpose. For in matters of Government in the Common-weale, he neither shewed himselfe a constant Friend, nor a dangerous Enemy: but for gaine, was easly made friend or foe. So that in a moment they saw him praise and reprove, defend and condemne, the same Lawes, and the same men. His estimation grew more, through the Peoples feare of him, then for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the answer that one Scinius (a very busie headed man, and one that troubled every Governor of the Common-weale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not busie with Crassus amongst the rest: and how it happened that he so scaped his hands? O, said he, he carried hay on his borne. The manner was then at ROME, if any man had a curst Bullocke that would strike with his horne, to winde hay about his head, that the People might beware of him when they met him. The commotion of Fencers, which some call Spartacus Warre, their wasting and destroying of ITALY came upon this occasion. In the City of CAPUA, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of Fencers at unrebated Foiles, whom the ROMANS call Gladiatores, whereof the most part were GAULES and THRACIANS. These men were kept locked up, not for any fault they had committed, but onely for the wickednesse of their Master that had brought them and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the Sharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to steale away: but their conspiracy being beyrayed, threescore and eightene of them entred into a Cooks House, and with the Spits and Kitchen-knives, which there they got, went quite out of the City. By the way they fortuned to meete with Carts laden with Fencers Weapons, that were brought from CAPUA, going to some other City: those they also tooke by force, and arming themselves therewith, got them then to a strong place of situation. Where amongst themselves they chose three Captaines, and one Spartacus a THRACIAN borne (and of those Countrey men, that go wandering up and down with their Heards of Beasts, never staying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not onely valiant, but strong made withall, and endued with more wisdom and honesty, then is commonly found in men of his state and condition: and for civility and good understanding a man more like to the GRECIANS then any of his Countrey men commonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came first to ROME to be sold for a Slave, there was found as he slept a Snake wound about his face. His Wife seeing it, being his owne Countrey woman, and a wife Woman besides, posselt with Bacchus spirit of Divination: said plainly that it did signifie, that one day he should be of great Power, much dread, and have very good successe. This same Woman Prophetesse was then with him, and followed him likewise when he fled. Now first they overthrew certaine Souldiers that came out of CAPUA against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their Armour and Weapons, made them Spartacus with glad to take the Fencers Weapons, which they threw away as vile and unseemly. After that, the ROMANS sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in their men.

Fort, situate upon a Hill that had a very steepe and narrow ascent unto it and kept the passage up to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was nothing but high Rockes hanging over, and upon them great store of wilde Vines. Of them the bondmen cut the strongest strips, and made thereof Ladders, like to these Ship Ladders of Ropes, of such a length and so strong, that they reached from the top of the Hill even to the very bottome: upon those they all came safely down saving one that tarried above to throw down their Armour after them, who afterwards by the same Ladder saving himselfe last of all. The ROMANES mistrusting no such matter, these bondmen compassed the Hill round, assailed them behinde, and put them in such a feare with the sudden onset, as they fled upon it every man, and so was their Campe taken. Thereupon divers Heardmen and Shepherds that kept Cattell hard by the Hill, joynd with the ROMANES that fled, being strong and hardy men: of which some they armed, and others they used as Scouts and Spials to discover. Upon this overthrow was sent another Captaine from ROME, called Publius Varinius, against these bondmen: who first overcame Furius, the Lieutenant of Varinius in Battell, and two thousand of his men: and after that againe they slew one Cossinius, and overthrew a great Army of his, being joynd with Publius Varinius, as his fellow and Counsellor. Spartacus having intelligence that Cossinius was bathing himselfe at a place called the salt Pits, had almost taken him tardy, having much ado by flight to save himselfe: notwithstanding, Spartacus wan all his Carriage at that time, and having him hard in chafe, tooke his whole Campe with great slaughter of his men, among whom Cossinius selfe was slaine. Spartacus having thus now in sundry Battells and Encounters overcome the Praetor himselfe, Publius Varinius, and at the length taken his Sergeants from him that carried the Axes before him, and his owne Horse whereon he rode himselfe: was grown then to such a power, as he was dreaded of every man. Yet all this notwithstanding, Spartacus wisely considering his own force, thinking it not good to tarry till he might overcome the Power of the ROMANES, marched with his Army towards the ALPES, taking it their best way after they had passed them over, every man to repaire home to his owne Countrey, some into GAULE the rest into THRACIA. But his Souldiers trusting to their multitude, and perswading themselves to do great things, would not obey him therein, but went againe to spoile and overrun all ITALY. The Senate of ROME being in great perplexity, not only for the shame and dishonour that their men should be overcome in that sort by Slaves and Rebels, but also for the feare and danger all ITALY stood in besides: sent both the Consuls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as unto as difficult and dangerous a War, as any that could have happened unto them. This Gellius one of the Consuls, setting suddenly upon a Band of the GERMANES, which in a bravery and contempt as it were dispersed themselves from their Campe, put them to the Sword every man. Lentulus, his Colleague and fellow Consul on the other side, compassed in Spartacus round with a great Army: but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the Army, gave them Battell, overthrew them, and tooke all their Carriage. Hereupon, marching on still with his Army towards the ALPES, Cassius the Praetor and Governor of GAULE about the Po, came against him with an Army of ten thousand men. Spartacus joynd Battell with him, and overcame him. Cassius having lost a great number of his men, with great difficulty saved himselfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Cassius overthrow, were marvellously offended with the Consuls, and sent commandement unto them, to leave off the Warre: and thereupon gave the whole Charge thereof unto Marcus Crassus, who was accompanied in his Journey with many noble young Gentlemen of honourable Houses, both for that he was marvellously esteemed, and also for the good will they bare him. Now went Crassus from ROME, and camped in ROMANIA, tarrying Spartacus coming, who was marching thitherward. He sent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two Legions, to fetch a compass about to intrap the Enemy behind: straightly commanding him to follow Spartacus tereward, but in no case to offer him Skirmish nor Battell. But Mummius notwithstanding this straight commandement, seeing some hope given him to do good, set upon Spartacus, who gave him the overthrow, slew numbers of his men, and moe had slaine, saving that certaine of them saved themselves by flight, having onely lost their Armour and Weapons. Hereupon Crassus was grievously offended with Mummius, and receiving his Souldiers that fled, gave them other Armor and Weapons: but yet upon sureties, that they should keepe them better thenceforth, then they had before done. Now Crassus of the five hundred that were in the first Rankes, and that first fled, them he divided into fifty times ten, and out of every one of those he put one of them to death, as the Lot fell out: renewing againe the Ancient discipline of the ROMANES to punish cowardly Souldiers, which of long time before had not been put in use. For it is a kinde of death that bringeth open shame withall: and because it is done in the face of the Campe, it maketh all the residue afraid to see the terrour of this punishment. Crassus having done execution in this sort upon his men, led his Army against Spartacus, who still drew backe, untill he came to the Sea side through the Countrey of the LUCANIANS, where he found in the straight of the far of MESSINA, certaine Pirates Ships of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And having put two thousand men into SICILIA, he then revived the Warre thereof the Slaves, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked small provocation to begin it againe. But these Pirates having promised Spartacus to passe him over thither, and also taken Gifts of him, deceived him, and brake their promise. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the Sea side, went and camped within a little Ile of the RHUGIANS. Crassus coming thither to seeke him, and perceiving that the nature of the place taught him what he should doe, determined with a Wall to choke up the barre or Channell entering into the little Island, both to keepe his men occupied from idleness, idleness, and his Enemies also from Victuall. This was a marvellous hard and long piece of Worke, notwithstanding Crassus finished it beyond all mens expectation in a very short time, and brought a Trench from one side of the Sea to the other overthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fiftene foote broad, and so many in height; and upon the top of this Trench built a high Wall, of a marvellous strength, whereof Spartacus at the first made light account, and laughed at it. But when Pillage began to fail him, and travelling all about the Ile for Victualls, perceiving himselfe to be shut in with this Wall, and that there was no kinde of Victualls to be had within all the compass of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boysterous night, the winde being very great, when it snowed exceedingly. Set his men on worke, and filled up a piece of the Trench (being a small breadth) with Earth, Stones and boughes of Trees, whereupon he passed over the third part of his Army. Crassus at the first then became afraid, lest Spartacus would have taken his way directly toward ROME. but he was soone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling against Spartacus, went and camped of themselves by the Lake of LUCANIA, which water by report hath this variable property, that at certaine times it changeth and becometh very sweete, and as some other times againe so salt and brackish as no man can drinke it, Crassus going to set upon them, drave them beyond the Lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very farre, because Spartacus came presently to the rescue with his Army, who stayed the chafe. Crassus had written Letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, and Pompey out of SPAIN, whereof he then repented him, and made all the possible speed he could to end this Warre before either of them came thither; knowing, that which of them so ever came to his helpe, to him would the People give the Honour of ending this Warre, and not to himselfe. Wherefore he first determined to assaile them that had revolted from Spartacus, and camped by themselves, who were led by Caius Cassius, and another called Cassius. So Crassus sent six thousand Footmen before to take a Hill, commanding them to lie as close as they could, that their Enemies might not discover them; and so they did, and covered their Morians and Head-pieces as well as might be, from being seene. Nevertheless they were discovered by two Women doing Sacrifice for the safety of their Army, and thereupon were all in great hazard of casting away, had not Crassus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gave the Enemies the cruellest Battell that ever they fought in all that Warre. For there were slaine of the Slaves at that Battell twelve thousand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the rest slaine in the place of their Rankes, valiantly fighting where they were set in Battell Ray. Spartacus after this overthrow, drew towards the Mountaines of PETRELY, whither Quintus one of Crassus Lieutenants, and Scrofa his Treasurer followed him, still Skirmishing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned suddenly upon them, made the ROMANES flee that still harried his men in that sort, and hurt Scrofa Crassus Treasurer so sore, that he hardly escaped with Life. But the vantage they had of the ROMANES by this overthrow, fell out in the end to the utter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitive bondmen, grew to such a stoutnesse and pride of themselves, that they would no more flee from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their Leaders and Captaines; but by the way as they went, they compassed them in with their Weapons, and told them, that they should goe backe againe with them, whether they would or not, and be brought through LUCANIA against the ROMANES. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had received Newes that Pompey was coming, and that divers were Suters for him at ROME to be sent in this Journey, saying, that the last Victory of this Warre was due to him, and that he would dispatch it at a Battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as neare the Enemy as he could, and made his men one day cast a Trench; which the bondmen seeking to prevent, came with great fury, and set upon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hot Skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side, so that Spartacus in the end perceiving he was forced unto it, put his whole power in Battell Ray. And when he had set them in order, and that they brought him his Horse he was wont to ride on he drew out his Sword, and before them all slew the Horse dead in the place, saying: If it be my Fortune to win the Field, I know I shall have Horses enow to serve my turne; and if I chance to be overcome, then shall I need no more Horses. After that, he slew in among the ROMANES, thinking to attaine to fight with Crassus, but he could not come neare him; yet he slew with his owne hands two ROMANE Centurions that resisted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forsooke him and fled, so as Spartacus was left alone amongst his Enemies; who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in pieces. Now though Crassus Fortune was very good in this Warre, and that he had shewed himselfe a Noble and Valiant Captaine, venturing his Person in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the Honour of ending this Warre: for the Slaves that escaped from this last Battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeys hands, who made an end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus, had overcome the Slaves in Battell, but that he himselfe had pulled up that Warre even by the very roots. After this Pompey made his entrie into ROME, and Triumphed for his Victory of Sertorius, and the Conquest of SPAIN, Crassus also sued not for the great Triumph, neither thought he the small Ovation Triumph on foote, which they granted him, any Honour unto him, for overcoming a few fugitive bondmen. But for this small Triumph whereby he was called Ovation, how much it differed from the great Triumph, see Marcellus Life, wherein we have at large discoursed thereof. Now

Pompey being called to be Consul; Crassus, though he stood in good hope to be chosen Consul with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was ever desirous to make Crassus beholding to him: whereupon he dealt friendly for him, and spake openly in the Assembly of the City, that he would no lesse thanke the People to appoint Crassus his Companion and fellow Consul with him, then for making himselfe Consul. But notwithstanding they were both Consuls together in Office, their friendship held not, but were ever at jarre, and the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship without any memorable Act done, saving that Crassus made a great Sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open Feast for the People of Rome of a thousand Tables, and gave to every Citizen Come to finde him three Moneths. But in the end of their Consulship, at a Common-Councell holden, there was a Knight of Rome called Octavius Aurelius (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the State, and kept most in the Country) who getting up to the Pulpit for Orations, told the People what a Vision he had seene in his Dreame. Jupiter (saith he) appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus and Pompey out of their Office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the words, but the People commanded them to be Friends. Pompey sate still, and said never a word to it. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, and turning him to the People, told them aloud: My Lords of Rome, I doe nothing unworthy of my selfe, to seeke Pompeys friendship and favour first, since you your selves have called him the Great, before he had any haire upon his face, and that ye gave him the honour of Triumph before he was Senator. And this is all that Crassus did of any account in his Consulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it over without any Act done. For he reformed not the Senate, Mustered not the men of Warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the Peoples goods, although Lucius Catulus was his Colleague and fellow Censor, as gentle a Person as any of that time that lived in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entrie into his Office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent Act to bring EGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMANS, Catulus did stoutly withstand him: whereby disension falling out between them, they both did willingly resigne their Office. In that great conspiracy of Catiline, which in manner overthrew the whole State and Common-wealth of Rome, Crassus was had in some jealousie and mistrust, because there was one of the Confederates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gave no credite unto him. Yet Cicero in an Oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassus and Cesar, as Confederates with Catiline: howbeit this Oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the Oration he made also, when his Office and Authority of Consul ceased, he said: that Crassus came one night to him, and shewed him a Letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassus ever after hated him: and that he did not openly revenge it, the let was by meanes of his Sonne. For Publius Crassus much favouring Eloquence, and being given to his Booke, bare great good will unto Cicero: in such sort, that upon his banishment he put on changed Garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youths to do the like also, and in fine, perswaded his Father to become his Friend. Cesar now returning to Rome from the Province he had in government, intended to sue for the Consulship: and perceiving that Pompey and Crassus were againe at a jarre, thought thus with himself, that to make the one of them his Friend to further his sute, he should but procure the other his Enemy: and minding therefore to attaine his desire with the favour of them both, sought first the means to make them friends, and perswaded with them, that by their controvercie the one seeking the others undoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus and Cato; of the greater Authority, who of themselves were of no power, if they two joyned in friendship together: for making both their Friends and Factions one, they might rule the State and Common-wealth even as they would. Cesar having by his perswasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, joyning their three Powers in one, made themselves unvincible, which afterwards turned to the destruction of the People and Senate of Rome. For he made them not onely greater then they were before, the one by the others meanes: but himselfe also of great power through them. For when they began to favour Cesar, he was straight chosen Consul without any denial: and so behaved himselfe in the Consulship, that at the length they gave him charge of great Armies, and then sent him to governe the GAULES: which was, as a man may say, even themselves to put him into the Cattle that should keepe all the City in subjection: imagining that they two should make spoile and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a Government. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error, was nothing else, but his extreame ambition. But as for Crassus, besides his old Vice of covetousnesse rooted in him, he added to that a new avarice and desire of Triumphs and Victories, which Casars fame for prowess and noble Acts in Warres did thoroughly kinde in him, that he being otherwise his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferiour: which fury tooke such hold as it never left him, till it brought him unto an infamous end, and the Common-wealth to great misery. Thus Cesar being come out of his Province of GAULE unto LUCA, divers ROMANS went thither to see him, and among other Pompey and Crassus. They having talked with him in secret, agreed among them to devise to have the whole power of Rome in their hands: so that Cesar should keepe his Army together: and Crassus and Pompey should take other Provinces and Armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus should againe sue the second time to be Consuls, and that Casars Friends at Rome should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his Souldiers to be there at the day of chusing the

the Consuls. Thereupon Pompey and Crassus returned to Rome to that end, but not without suspicion of their practise: for there ranne a rumour in the City, that their meeting of Cesar in Luca, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he meant to make suite to be Consul. Pompey answered them: Peradventure he did, peradventure he did not. They asking him againe the same question: he answered, he would sue for the good men, not for the evil. Pompeys answers were thought very proud and haughty. Howbeit Crassus answered more modestly, that if he saw it necessary for the Common-wealth, he would sue to be Consul: if not, that he would not stand for it. Upon these words, some were so bold to make suite for the Consulship, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left off their suite for feare of them. Domitius onely excepted: whom Cato so prayed and intreated, as his Kinsman and Friend that he made him to seeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their liberty, and how that it was not the Consulship Crassus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a Tyrannie: and that they sued not for the Office, but to get such Provinces and Armies into their hands as they desired, under colour and countenance of the Consulship. Cato ringing these words into their eares, and believing it certainly to be true as he said, brought Domitius as it were by force into the Market-place, where many honest men joyned with them: because they wondered what the matter meant, that these two Noble men should sue the second time to be Consuls, and why they made suite to be joyned together, and not to have any other with them, considering there were so many other worthy men, meete to be Companions with either of them both in that Office. Pompey fearing he should be prevented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to chuse the Consuls, Domitius going early in the morning before day, accompanied with his Friends to the place where the Election should be: his man that carried his Torch before him, was slaine by some whom Pompey had laid in waite, and many of the company hurt, and among others, Cato. And having thus dispersed them, he beset a House round about whither they fled for succour, and inclosed them there, untill they were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the Pulpit for Orations and drave Cato out of the Market-place, and slew some of them that resisted and would not flie. They also then prolonged Casars Government of the GAULES for five yeares more, and procured for themselves by Decree of the People, the Countries of SYRIA and SPAIN. Again, when they drew Lots together, SYRIA fell to Crassus, and SPAIN to Pompey. Every man was glad of their Fortune. For the People on the one side were loath Pompey should goe farre from Rome: and himselfe also loving his Wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so near her, that he might remain the most part of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other rejoiced most at his hap, that he should go into SYRIA: and it appeared plainly that he thought it was the happiest turne that ever came to him; for he would ever be talking of the Journey, were he in never so great or strange company. Furthermore being among his Friends and Familiars, he would give out such fond Boasts of it, as no young man could have made greater vaunts: which was cleane contrary to his yeares and nature, having lived all his life time as modestly, and with as small ostentation as any man living. But then forgetting himselfe too much, had such fond conceits in his head, as he not onely hoped after the Conquest of SYRIA, and of the PARTHIANS; but flattered himselfe, that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against King Tigranes, and Pompey against King Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to Conquer the BAETRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean Sea towards the East, though in the Decree passed by the People, there was no mention made of any Warres against the PARTHIANS. Now every man saw Crassus ambition and greedy desire of Honour: in so much as Cesar selfe wrote unto Crassus out of GAULE, commending his Noble intent and forwardnesse, and wished him to go through therewith. But Atticus one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (having divers other Confederates with him to further his purpose, who much disliked that any man of a bravery and lustinesse should make Warre with any Nation or People that had no way offended the ROMANS, but were their Friends and Confederates) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pompey to assist and accompany him out of the City, because he was of great Authority and much revered of the People, as it appeared then. For though multitudes of People were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his departure and to cry out upon him: yet when they saw Pompey go before him, with a pleasant smiling countenance, they quieted themselves, and made a lane for them, suffering them to passe on, and said nothing. This notwithstanding, Atticus the Tribune stepped before them, and commanded Crassus he should not depart the City, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiving Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commanded then one of the Officers to lay hold of him, and to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the Officers to do it. So the Sergeant dismissed Crassus. Then Atticus running towards the Gates of the City, got a Chafindish with Coales, and set it in the midst of the Street. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certain perfumes, and made sprinklings over it, pronouncing horrible Curses, and calling upon terrible and strange Names of gods. The ROMANS say, that those manner of Curses are very ancient, but yet very secret, and of so great force, as he that is once cursed with that Curse can never escape it, nor he that useth it doth never prosper after it. And therefore few men do use it, and neuer but upon urgent occasion. But then they much reprov'd Atticus, for using these dreadful Ceremonies and extreme Curses, Curfes, which were much hurtfull to the Common-wealth, although he for Countries sake had thus curfed Crassus. Crassus setting forward notwithstanding, failed on, and arrived at BRUN-DUSIUM, when Winter stormes had not left the Seas, and he had lost many of his Ships: howbeit he landed his Army, and marched through the Countrey of GALATIA. There he found King Deiotarus, a very old man, and yet building a new City: and to taunt him prettily, said unto him:

What, O King, begin you to build now in the afternoon? To whom the King of the GALATI-ANS againe smiling made answer: and truly Sir Capitaine, you go not very early (methinks) to make Warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Crassus was threescore and upward, and yet his face made him seeme elder then he was. But to our Story againe. Crassus being come into the Countrey, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he easily built a Bridge upon the River of Euphrates, and passed his Army over it without any let or trouble. So entering into MESOPOTAMIA, he received many Cities that of good will yielded themselves unto him. Howbeit there was one City named ZENODOTIA, whereof Apollonius was Tyrant, where Crassus lost a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole Army thither, tooke it by force, sacked their goods, and fold the Prisoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this City ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Imperator, to say, soveraigne Capitaine: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a base minde, as one that had small hope to attaine to great things, making such reckoning of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seven thousand of his Footmen in Garrison in those Cities that had yielded unto him, and about a thousand Horsemen, he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his Sonne Publius Crassus to him out of CAULE from Julius Caesar, who had given him such honours, as Generals of ROME did use to give such vaunt Souldiers for reward of their good Service: and brought unto his Father a thousand men of armes, all choise men. This me thinks was the greatest fault Crassus committed in all his enterprise of that Warre. For when he should presently have gone on still, and entered into BABYLON and SELEUCIA, (Cities that were ever Enemies unto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, and gave them leasure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe, they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, seeming rather to leade a Merchants life then a Chieftaines.
For he never saw his Army, nor trained them out to any Martiall Exercice, but fell to counting the revenue of the Cities, and was many daies busily occupied weighing of the Gold and Silver in the Temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that: he sent to the People, Princes, and Cities about him, to furnish him with a certaine number of men of Warre, and then he would discharge them for a Summe of Money. All these things made him to be both ill spoken of, and disliked of every Body. The first token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this god-desse Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Juno, and others, that she is the Mother and chiefe cause that giveth beginning of moisture to every thing that cometh forth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cause also of every good thing. For as Crassus the Father, and Sonne both, were coming out of the Temple, Crassus the younger fell first on his face, and the Father afterwards upon his Sonne. Likewise as he was gathering his Garrisons together, calling them out of the Cities into the Field, there came Ambassadors unto him from Arsaces King of the PARTHIANS: who delivered him their message in few words, and told him, that if this Army he brought came from the ROMANES to make Warre with their Master, then that he would have no peace nor friendship with them, but would make mortall Warres against them. Further, if it were (as he had heard say) that Crassus against the Peoples minds of ROME, for his own covetous desire, and peculiar profit was come in a jollity to make Warre with the PARTHIANS, and to invade their Countrey: then in that respect Arsaces would deale more favourably, in consideration of Crassus yeares, and was contented also to suffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in Prison, then in Garrison within his Cities. Thereto Crassus couragiously answered, that he would make them answer in the City of SELEUCIA. Therewith Vagiles, one of the eldest Ambassadors fell a laughing, and shewing Crassus the palme of his hand, told him thus: Haire will sooner grow in the palme of my hand, Crassus, then you will come to SELEU-CIA. In this sort the Ambassadors tooke their leave of Crassus, and returned to their King Hy-rodes, telling him he was to prepare for Warre. In the meane space, certain of Crassus Souldiers whom he had left in Garrison in the Cities of MESOPOTAMIA, having escaped marvellous dangerously and with great difficulty, brought him news of importance, having themselves seene the wonderfull great Campe of the Enemies, and their manner of fight in the assaults they made to the Cities where they lay in Garrison. And, as it falleth out commonly among men escaped from any danger, making things more fearefull and dangerous then they be indeed, they reported that it was impossible by flying to save themselves, if they did follow in chase: neither to overtake them also if they fled. And further, that they had such kinde of Arrowes, as would flie swifter then a mans Eye could discern them, and would pierce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who shot them. Besides, for the Horsemens Weapons they used, that they were such, as no Armour could possible hold out: and their Armours on the other side made of such a temper and mettall, as no force of any thing could pierce them through. The ROMANES hearing these newes, fell from their former stoutnesse and courage, being borne in hand before, that the PAR-THIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, whom Lucullus had overcome and spoiled so oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made account, that their their greatest paines in this warre, was but the tediousnesse of the journey they had to make, and the trouble they should have to follow those men that would not abide them. But then contrary to expectation, they looked to come to stroaks, and to be lustily fought withall. Hereupon, diverse Captaines and head-Officers that had charge in the Army (among whom Crassus the Treasurer was one) advised Crassus to stay, and to deliberate in council to know whether he were best to go on, or to remaine where he was. The Soothsayers themselves did partly let Crassus understand, that the gods shewed no good tokens in all their sacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Crassus gave no ear to them, neither would hear any other that told him as much, but only lifted to them that counselled him to make haft. Yet Crassus chiefest comfort and incouragement, was of Ariabazes King of ARMENIA, who came to his Campe with six thousand horse, which were but only the Kings Corner and Guard. Againe, he promised him other ten thousand horsemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thousand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counseled Crassus to enter the PAR-THIANS Countrey upon ARMENIAN side: because his Campe should not only have plenty of victuals, which he would send him out of his Countrey, but for that he should also march in more safety, having a Countrey full of mountains and woods before him; very ill for horsemen, which was the onely strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Crassus coldly thanked Ariabazes for his good will, and all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his journey through MESO-POTAMIA, where he had left many good souldiers of the ROMANES. And thus departed the King of ARMENIA from him. But now as Crassus was passing his Army upon the bridge he had made over the River of Euphrates, there fell out sudden strange and terrible crackes of thunder, with fearful flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: moreover, out of a great black cloud came a wonderfull storme and tempest of wind upon the bridge, that the marvellous force thereof overthrew a great part of the bridge, and carried it quite away. Besides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twice stricken with two great thunder-claps. One of his great horse in like case, being bravely furnished and set out, tooke the bit in his teeth, leapt into the River with the rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and never seen after. They say also, that the first Eagle and Ensigne that was to be taken up when they marched, turned backe of it selfe, without any hands laid upon it. Further it fortuned that as they were distributing the victuals unto the souldiers, after they had all passed over the bridge, the first thing that was given them, was salt and water linctels, which the ROMANES take for a token of death and mourning, because they use it at the funerals of the dead.

After all this, when Crassus was exhorting his souldiers, a word escaped his mouth that troubled the Army marvellously. For he told them, that he had broken the bridge which he had made over the River Euphrates, of purpose, because there should not a man of them returne backe againe. Where indeed when he had seene that they tooke this word in ill part, he should have called it in againe, or have declared his meaning, seeing his men so amazed therat: but he made light of it, he was so wilfull. In the end he made ordinary sacrifice for the purging of his Army: and when the Soothsayer gave him the intrails of the beast that was sacrificed, they fell out of his hands. Crassus perceiving that the standers by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them. You see what age is: yet shall you not seemy sword fall out of hand. So having ended his sacrifice, he began to march forward into the Countrey by the Rivers side, with seven legions of footmen, and little lacke of foure thousand horse, and in manner as many shot and sling lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his Scouts that had viewed the Countrey, and told him there was not an enemy to be seene in the field, howbeit that they had found the track of a marvellous number of horse, which seemed as if they were returned backe. Then Crassus first of all began to hope well: and his souldiers also they fell to despise the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Crassus his treasurer ever perswaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refresh his Army a little in one of the Cities where he had his Garrison, untill such time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or else that he would march directly towards SELEUCIA by the River side, which lay fit for him to victual himselfe easily by boates that would alwayes follow his Campe and should be sure besides that the enemies could not environ him behind, so that having no way to set upon them but before, they should have none advantage of them.
Crassus going about then to consult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes unto him, a Capitaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtil fellow, which was the greatest mischief and evil that fortune could send to Crassus at that present time, to bring him to utter ruine and destruction. For there were some of Crassus souldiers that had served Pompey before in that Countrey, who knew him very well, and remembered that Pompey had done him great pleasures: whereupon they thought that he bare good will to the ROMANES. But Ariamnes had been laboured at that time by the King of PARTHIANS Capitaine, and was won by them to deceive Crassus, and to entice him all he could to draw him from the River and the Wooddy Countrey, and to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compass him in with their horsemen, for they meant nothing lesse then to fight with the ROMANES at the swords point. This barbarous Capitaine Ariamnes coming to Crassus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Crassus Army, reproving him that he came too slowly forward, tracting time in that sort as he did, preparing himselfe as though he had need of Armour and weapon, and not of feet and hands swift and ready against the enemies: who (for the chiefest of them) had of long time occupied themselves to fit with their best moveables, towards the desarts of SCYTHIA and HYRCANIA. Therefore if you determine (said he) to fight, it were good you made haft to meet them, before the King have gathered all his power together. For now you have but Surena and Sylaces, two of his Lieutenants against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you, that you follow him not: and for the King himself, behold he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lyes in all. For King Hyrodes had divided his Army in two parts at the first, whereof himself took the one, and went to spoil the Realm of ARMENIA, to be revenged of King Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surena against the ROMANES, nor for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not like he would disdain to come to battell with him, being one of the chiefeft Noblemen of ROME), and to think it more honourable to make war with King Artabazes in ARMENIA: but I think rather he did it of purpose to avoide the greater danger, and to keep far off, that he might with safety see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turn the ROMANES backe again. For Surena was no mean man, but the second person of PARTHIA next unto the King, in riches, reputation, valour and experience in wars, the chiefeft of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena when he did but remove into the Countrey onely with his household, had a thousand Camels to carry his Sumpters, and two hundred Coaches of Curtifans, a thousand men of Armes armed at all peeces, and as many mo besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine and Court made above ten thousand horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancestors, his Office was at the first proclaiming of any King, to put the Royall Crown or Diadem upon the Kings head. Moreover, he had restored King Hyrodes that then reigned, to his Crown, who had been before driven out of his Realm: and had won him the great City of SELEUCIA, himself being the first man that scaled the walls, and overthrew them with his own hands that resisted him. And though he was under thirty years of age, yet they counted him a wife man, as well for his counsel as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he overcame Crassus: who through his rashnesse and folly at the first, and afterwards for very fear and timoroufness, which his misfortune had brought him unto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariamnes having then brought Crassus to believe all that he said, and drawn him by perswasion from the River of Euphrates, unto a goodly plain Countrey, meeting at first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sands where their feet funke deep, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could discern by eye, so that not onely extreame thirst, and miserable way marvelously amazed the ROMANES, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight upon: that above all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For neither farre nor neere any sight of Tree, River, Brooke, Mountain, Grasse, or green Herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endlesse sea of desert sands on every side round about their Campe. Then began they to suspect that they were betrayed. Again, when news came that Artabazes King of ARMENIA, was kept in his Countrey with a great warre King Hyrodes made upon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towards ARMENIA, that both their Armies being joyned together, they might the better fight with King Hyrodes; if not, that he would alwayes keep the Woody Countrey, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountains: Crassus was so willfull, as he would write no answer to it, but angrily told the messenger, that he had no leisure then to hearken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwards he would be avenged well enough of Artabazes treason. Cassius his Treasurer was much offended with Crassus for his answer: howbeit perceiving he could do no good with him, and that he took every thing in ill part, he said unto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARMENIANS aside, he rebuked him roundly, and said: O thou wretch, what cursed devil hath brought thee to us, and how cunningly hast thou bewitched and charmed Crassus, that thou hast made him bring his Army into this endlesse desert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captain of thieves, then for a Generall and Confull of the ROMANES? Ariamnes being crafty and subtil, speaking gently unto Cassius, did comfort him, and prayed him to have patience; and going and coming by the bands, seeming to help the souldiers, he told them merily: O my fellows, I believe you think to march through the Countrey of NAPLES, and looke to meet with your pleasant springs, goodly groves of wood, your natural baths, and the good Innes round about to refresh you, and do not remember that you passe through the deserts of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMANES a while: but afterwards he dislodged betimes, before he was openly known for a traytour, and yet not without Crassus privy, whom he bare in hand, that he would goe and set some broile and tumult in the enemies Campe. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his Tent not in his coat armour of Scarlet (as the manner was of the ROMANES Generalls) but in a black coat: howbeit, remembering himself, he straight changed it againe. It is said moreover, that the Ensigne-bearers when they should march away, had much ado to plucke their Ensignes out of the ground, they stuck so fast. But Crassus scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to march forward, compelling the footmen to go as fast as the horsemen, till a few of their Scouts came in, whom they had sent to discover: who brought newes how the enemies had slaine their fellows, and what ado they had themselves to scape with life, and that they were a marvellous great Army, and well appointed to give them battell. This newes made all the Campe afraid, but Crassus felle more then the rest, so as he began to set his men in battell ray, being for hast in manner besides himselfe. At the first following Cassius mind, he set his ranks wide, casting his souldiers into a square battell, a good way asunder one from another, because he would take in as much of the plaine as he could, could, to keep the enemies from compassing them in, and so divided the horsemen into the wings. Yet afterwards he changed his mind againe, and straighted the battell of his footmen, fashioning it like a brick, more long then broad, making a front and shewing their faces every way. For there were twelve Cohorts or Ensignes imbatellled on either side, and by every Cohort a company of horse, because there should be no place left without aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be alike defended. Then he gave Cassius the leading of one wing, his son Publius Crassus the other, and himself led the battell in the midst. In this order they marched forward, till he came to a little brook called Salissus, where there was no great store of water, but yet happily lighted on for the souldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painfull way, where they had met with no water before. There the most part of Crassus Captaines thought best to Campe all night, that they might in the meane time find meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Crassus yielding to his sons and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to march on with his Army, and to set upon the enemies presently: commanded, that such as would eat, should eat standing, keeping their ranks. Yet on the suddaine, before this commandment could runne through the whole Army, he commanded them againe to march, not faire and softly, as when they go to give battell, but with speed, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the ROMANES at the first to be so great a number, neither so bravely armed as they thought they had beene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpose hid them, with certaine troops he sent before: and to hide their bright armour, he had cast cloaks and beasts skins over them, but when both the Armies approached near the one to the other, and that the signe to give charge was lift up in the aire: first they filled the field with a dreadful noise to hear. For the PARTHIANS do not encourage their men to fight with the sound of a Horne, neither with Trumpets nor Howboies, but with great Kettle Drums hollow within, and about them they hang little Bells and Copper rings, and with them they all make a noise every where together; and it is like a dead found, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wild beast, and a fearful noise as if it thundred, knowing that hearing is one of the senses that soonest moveth the heart and spirit of any man, and maketh him soonest beside himselfe. The ROMANES being put in feare with this dead found, the PARTHIANS straight threw the cloathes and coverings from them that hid their armour, and then shewed their bright Helms and Curaces of Margian tempered Steele, that glared like fire, and their horses barbed with Steele and Copper. And Surena also, General of the PARTHIANS, who was a goodly personage, and as valiant as any other in all his host, though his beauty somewhat effeminate, in judgement shewed small likelihood of any such courage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the fashion of the MEDES, contrary to the manner of the PARTHIANS, who let their haire grow after the fashion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appear more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS, at the first thought to have set upon the ROMANES with their Pikes, to see if they could break their first ranks. But when they drew neare, and saw the depth of the ROMANES battell standing close together, firmly keeping their ranks, then they gave backe, making as though they fled, and dispersed themselves. But the ROMANES marvelled when they found it contrary, and that it was but a device to environ them on every side. Whereupon Crassus commanded his shot and light armed men to assaile them, the which they did: but they went not far, they were so beaten in with Arrowes end driven to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both feared and troubled the ROMANES, when they saw the vehemency and great force of the enemies shot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it never so hard or soft. The PARTHIANS thus still drawing backe, shot altogether on every side, not aforehand, but at adventure: for, the battell of the ROMANES stood so neare together, as if they would, they could not misse the killing of some. These Bowmen drew a great strength and had big strong Bowes, which sent the Arrowes from them with a wonderful force. The ROMANES by meanes of these Bowes were in hard state. For if they kept their ranks, they were grievously wounded: againe, if they left them, and sought to run upon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand with them, they saw they could do them but little hurt, and yet were verily likely to take the greater harme themselves. For as fast as the ROMANES came upon them, so fast did the PARTHIANS flie from them, and yet in flying continued still their shooting: which no Nation but the SCYTHIANS could better do then they, being a matter indeed most greatly to their advantage. For by their flight they best do save themselves, and fighting still, they thereby shun the shame of that their flying. The ROMANES still defended themselves, and held it out so long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leave fighting when they had spent their Arrowes, or would joyne battell with them. But after they understood that there were a great number of Camels laden with quivers full of Arrowes, where the first that had bestowed their Arrowes, fetched about to take new quivers: then Crassus seeing no end of their shot, began to faint, and sent to Publius his son, willing him in any case to charge upon the enemies, and to give an onser, before they were compassed in on every side. For it was on Publius side, that one of the Wings of the enemies battell was nearest unto them, and where they rode up and down to compass them behind. Whereupon Crassus sonne taking thirteenth hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thousand were of the men of Armes whom Julius Caesar sent) and five hundred shot, with eight Ensignes of footmen having Targets, most neare to the place where himselfe then was: he put them out in breadth, that wheeling about they might give a charge upon them that rode up and down. But they seeing him coming, turned straight their horse and fled, either because they met in a Marish, or else of purpose to beguile this young Crassus, inticing him thereby as far from his father as they could. Publius Crassus seeing them flie, cried out, These men will not abide us; and so spurred on for life after them: so did Censorinus and Megabacbus with him (the one a Senator of Rome a very eloquent man, the other a stout courageous valiant man of war) both of them Crassus well approved friends, and in manner of his own years. Now the horsemen of the ROMANS being trained out thus to the chafe, their footmen also would not abide behind, nor shew themselves to have lesse hope, joy and courage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had been won, and that there was no more to do, but to follow the chafe: till they were gone far from the Army, and then they found the deceit. For the horsemen that fled before them, suddenly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set upon them. Whereupon they stayed, thinking that the enemies perceiving they were so few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they set out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, and made their light horsemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping up and down the plain, whirled up the sand hills from the bottome with their horse feet, which raised such a wonderful dust, that the ROMANS could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being thrust up into a little roome, and standing close one to another, were sore wounded with the PARTHIANS Arrows, and died of a cruell lingering death, crying out for anguish and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting themselves upon the sand, they brake their Arrows sticking in them. Againe, striving by force to plucke out the forked Arrow heads that had pierced farre into their bodies through their veines and sinewes, thereby they opened their wounds wider, and so cast themselves away. Many of them died thus miserably martyred: and such as died not, were not able to defend themselves. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and besought them to charge the men at Armes with the barbed horse, they shewed him their hands fast nailed to the Targets with Arrows, and their feet likewise shot through and nailed to the ground: so as they could neither flie nor yet defend themselves. Thereupon himselfe encouraging his horsemen, went and gave charge, and did valiantly set upon the enemies, but it was with too great disadvantage, both for offence, and also for defence. For himselfe and his men with weake and light staves, brake upon them that were armed with Curaces of Steele, or stiffe Leather jackets. And the PARTHIANS in contrary manner with mighty strong Pikes gave charge upon these GAULES, which were either unarmed, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crassus most trusted, having done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they received the PARTHIANS Pikes in their hands, and took them about the middles, and threw them off their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not stir for the weight of their harnesse: and there were diverse of them also that lighting from their horse, lay under their enemies horse bellies, and thrust their swords into them. Their horse flinging and bounding in the aire for very paine threw their masters under feete, and their enemies one upon another, and in the end fell dead among them. Moreover, extreme heate and thirst did marvellously comber the GAULES, who were used to abide neither of both: and the most part of their horse were flaine, charging with all their power upon the men at Armes of the PARTHIANS, and so ranne themselves in upon the points of their Pikes. At the length, they were driven to retire towards their footmen, and Publius Crassus among them, who was very ill by reason of the wounds he had received. And seeing a sand hill by chance not farre from them, they went thither, and setting their horse in the midst of it, compassed it in round with their Targets, thinking by this meane to cover and defend themselves the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the Country being plain, they in the foremost ranks did somewhat cover them behind, but they that were behind, standing higher then they that stood foremost (by reason of the nature of the hill that was highest in the midst) could by no meanes save themselves, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miseries and misfortune, that must needs die without revenge, or declaration of their valiancy. At that present time there were two GRECIANS about Publius Crassus, Hieronymus, and Nichomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the City of CARRES: they both counselled Publius Crassus to steale away with them, and to flie to a City called ISCHUS, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMANS part. But Publius answered them, that there was no death so cruel as could make him forsake them that died for his sake. When he had so said, wishing them to save themselves, he embraced them, and tooke his leave of them: and being very sore hurt with the shot of an Arrow through one of his hands, commanded one of his Gentlemen to thrust him through with a sword, and so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Censorinus did the like. But Megabacbus flue himselfe with his owne hands, and so did the most part of the Gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left alive, the PARTHIANS got up the sand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their Speares and Pikes, and took but five hundred prisoners. After that, they stroke off Publius Crassus head, and thereupon returned straight to set upon his Father Crassus, who was then in this state. Crassus the Father, after he had willed his son to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and pursued the chafe: and perceiving also that they that remained in their great battell, did not presse upon him so neare as they did before, because that a great number of them were gone after the other for rescue: he then began to be lively againe, and keeping his men close, retired with them the best he could by a hills side, looking ever that his sonne would not be long before that he returned from the chafe. But Publius seeing himselfe in danger, had sent divers messengers to his Father, to advertise him of his distresse, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and slew by the way; and the last messengers engers he sent, scaping very hardly, brought Crassus newes, that his sonne was but east way, if he did not presently aid him, and that with a great power. These newes were grievous to Crassus in two respects: first for the fear he had, seeing himselfe in danger to lose all: and secondly, for the vehement desire he had to go to his sons helpe. Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power to the rescue of his Son. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his Sons overthrow, with a more dreadful noise and cry of victory, then ever before: and thereupon their deadly founding drummes filled the aire with their wonderful noise. The ROMANS then looked straight for a hot alarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Crassus head upon the point of a Lance, coming neere to the ROMANS, shewed them his head, and asked them in derision, if they knew what house he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (said they) that so noble and valiant a young man, should be the Son of so cowardly a Father, as Crassus. The sight of Publius Crassus head killed the ROMANS hearts more then any other danger they had been in at any time in all the battell. For it did not let their hearts on fire as it should have done, with anger, and desire of revenge: but far otherwise, made them quake for feare, and stroke them stark dead to behold it. Yet Crassus selfe shewed greater courage in this misfortune, then he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by every band he cried out aloud: The griefe and sorrow of this losse (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine onely: but the noble successe and honour of Rome remaineth still unvincible, so long as you are yet living. Now if you pity my losse of so noble and valiant a Son, my good souldiers, let meintreat you to turn your sorrow into fury: make them dearly buy the joy they have gotten: be revenged of their cruelty, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why, aspiring minds sometime must needs sustain losse. Lucullus overcame not Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, but their blood did pay for it. Our ancestors in old time lost a thousand ships, yea in ITALIE divers armies and Chiefteines for the conquest of SICILIA: yet for all the losse of them, at the length they were victorious over them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of Rome came not to that greatness it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble and adversity, never yeelding or giving place unto any danger. Crassus using these persuasions to encourage his souldiers for resolution, found that all his words wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commanded them to give the shout of battell, he plainly saw their hearts were done, for that their shout rose but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other side their shout was great, and lustily they rang it out. Now when they came to joyne, the PARTHIANS Archers on horsebacke compassing in the ROMANS upon the wings, shot an infinite number of Arrows at their sides. But their men at Armes giving charge upon the front of the ROMANS battell with their great Lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in desperate manner ran in among them, as men rather desiring so to die; then to be flaine with their Arrows, where they could do the PARTHIANS almost no hurt at all. So were they soon dispatcht, with the great Lances that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with such a force, as oftentimes they ran through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, saying, they would give Crassus that nights respite, to lament, and bewaile his Sonnes death: unlesse that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his safety to come and offer himselfe to King Arfaces mercy, then to tarry to be brought unto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMANS, were in very good hope to overthrow him the next morning. The ROMANS on the other side had a marvellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dresse their wounded men that died in miserable pain: but every man bewailed his hard fortune, when they saw not one of them could escape, if they tarried till the morning. On the other side, to depart in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieve them much. Because, to carry them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leave them so behind, their pitiful cries would give the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now though they all thought Crassus the onely author of their misery, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to hear him speake. But Crassus went aside without light, and laid him down with his head covered, because he would see no man, shewing thereby the common sort an example of unstable fortune: and the wife men, a good learning to know the fruits of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to command so many thousand men, but thought (as a man would say) himselfe the meanest of all other, and one that posselt nothing, because he was accounted inferiour unto two persons onely, Pompey and Cesar. Notwithstanding, Octavius one of his Chiefteines, and Cassius the Treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so overcome with sorrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirit in him, they themselves called the Capitaines and Centurions together, and late in counsell for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarrying for them. Thus of their owne authority at the first they made the Army march away without any sound of Trumpet or other noise. But immediately after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the Campe remove, fell a crying out and tormenting themselves in such sort, that they filled the whole Campe with sorrow, and put them out of all order with the great moane and loud lamentation: so as the foremost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a marvellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and set upon them. Then turning off, and setting themselves in battell ray, one while loading their beasts with the wounded men, another while unloading them againe, they were left behind, having three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the City of CARRES. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the walls, and spake in the Latine tongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Governour of the Town, that Crassus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and said no more, neither told he what he was: but rode on still, till he came to the bridge which Crassus had made over Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gave to the watch to tell Coponius, served Crassus turn very well. For Coponius thought by this great haste of his, and the short confused speech he made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight Armed his fouldiers, and understanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meet him, and brought him and his Army into the City of CARRES. The PARTHIANS knew well enough of the removing of the ROMANES Campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their Campe where they lay, slew all that were left behind, which were above four thousand men: and riding after them that were gone, took many stragglers in the plaine. Among them there was Barguminius, one of Crassus Lieutenants, who stayed in the night out of the Army with four whole Ensignes, and having lost his way, got a hill, where the PARTHIANS besieged him, slew him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himselfe: yet twenty of them onely escaped, who with their swords drawn in their hands, running forwards with their heads, thrust in among the thickest of the PARTHIANS, They wondering at their desperation, opened of themselves, and suffered them to march on towards the City of CARRES. In the meane time false newes was brought to Surenas, how Crassus with all the chieft men of his host was fled, and that the great number that were received into the City of CARRES were men of all forts gathered together, and not a man of any quality or estimation. Surenas thereupon thinking he had lost the honour of his victory, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the truth, that he might either besiege the City of CARRES, or pursue after Crassus: sent one of his interpreters to the walls of the City, charging him to call for Crassus or Cassius, and to tell them that Surenas would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commanded. Word was brought to Crassus, and he accepted parlenec. Shortly after also, thither came certaine fouldiers of the ARABIANS from the Campe of the PARTHIANS, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by sight, having divers times seen them in their Campe before the battell. These ARABIANS seeing Cassius upon the walls told him, that Surenas was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go safely, as his masters good friends, so that they would surrender Mesopotamia into the King of the PARTHIANS hands; and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather then to be enforced unto it by extremity. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassus and Surenas should meet to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made answer they would do it; and so departed. Surenas hearing this, was glad he had them at such advantage, where he might besiege them. The next day he brought all his Army before the City of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS marvellously reviled the ROMANES, and told them, they must deliver them Crassus and Cassius bound hands and feet, if they would have any grace or peace with them. The ROMANES were marvellously offended that they were thus deceived, and told Crassus that it was no boote any longer to look for aide of the ARABIANS, but presently to fle: howbeit to keep in secret in any wise from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Crassus self had told it to Andromachus the veriest traitor and villaine in all the City, whom he had chosen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus advertised the enemies in every point, of their purpose and departure. But because the PARTHIANS do never use to fight in the night, and that it was a hard matter to bring them to it; and againe that Crassus departed in the night time: Andromachus was afraid lest the ROMANES would win such ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not possibly overtake them the next day. Therefore of purpose he sometime brought them one way, other while another way, and at the last, brought them into a great Bogge or Marish, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they must needs make many turnes, and returns before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, some in the Army began to mistrust, that Andromachus meant no good, to turne and toss them up and down in that fort, and therefore would follow him no more: inso much as Cassius among others, returned towards the City of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counselled him to tarry there till the Moone were out of the signe of Scorpio, he answered them: I fear the signe of Sagittary more. So as soon as he could, he took his way towards ASSYRIA with five hundred horsemen. And other of the Army also having faithful guides, recovered a Country of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retired into a safe place before the break of day: and they were about five hundred men, whom Octavius a noble man had in charge. But the day stole upon Crassus, hunting up and down yet in the Marish, in those ill favoured places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpose brought him, having with him four Ensignes of footmen all with Targets, and very few horsemen, and five Sergeantes that carried the Axes and Rods before him; with whom, with much ado and great labour he got into the right way when the enemies were almost upon him, and that he was within twelve furlongs of joyning with Octavius. There in haste he had gotten a hill, which was not so steep for horsemen, neither of such strength as the other hills were, called Sinnaces; yet under them, and joyning to them by a long hill that runneth along the plaine, so as Octavius plainly saw the danger Crassus was in. Thereupon he first ran down the hills with a few of his men that followed him: but after also came all the rest, saying they were cowards if they should tarry behind. At their coming they gave such a hot onser upon the PARTHIANS, that they made him give backe from that hill: and comcompassing Crassus in the midst of them, covering him round with their Targets, they spake nobly, that never an Arrow of the PARTHIANS should touch the body of their General, before they were slain one after another, and that they had fought it out to the last man in his defence. Hereupon Surenas perceiving the PARTHIANS were not so courageous as they were wont to be, and that if night came upon them, and that the ROMANES did once recover the high mountaines, they could never possibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Crassus once more by this device. He let certain prisoners go of purpose, before whom he made his men give out this speech that the King of PARTHIA would have no mortal war with the ROMANES; but far otherwise: he rather desired their friendship, by shewing them some notable favour, as to use Crassus very courteously, And to give colour to this brute, he called his men from fight, and going himself in person towards Crassus, with the chieft of the nobility of his host, in quiet manner, his Bow unbent, he held out his right hand, and called Crassus to talke with him of peace, and said unto him: Though the ROMANES had felt the force and power of their King, it was against his will, for he could do no lesse but defend himselfe; howbeit that now he was very willing and desirous to make them taste of his mercy and clemency, and was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go safely where they would. All the ROMANES besides Crassus were glad of Surenas words. But Crassus that had been deceived before by their crafty fetches and devices, considering also no cause apparent to make them change thus suddenly, would not hearken to it, but first consulted with his friends. Howbeit the fouldiers they cried out on him to go, and fell at words with him, saying, that he cared not though they were all slain, and that himselfe had not the heart onely to come down and talke with the enemies that were unarmed. Crassus proved first to pacifie them by faire meanes, perswading them to have a litle patience but till night, which was at hand, and then they might safely depart at their pleasure, and recover the mountaines and freight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint-hearted, nor to despair of their safety, seeing they were so neare it. But in the end Crassus perceiving they fell to mutiny, and beating of their harnesse, did threaten him if he went not: fearing then they would do him some villany, went towards the enemy, and coming backe a litle, said onely these words: O Octavius, and you Petronius, with all you ROMANE Gentlemen that have charge in this Army, you all see now, how I against my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, and can witness with me, how I am driven with shame and force; yet I pray you, if your fortunes be to escape this danger, that ye will report wheresoever you come, that Crassus was slain, not delivered up by his owne fouldiers "into the hands of the barbarous people, as I am, but deceived by the fraud and subtilty of his enemies: Octavius would not tarry behind on the hill, but went down with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his Officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS unto Crassus were two mongrell GRECIANS, who dismounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to send some of his men before, and Surenas would shew them, that both himselfe and his train came unarmed towards him. Crassus thereto made him answer, that if he had made any account of his life, he would not have put himself into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before called the ROSCIANS, to know what number of men, and to what end they met so many together. These two brethren came no sooner to Surenas, but they were slaid, and himself in the mean time kept on his way a horsebacke, with the noblest men of his Army. Now when Surenas came neare to Crassus: Why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? A Consull and Lieutenant General of ROME on foot, and we on horsebacke? Therewithall he straight commanded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus answered Surenas againe: In that they neither of both offended, following the use and manner of their Countrey, when any meeting is made for Treaty of peace. Surenas replied: As for the Treaty of peace, that was already agreed upon between the King Hyrdes and the ROMANES; howbeit that they were to go to the River, and there to set down the Articles in writing: for you ROMANES (said he) do not greatly remember the capitulations you have agreed upon. With those words he gave him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse; You shall not need, saith Surenas; for looke the King doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a freee saddle richly gilt, upon the which his Gentlemen mounted Crassus immediately, and following him behind lashed his horse to make him run the swifter. Octavius seeing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonel of a thousand footmen; and after them, all the rest of the ROMANES also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and to take him from them by force that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last fell to blowes. Then Octavius drew out his sword, and slew one of the barbarous noblemens horsekeepers: and another came behind him and slew Octavius, Petronius had no Target, and receiving a blow on his Curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slew Crassus. Some say notwithstanding that Pomaxathres slew him not, but another; yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fell to the ground. But all these reports are rather conjectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slain in the field fighting for Crassus, and others saved themselves by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them, and told them that Crassus had paid the paine he had deserved; and for the rest, that Surenas had them come down with safety. Then some of them yielded to their enemies, and other dispersed themselves when night came, and of them very few escaped with life. Others being followed and pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sword. So as it is thought there were slain in this overthrow about twenty thousand men, and ten thousand taken prisoners. Surenas had now sent Crassus head and his hand unto Hyrodes the King his master, into ARMENIA, and gave out a brute as farre as the City of SELEUCIA, that he had brought Crassus alive, and that he had prepared a fight to laugh at, which he called his Triumph. Among the ROMANE prisoners, there was one called Caius Pacianus who was very like Crassus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to answer, when any called him Crassus, or Lord Captain. Him they put a horse-back, and had many Trumpets before him, and Sergeants upon Camels backs, that carried axes before him, and bundels of Rods, and many purfes tied to the bundels of Rods, and ROMANE heads newly cut off tied to the Axes: and after him followed all the strumpets and women Minstrels of SELEUCIA, who went singing of songs of mockery and derision of Crassus womannish cowardnesse. Now for these open shewes, every one might see them: but besides that sight, Surena having called the Senate of SELEUCIA together, laid before them Aristides bookes of ribaldry, intituled The Milefians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMANE sardle or truffle called Rufinus. This gave Surena great cause to scorne and despite the behaviour of the *ROMANE*s, which was so far out of order, that even in the warres they could not refrain from doing evil, and from the reading of such vile bookes. Then the Senators of SELEUCIA found that Æsops was a wife man, who said, that every man carried a sacke on his neck, and that they put other mens fautes at the sackes mouth, and their own towards the bottome of the sacke: when they considered that Surena had put the booke of the lascivousnesse of the MILESIANS at the sackes mouth, and a long tale of the PARTHIANS vaine pleasures and delights in the bottome of the sacke, carrying such a number of Carts laden with naughty packes in his Army, as he did, which seemed an Army of Ermits and field-mice. For in the voward and foremost rankes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely Lances, Pikes, Bowes, and horie: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, instruments of musicke, dauncing, singing, banqueting, and roiting all night with Curtizans. I will not deny but Rufinus deserved blame: but yet withall, I say, that the PARTHIANS were shamelesse to reprove these bookes of the vanities of the MILESIANS, considering that many of their Kings, and of the Royall bloud of the Arfacides, were borne of the IONIAN and MILESIAN Curtizans. Things passing thus in this sort, King Hyrodes had made peace and league with Artabazes King of ARMENIA, who gave his Sitter in marriage unto Pacorus, King Hyrodes Sonne, and made great feasts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verse sung, Hyrodes selfe understanding well the Greeke tongue, and Artabazes was so perfect in it, that he himselfe made certaine Tragedies, Orations, and fables, whereof some are yet extant at this day. The same night Crassus head was brought, the Tables being all taken up, Jafon a common Player of enterludes (born in the City of THALES came before the King, and recited a place of the Tragedy of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agave, who strak off his sons head. And as every man took great pleasure to hear him, Syllaces coming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the King, delivered him Crassus head before them all. The PARTHIANS seeing that, fell a clapping of their hands, and made an out-cry for joy. The gentlemen Ushers by the Kings commandement did set Syllaces at the Table. Jafon casting off his apparell representing Pentheus person, gave it to another Player to put it on him; and counterfeiting the BACCHANTES posselt with fury, began to rehearse these verses, with a gesture tune and voice of a man mad and beside himselfe:

A worthy booty and reward, becomming well our paine.*

This marvellously grugged the company, and specially singing these verses afterwards, where the Chorus both asked and answered himselfe:

None else but I thereof may brag.*

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the Table with others, rose straight, and went and took the head himselfe, to whom of right it belonged to say those words, and not unto the player that spake them. King Hyrodes liked this sport marvellously, and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the manner of the Countrey in such a case: and to Jafon he also gave a talent. Such was the successe of Crassus enterprise and voyage, much like unto the end of a Tragedy. But afterwards Hyrodes cruelty, and Surenas foule perjury and craft, were in the end justly revenged upon them both according to their deserts. For King Hyrodes envying Surenas glory, put Surena to death. And Hyrodes fell into a disease that became a dropsie, after he had lost his Sonne Pacorus, who was slaine in a battell by the *ROMANE*s. Phraates his second Sonne, thinking to set his father forwards gave him drinke of the juyce of Aconitum. The dropsie received the poison, and one drave the other out of Hyrodes body, and set him on foot again. Phraates perceiving his father to amend upon it, to make short worke, with his own hands strangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF CRASSUS with NICIAS.

Ut now to proceed to the comparison: first, Nicias goods were more justly gotten, & with less reproach then Crassus wealth; for otherwise a man cannot give any great praise to mineral works, the which are wrought by lew and ill disposed barbarous fellows kept in irons, and toiled to death in unwholesome and pestilent places. But being compared unto Crassus buying of confiscate goods at Syllaces hands, and ungentelemanly bargains of houses on fire, or in danger thereof, surely Nicias trade will appear the better way of getting: for as openly did Crassus avow usury, as tillage. And again for other faults, wherewith Crassus many times was burthened, and which he stoutly denied: as, that he took money of men having matters before the Senate at ROME, to win favour for their side: and that he preferred matters to the prejudice of the confederates of the *ROMANE*s, onely for his private profit; and therefore curried favour with Ladies, and generally sought to cloak all foule offenders: of all these faults was Nicias never so much as once suspected. For he to the contrary, was mocked of every body, because for fear he maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhaps would not have become Pericles nor Aristides, and yet was meet for Nicias, who was borne a timorous natured man, and never had courage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunt afterwards to the people, being accused that he redeemed detractors with money: I am glad, said he, that having dealt thus long in affairs of the State, it is found I have rather given then taken. And now touching expences, Nicias was thought the better and more civil Citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly image to the gods, or in making of publike playes or pastimes to recreate the people. But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small part of that Crassus bestowed in an open feast he made at ROME, feasting so many thousands at one time, and did find and maintaine them also for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at those men, that deny vice to be an inequality and disagreement of manners, repugnant in it self, seeing men may honestly spend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goods. For Nicias doings in the Common-weale he did nothing maliciously, cruelly, nor unjustly, neither any thing of selfe-will or stomacke, but rather dealt plainly and simply. For he was deceived by trusting of Alcibiades, and never came to speake before the people, but with great fear. Crassus on the other side was reproved for his unconfancy and lightnesse, for that he would easily change friends or enemies: and he himselfe denied not, that he came to be Consult the second time by plaine force and cruelty, having hired two murderers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the Assembly the people held for dividing of the Provinces, many men were hurt, and four were slaine in the Market-place: and more then that Crassus himselfe (which we have forgotten to write in his life) gave one Lucius Annalides so fore a blow on the face with his fist, for speaking against him, that he sent him going with blood about his ears. But as Crassus in those things was very fierce and cruel: so Nicias womanish behaviour on the other side, and faint heart in matters of Common-wealth, humbling himselfe to the meanest and most vile persons, deserved great reproach. Where Crassus in this respect shewed himself assuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of small account, as with Cleon or Hyperbolus, but would give no place to Cæsars fame and glory, nor yet to Pompys three Triumphs, but sought to go even with them in power and authority: and had immediately before exceeded Pompys power, in the dignity of Censor. weale, should make themselves to be honored, but not envied, killing envy by the greatnes of their power. But if it were so that Nicias preferred quietnesse, and the safety of his person above all things else, and that he feared Alcibiades in the Pulpit for Orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the fort of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRACIA: he had liberty and scope enough to repose himselfe in the City of ATHENS, and might have forborne the dealing in matters, and (as Rhetoricians say) have put a hood of quietnesse upon his head very well. For doubtlesse, concerning his desire to make peace, it was a godly mind in him, and an act worthy of a noble person, to bring that to passe he did, appealing all warre: wherein Crassus certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had joyned all the Provinces to the Empire of ROME, that reach unto the Caspian sea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIANS. But on the other side also when one hath to deale with people that can discern when a man ruleth according to equity and justice, and that he seeth he is in the prime of his credit and authority: he must not then for lacke of courage suffer wicked men to step in his roome, nor give occasion to preferre such to authority in the Commonweale, as are unworthy for that place and countenance: neither should allow such any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor trust, as Nicias did: who was the onely occasion that Cleon, being before but a prating Orator, was chosen General. Neither do I also commend Crassus, for that in the warre against Spartacus, he made hast to give him battell, more rashly then safely or consideratly. For his ambition spurred him forward, because he was afraid lest Pompeys coming should take from him the glory of all that he had done in that war: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honour of the winning of CORINTH. But besides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compasse of reason, and can no way be excused. For he did not resigne his honour and office of Generall to Cleon his enemy, when there was hope of good successe, or little perill: but fearing the danger of the journey, he was contented to save one, and tooke no care besides for the Common-wealth. Which Themistocles shewed not, in the time of the warre against the PERSIANS. For he, to keep Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckoning beside his eloquence, and extremely covetous) from being chosen Generall of ATHENS, lest he should have overthrown the Common-wealth: secretly bribed him with money to leave off his suite. And Cato also when he saw the state of ROME in greatest danger, sued to be Tribune of the people for the Common-wealths sake. And Nicias in contrary manner, reserving himself to make war with the City of MINOA, or with the Isle of CYTHERA, or with the poor unfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occasion to fight against the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloak, and he left the ships, the Army and munition to the charge and government of Cleons rashnesse and small experience of warre, when the necessity of the service required the wisest and most expert Capitaine. The which he did not, despising the meanes to make him honoured: but it was a plaine drawing back, at time of need to defend his Country. Wherefore afterwards he was compelled against his will to be General, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACUSANS: because the people thought he was not so earnest to dissuade the journey, for that he thought it not meet for the Common-wealth, but because through his sloth and cowardlinesse he would make his Country lose so good an opportunity to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great testimony of his honesty and trust they had in him: who though he ever hated war, and did flie from the Offices of honour and charge in the Common-wealth, his Countymen notwithstanding did alwayes chuse him, as the most experienced person and meetest man of the City. Now Crassus in contrary manner, desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could never attain to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroad in the wars) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authority. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his friends that loved him best, thought him (as the comickall Poet saith:

A good man any way else but in warres.

His ambition notwithstanding, and covetous desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMANES. For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the warre against his will: but Crassus led the ROMANES thither against their wills. So that the Common-wealth fell into misery by the one, and the other through the Common-wealth was brought into misery: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, then to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wise man, and a Capitaine of great experience, could never so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therefore dissuaded his Countymen from the journey: and would give no place to the vain hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking upon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS, as though it had been an easie matter to overcome them, found himself deceived, yet did he aspire to great things. For as Julius Caesar had conquered and subdued to the imperiall Crown of ROME, all the Countreies of the West parts, to say, the GAULES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLAND: even so did Crassus desire to go towards the East parts, to conquer all to the great West sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the Regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as ever courteously behaved themselves to all men: notwithstanding, provoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For when the charge of the warres in the East parts was assigned to Pompey by decree and order of the people, the Senate utterly disliked it, and were against it all they could. When news were brought to ROME that Julius Caesar in battell had overthrown and slaine three hundred thousand GERMAINES, Cato persuading with the Senate, was yet still of this mind, that Caesar should be delivered into the hands of his enemies whom he had overcome, for to be punished: thereby to turn the sharpe revenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, upon him onely that was the unjust breaker of peace. This notwithstanding, the people making none account of of *Cato*s persuasions, made common feasts and processions fifteen dayes together, and open sacrifices to the gods with great joy through the City, to thank them for this famous victory. How glad may we thinke would they have been, and how many dayes would they have feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the Realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SYRE and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new Governments and Provinces to the Empire of ROME?

If a man will needs do wrong and injustice,

As Euryptides saith to them that cannot live in peace, and be contented with their own, he must not then sticke at trifles (as the razing of a Castle of Scandia, or of a City of MENDA, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall Countrey, and hiding themselves like birds without nests, in any other birds holes) but must dearly sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne justice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the Great in his voyage, for the conquests he made in the East, and do dispraise Crassus voyage, do not well to judge of the beginning, by the events and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploits: for he overthrew his enemies in diverse battels, and had almost taken the City of SYRACUSA: and sure they cannot justly blame him for all the misfortunes that chanced in the warre of SICILIA, but partly the plague was cause of it, and partly also the envy of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Whereas Crassus ran into so many errors, and committed such foule parts in all his voyage, that he gave Fortune no leisure to do him good: so that I wonder not so much that his folly was overcome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could overcome the good fortune of the ROMANES. Sithence it so falleth out then, that they both came to like unfortunate end. Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen, by art and rule of Divination; and Crassus contrarily disdainning to observe any thing: sure it falleth out hard in judgement, which of them two proceeded with most safety. Yea according to the best approved opinions, a fault committed of fear is more excusable, then of rashnesse and folly to break any ancient Law or Custome. For their deaths, Crassus end deserved least reproach. For he against his will did yeeld himself, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perswaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraud and treason most traiterously deceived: where Nicias cowardly and dishonourably hoping to save his life, trusting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

having lost few lesse then tenne thousand men in this onely overthrow. Nevertheless, afterwards through practice and policy, they got those Souldiers together againe that were dispersed here and there through ITALY, so as in short time they made their power equal with Othavins force. Marius also being advertised of the same, tooke the Sea incontinently, and returned into ITALY out of AFRICK, and came to Cinna to serve as a private Souldier, under his Captaine and Consull. Now they all liked well, that Marius should be received, saving Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credit and estimation should diminish, Cinna having a worthy Captaine then himselfe to serve him; or else that Marius cruelty and severity (who pardoned none offence) would marre altogether, having no stay in his anger, but bent utterly to all kinde of cruelty to his Enemies, if Cinna for tuned to have the Victory. And thereunto he added this further: that now they had the Victory in manner in their hands, if they once received Marius unto them, he would rob them of all the honour of ending this Warre, and being also in Authority, he was neither to be trusted nor commanded. Whereunto Cinna answered thus: that he thought the words he had alledged to be true, howbeit that he was ashamed; and besides, could not see with honesty how he might refuse Marius, or send him backe, since he had purposely sent for him, to commit part of the charge of these Warres unto him. Sertorius againe replied: Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne good will unsent for, and therefore (as for the best in mine owne opinion) I gave advice not to receive him: but since it is so that you sent for him before, and that he is now come upon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counsell whether you should now receive him, or not. And therefore you must needs accept his service that is come upon your word: for, the bond of your promise past you, doth now cut off all counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they divided their whole Army into three parts, and then began to charge upon their Enemies of all hands, so as they obtained victory. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible cruelty in this Victory, as could possibly be shewed: inasmuch as the ROMANES thought all the miseries they had endured in time of this Warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in respect of the great calamities they fell into afterwards. Now Sertorius on the other side never caused man to be slaine for any private malice, or quarrell he had with any person, neither did he hurt any man when he had overcome, but was much offended with Marius infolency and cruell murders: and when he had good opportunity to speake with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perswasion. In fine, Sertorius seeing Marius guarded with a great number of Bondmen for lacke of other Souldiers in this Warre, whom he used as Executioners of his slaughter and butchery, alwaies attending about his person as a Guard, and suffering them also to make themselves rich, partly with that he gave them, or commanded them to spoile, and partly also with that they violently tooke without his commandement of their owne Masters, killing them when they had done, ravishing their Mistresses, and despoiling their Children: he could no longer abide such wickednesse and villany, but made them all to be slaine in their Campe where they lay together, being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his Sonne (against his counsell, and contrary to the Lawes of ROME) had by force made himselfe Consull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene overcome by Sylla) were come out of GREECE to ROME-wards, partly through the cowardlinesse of their Captaines, and partly also because they were betrayed and sold of their owne men: and further, considering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those Affaires, which waxed worse and worse, by meanes of the Authority of such as had least wit and understanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good Peace, whilst underhand he wanne his Souldiers from him, notwithstanding, that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then utterly despairing of ROMEs prosperity and welfare, departed from ROME to go towards SPAIN, thinking that if he could get the first possession and Government of that Realme, it would at the least be a refuge and receipt for all those of their Tribe that should chance to be banished out of their Countrey. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and passing through a Countrey of Mountaines, the barbarous People inhabiting the same, demanded Tribute of him, for licence to passe through their Territories. Thereat the Souldiers of his Company were marvellously offended, saying: That it were too much shame and dishonour for a Proconsull of ROME, to pay Tribute to vile barbarous People. Notwithstanding, Sertorius passed not for the shame they said it would be to him, but answered them thus: That he bought time, which thing he should not reckon of, that aspired to haughty Enterprises: and so pleased the barbarous People with Money. And thus he made such speede, as he quickly recovered SPAIN, which he found greatly replenished with People, and specially of young men able to wear Armour. But now Sertorius perceiving that they had bene hardly dealt withall before, through the infolency, pride, and covetousnesse of the ROMANE Governours, whom they ordinarily sent from ROME, and that therefore they hated all manner of Government: first of all fought to winne the good wills of all the whole Countreymen one and other. Of the Noblemen, by being familiar and conversant with them: and of the common People, by easing them of their Taxe and Subsidies. But that which bred him most love of all men generally, was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of Souldiers, and receiving of any Garison within their Cities, compelling his Souldiers to set up their Tents, and to make their Cabins without the Suburbs of great Cities, to winter there, and causing also his owne Pavillion

to be first set up, and lay in it himselfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous People in all things to winne their favour: for he armed all the ROMANE Citizens of age to carry Weapon that dwelt in SPAIN, and made them make all sorts of Engines for Battery, and a number of Gallies besides, so that he had all the Cities at commandement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike Munition very dreadfull unto his Enemies. After Sertorius understood that Sylla kept ROME, and that the most part of the Tribe of Marius and Carbo was utterly overthrowne, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a great Army against him: he sent Julius Salinator betimes to keepe the Mountaines Pyrenei, with fixe thousand men well armed. Immediately after Caius Annus also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibility to distresse Salinator in a place of such advantage, was driven to stay at the foote of the Mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune one Calphurnius furnished Launum, traiterously slew Salinator: whereupon his Souldiers forthwith forsooke the top of the Mountaines, and by this meanes Annus had easie passage with his Army which was very great, and overthrew them that resisted his further coming on into the Countrey. Sertorius finding himselfe not strong enough to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men unto the City of New CARTHAGE, and there tooke Sea: from thence he coasted over unto AFRICK, and fell with the Coast of the MAURUSIANS, where his Souldiers landed immediately for fresh water, dispersing themselves without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous People gave Charge upon them, and few numbers of them: inasmuch as Sertorius was driven to imbarque againe, and to take his course towards SPAIN, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driven to take certaine Pirates Boats of the SICILIANS, and to saile towards the Isle of PITYUSA, where he landed in despite of Annus Garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annus thither himself with a good number of Ships, and five thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by Sea, though he had but small Barques, purposely made for swift sailing, and of no strength for fight. But now the west winde rising very big, did swell the Sea in such sort, that it cast the most part of Sertorius Ships (being weak and very light) upon Rocks in the Sea, and himselfe with a few being kept from Land by his Enemies, and from the Sea by Storme, was driven to ride tenne daies together at Anker, working still for life against the danger of the surging waves and boysterous windes, which continued rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed againe, he weighed Anker, and ranne into certaine desolate Isles, where was no water to be had. Then hoisting Saile from thence, he passed the Straight of Gibraltar, and turning on his right hand, landed upon the Coast of SPAIN, lying toward the great Welterne Sea, a little above the mouth of the River of Batis, the which falling into the Sea Atlanticum, gave name in old time to that part of SPAIN, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine Sailers met with him that were newly arrived from the Isles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the Ancients called the fortunate Islands. These two Islands are not far one from another, being but a little arme of the Sea betweene them, and are from the Coast of AFRICK onely tenne thousand Furlongs. They have raine there very seldom, howbeit a gentle winde commonly that bloweth in a little silver dew, which moistneth the Earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lussy, not onely to bring forth all that is set or sown upon it, but of it selfe without mans hand, it beareth so good fruit, as sufficiently maintaineth the Inhabitants dwelling upon it, living idly, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleasant continually, and never hurteth the body, the climate and seasons of the yeare are so temperate, and the aire never extreame: because the windes that blow upon that Land from the other side of the Coast opposite to it, as the North and Easterly winde coming from the Maine, what with their long coming, and then by dispersing themselves into a wonderfull large aire and great Sea, their strength is in manner spent and gone before their coming thither. And for the windes that blow from the Sea (as the South and westerly) they sometime bring little showers with them, which commonly do but moist the ground a little, and make the Earth bring forth all things very trimly: inasmuch as the very barbarous People themselves do faithfully believe, that there are the Elysian Fields, the abode of blessed creatures, which Homer hath so much spoken of. Sertorius hearing report of these Islands (upon a certaine desire now to live quietly out of Tyranny and Warres) had straight a marvellous minde to go dwell there. But when the Pirates of SICILIA (who were no men of peace, but given altogether to spoile and pillage) heard that they by and by forsooke Sertorius, and went into AFRICK, to restore Ascalus the Sonne of Iphtha to his Realme of MAURITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made Warre against Ascalus, and all to the end that his Souldiers seeing matter of new hope and meanes to be employed, should not so leave him, as being forced to be discharged of very necessity. The MAURUSIANS being very glad of his arrivall, he presently went on with his Enterprize, overcame Ascalus in Battell, and besieged the City whereinto upon the overthrow of his Army he was fled for refuge. Sylla being advertised thereof, sent Paccanum thither with an Army to aide Ascalus. Sertorius gave him Battell, slew him in the Field, and wane the rest of his Army, which yielded unto him: then tooke he the City of TINGIS, whereinto Ascalus was fled with his Brethren. The LYBIANS write that Antem is buried there. But Sertorius giving no credit to the tales of the barbarous People of that Countrey, by reason of the greatness of the Tombe they shewed, made it to be broken open round: and finding there the body of a man (as they say) of threecore cubits long, he marvelled at it, and so finishing his Sacrifice to honour the memory thereof, caused the Tombe to be well closed up againe. By this act he did greatly increase the honour of Anteus memory, which the City did unto him, and thereby confirmed the Countreymens report of Anteus. For the TINGIANS do report, that after Anteus death, his Wife Tingalay with Hercules, and had a goodly Sonne by him called Sophax, who was King of that Countrey, and there built this City, giving it his Mothers name. Furthermore, it is said also that this Sophax had a Sonne called Diodorus, who conquered the most part of AFRICK with an Army of the GRECIANS, OLBIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabit those parts. We were willing to imbrace the occasion offered us to speake of this matter as we went, for the honour of Suba, the noblest Historiographer that ever came of Royall blood: for it is thought his Ancestors were lineally descended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as Conqueror now, having the whole Countrey in subjection, did in no wife hurt them that yielded unto him, and put trust in him, but restored them their Goods, Cities, and Government againe, contenting himselfe with that they offered him of their good wills. But then standing doubtfull what way to determine, the LUSITANIANS sent Ambassadors unto him, to intreat him to be their Chieftaine: for they stood in great need of a worthy personage, and a man expert in Wars to defend them against the fury of the ROMANES: and therefore they onely trusted him, hearing of his honourable behaviour, by them that were conversant with him. Whose qualities as we finde written, were these. He was never greatly moved, with feare nor joy: but as he was a resolute man without feare in most danger, so was he most temperate in greatest prosperity. In valiantnesse inferiour to no Captaine of his time, and very quick of execution in every imminent danger. For where any present exploit was to be done, any strong place of advantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to passe over any River, or scape any instant danger, where it stood upon speedy execution, and to shew some stratagem or policy in time and place to supplant the Enemy: in those matters he passingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good service, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithstanding, the foule murder he did in his latter dayes upon certaine young children that were Pledges with him (which doubtlesse was an act of great cruelty, and anger that could not forgive) doth manifestly prove, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfeite it, when both the time and occasion did so require it. But for mine opinion, sure I am perswaded that no misfortune can have power to make perfect Vertue grounded upon good Reason, to worke in any fort contrary to it selfe: neither do I thinke it impossible also, but that mens good wills and gentle natures being injured without cause, may peradventure change their naturall dispositions. Which then proved true in Sertorius, who finding Fortune contrary unto him, and his good happe changed into ill, grew so crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell revenge of them which had villanously betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICK upon the LUSITANIANS offer, who chose him for their Generall, giving him absolute Power and Authority: and so soone as he arrived, he straight leaved men of Warre, and with them subdued the People of SPAIN fronting upon their Marches, of which the more part did willingly submit themselves, upon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valiant man besides in present danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine devices and subtilties to winne their good wills: as among others, the policy and device he had of the Hinde; which was this. There was a poore man of the Countrey called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a Hinde in his way that had newly calved, flying from the Hunters, he let the Damm go, not being able to take her: and running after her Calfe rooke it, which was a young Hinde, and of a strange Haire, for she was all milke white. It chanced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those parts, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him such manner of Presents: as Fruits, Fowle, or Venison, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and also reward them well for the fame. So, this poore man presented Sertorius with this young Hinde, which he gladly received, and which with time he made so tame, that she would come to him when he called her, and follow him where ever he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily sight of such a number of armed Souldiers together as they were, nor yet afraid of the noise and tumult of the Campe. Insomuch as Sertorius by little and little made it a miracle, making the simple barbarous People believe that it was a gift that Diana had sent him, by the which she made him understand of many and sundry things to come: knowing well enough of himselfe, that the barbarous People were men easily deceived, and quickly caught by any subtill superstition, besides that, by Art also he brought them to believe it as a thing very true. For when he had any secret intelligence given him, that the Enemies would invade some part of the Countreys and Provinces subject unto him, or that they had taken any of his Forts from him by any intelligence or sudden attempt, he straight told them that his Hinde spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himselfe in strength. In like manner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a Battell, or that he had any advantage of his Enemies, he would hide the Messenger, and bring his Hinde abroad with a Garland and Coller of Nosegayes: and then say, it was a token of some good newes coming towards him, perswading them withall to be of good cheare; and so did sacrifice to the gods, to give them thanks for the good tidings he should heare before it were long. Thus by putting this superstition into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, insomuch as they thought they were not now governed any more by a stranger wiser than themselves, but were steadfastly perswaded that they were rather led by some certaine god; and so much the more, because because that his deedes confirmed their opinions, seeing his Power daily to increase beyond the hope and expectation of man. For with two thousand and five hundred Souldiers, which he called ROMANES, (although the most of them indeede were AFRICANS, which came over with him out of AFRICK into SPAIN) and foure thousand LUGETANIANS, with seven hundred Horsemen also, he made Warre against foure great Captaines of ROMANS, which had the leading of sixe score thousand Footemen, two thousand Archers, and Sling-men, with a world of Cities and Countreys besides. Where Sertorius at the first had not above twenty at the most, and yet with this small Power to maintain this Warre withall, he did not onely conquer great Countreys and many goodly Cities, but tooke some of the Captaines Prisoners also, whom the ROMANES sent against him. Of which company Cotta was one, whom he overthrew in Battell by Sea, not far from the City of MELLARIA. He also overcame Fidius in Battell, being Governour of SPAIN BETICA, by the River of BETIS, where he slew two thousand ROMANES: by his Treasurer like wife he overcame Lucius Domitius Proconsull of the other Province of SPAIN. And another time he discomfited Toranius another Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he slew in Fight with all his Army. And Metellus selfe, being taken at that time for one of the most expert men of Warre, and chieftest Captaines among the ROMANES: him he put also so oft to distresse, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAULE NARBONENSIS (now Languedocke) to his aide. And they were furthermore driven to send Pompey the Great with all speede from ROME with a new Army, because Metellus knew not what course to take, having to fight with a most valiant man, and one whom he could never either bring to any set Battell, nor yet intrap in the plaine Field (so easily could he cast himselfe into all kinde of formes) by reason of the dexterity and swiftnesse of his Spanishe Souldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched Field, without removing a foote, and to leade an Army heave armed, which could keepe their ranks, and fighting steadily could overthrow their Enemies with hand-brookes; and march upon their bellies. But to climbe up the Mountaines, and to be continually (as it were) charged in the Rereward with these men armed as light as the winde, and to pursue them in chase that fled still and never kept place, it was impossible for them to do it; and much lesse to abide hunger and thirst, to live without a Kitchen and fire, and likewise to lye on the bare ground without Tents or Pavillions, as Sertorius Souldiers did. Furthermore, Metellus being growne an old man (having spent all his youth in service of the Warres, and taken and suffered great paines and troubles, giving himselfe now to quiet and pleasure) was matched with Sertorius, being then even at his best age, and lustiest of body; besides that Nature had made him both strong, active, and temperate withall. For he was never given to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and out of Warres; he was likewise acquainted with paines and hardnesse from his youth, could away with long Journeys, watch many dayes and nights without sleepe, eat little, and content himselfe with any meate that came to hand. And had like never so little leisure, he would continually be on Horse-backe, riding a hunting up and downe the Fields, which made him very ready and expert to know how to winde himselfe out of danger when he was distressed, and contrarily also to compasse in his Enemy upon any advantage: and besides, to see where he might enter, and where not. For this cause was Metellus driven (who was still desirous to fight) to abide the losses and discomforts which they suffer that be vanquished: and Sertorius on the other side refusing Battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they have which chase their Enemies whom they have overcome. For he cut off his Victuals on every side, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward, Sertorius stayed him: and when he lay still in his Campe, Sertorius came and gave him Alarums, and drove him to dislodge. If Metellus laid Siege to any place, Sertorius straight besieged him for want of Victuals: so that his Souldiers were even weary of all together. Whereupon, when Sertorius challenged the Combate of Metellus: Oh, well said, cried all the Souldiers, let Captaine fight against Captaine, and ROMANE against ROMANE. Howbeit Metellus refused him, and the Souldiers laughen him to scorn. Nevertheless he did but smile at them, and therein shewed himselfe a wise man: for as Theophrastus saith, A Captaine must die as a Captaine, not like a private Souldier. Furthermore, Metellus considering that the LANGOBRIANS (who gave aide unto Sertorius in all Services) were easie to be taken for lacke of water (having but one onely Well in all their City) and that whosoever did besiege that same, should straight be master of all the Spring heads of the Suburbs about it, hoping thereby to make the City yeeld unto him within two dayes at the utmost, he commanded his Souldiers to victuall themselves for five dayes onely. But Sertorius having intelligence thereof, gave good direction and speedy order to prevent him. For he caused two thousand Goats skins to be filled with water, and promised round summes of Money for every skin brought thither. Many SPANIARDS and MAURISTANS straight tooke upon them the Enterprize. Thereupon Sertorius chusing the lustiest men among them, sent them away through the Mountaine, commanding them withall, that when they delivered their Goats skins with water unto the Citizens, they should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle People, that the water might last them the longer which defended the City. Metellus receiving advertisement thereof, was much agrieved withall, because his Souldiers Victuals were well neare spent, which they had brought according to his commandement: and therefore he sent Aquinius one of his Lieutenants, with sixe thousand men to get Victuals. Sertorius having intelligence of his purpose, presently laid an Ambush for his returne in a Valley full of wood, and bestowed there three thousand men to set upon the Rereward, whilst he himselfe gave Charge on the Voward. Thus made he Aquinius flie, slew the most part of his men, and

and tooke the rest Prisoners: Howbeit Aquinus selfe the Captaine, having lost his Weapons and Horse, by flying recovered his life: who thereupon was driven with famine to raise his Siege, being mocked of all the Spaniards. For these valiant deeds was Sertorius wonderfully beloved and honoured of all the barbarous People, and specially because he had made them good Souldiers, brought them from their former rude and beastly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the Roman fashion, to keepe their Ranks when they fought, to follow their Ensigne, and to take the Signall and Word of the Battell: inasmuch as he made them then appeare a goodly Army well taught and trained, being before a confused multitude of Theeves and Robbers. Furthermore he divided great store of Gold and Silver among them, shewing them how they should gild their Head-pieces, set out their Shields and Targets with fine Workmanship, and also bravely apparel themselves with rich Cloakes, and sleevelesse Calflocks upon their Armour, teaching them to be fine, and furnished them with Money: whereby he marvellously wanne the hearts of the barbarous People. Yet did he farther bind them unto him, by that he did unto their Children: for he sent generally for all the Noblemen young Sonnes, through all the Countreys and Provinces subject unto him, and brought them to the goodly City of Osea, where he provided them of Schoolemasters to teach them the Greeke and Latine Tongue: bearing their Parents in hand, that it was to no other end; but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be employed in the service of the Common-weale, albeit indeed it was but a fine device of him, to have them as Hostages for their Faith and Loyalty towards him. Then were the Fathers of these Children glad men to see their Sonnes apparelled like Romanes, in faire long Gownes garded with Purple, to goe civilly to the Schooles, that Sertorius payed for their Learning, and that oftentimes he went thither to appoile them, to see how they profited: and how he gave rewards unto them that were the best Scholars, hanging Jewels about their necks, which the Romanes call Bulla. Inasmuch as they having a Custome at that time in SPAIN, that such as were about the Prince or their Chieftaine should die with him when he died: that Custome of voluntary Vow to die with their Lord, being called by the barbarous People, Devotion; there were very few of their Followers and Familiars that would vow to die with other Captaines; but on the other side, thousands commonly followed Sertorius, having vowed to lose their lives with him: And for prooffe hereof it is reported, that when his Army on a time was overthrowne by a certaine City of SPAIN, the Enemies eagerly pursuing him, the SPANIARDS not regarding their owne lives to save his, tooke him upon their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man upon them, till they put him into the City, who being safe and out of danger, they then looked by running to save themselves the best they could. This was Sertorius not only beloved of the SPANIARDS, but of other Souldiers also that came out of ITALY. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same Faction, arrived in SPAIN full of Money, and with a good number of Souldiers, intending to make Warre in his behalfe against Metellus, his Souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his Campe but of Sertorius: the which spighted Perpenna to the heart, being proud and stately by means of his Wealth and Estate, coming of a noble House. Newes being come that Pompey was past over the Mountaine Pyrenei, the Souldiers armed themselves, and plucked up their Ensignes that were fast in the ground, and cried out upon Perpenna to leade them to Sertorius, threatening him that if he would not, they would leave him alone, and seeke them a Captaine that could both save himselfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to follow their mindes, and to leade the three and fifty Ensignes he had with him, to joyne with Sertorius Force. Thus became Sertorius Army very great, and specially after all the Cities on this side the River of Ebrus had yielded unto him. For then came Souldiers to him out of all parts, howbeit they were a rash confused multitude of Omniagerum together, having no reason nor patience to abide time, but cried out in fury, to set upon their Enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, seeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he saw they fell to mutiny, and would needs have their wills, and both without reason and all good order would so go set upon their Enemies: he gave them the head, and let them go as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly; but yet tooke such order and direction, as they should not utterly be cast away, hoping after that to have them the more obedient unto him. And indeed they had their payment as he conjectured: notwithstanding he went to rescue them, and so brought them safe into his Campe. Now to take away the feare and perplexity from them, which this Overthrow perhaps had striken into them, immediately after he caused his whole Army to assemble, as purposing to use some speech unto them. At which time he caused two Horses to be brought and set in the midst among them, the one an old and feeble Jade, and the other a goodly lusty Horse, which besides other things, had a marvellous faire thicke taile. Behinde the old leane Jade, he set a lusty tall Fellow: and behinde the goodly Horse also, he placed a little wearish man, and seeming to fight to have but small strength. Now upon a signe given them which he had made them privie to, the strong man tooke the leane Horse by the taile with all his might, as if he would have plucked it off by the flumpe: and the other wearish man fell to plucking off haire by haire from the great Horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and sweated a great while in vaine at the leane Horse taile, thinking to have plucked it off, and in the end did nothing else but make the lookers on laugh: and that the wearish wretch on the other side in a short space (and at ease) had left the great Horse taile with never a haire on it: Sertorius then rising up, spake in this sort to his Souldiers: Do ye not see (my Friends and Companions) faith he, how time and perseverance exceedeth force? and that things unlikely at the first to be overcome by force, are yet in time by little and little obtained? For continuance overcometh all things, and there is no

Force

Force nor Power, but proesse of time, consumeth and bringeth to nought, being a most certain helpe to them that can take opportunity, and abide time: as in contrariwise haste and rashnesse is as dangerous an Enemy, as may be to them that do things of a head without regard. By these common devices wherewith Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous People, he taught them to abide the opportunity of time. But of all the Stratagems he used in Warre, that onely exceeded all other, which he shewed unto a People called the CHARACITANIANS. The People do dwell on the other side of the River of Tagus, and have neither Cities nor Villages for their common abode, but onely a great high Hill, full of hollow Caves and deepe holes among the Rocks, looking towards the North. At the foote of this Mountaine the Valley is a great slimy ground, and so rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crummeth like white lime, and turneth to dust under his feete. And therefore by means of the same, when those People were afraid of any Enemies, or that they had conveyed the Goods they had robbed and stolne from their Neighbours into those Caves, they thought themselves safe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was impossible to compell them to come out. Now it chanced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this Hill which these barbarous People inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had overthrowne him. But Sertorius, being in a rage with them, and because he would shew that he fled not, tooke his Horse backe the next morning, and rode as neare to the Hill as he could, to view the nature and situation of the place: and when he saw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, and walked up and downe, vainly threatening them to no purpose. Yet going and coming to and fro, he perceived the winde raised a great dust, of that brittle earth we have spoken of, and carried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof, as we said before, lay full upon the North. This Northerne winde which some call Cacia, is the onely winde of all other that most keepeth in that quarter, and riseth from the Moores and Mountaines thereabouts, which be continually covered with snow, and then in the heate of Summer is nourished and inforced by the melting of the yce and snow, and so bloweth a jolly coole winde, which refresheth the barbarous People and Beasts all the day long. Sertorius marking this with himselfe, and understanding by the Inhabitants thereabouts, that this winde blew commonly among them: commanded his Souldiers to gather a great quantity of this light brittle earth together and to raise a Mount of it, right against the other Hill. The barbarous People made a mockery of it at the first, thinking Sertorius would have made a Mount to have fought with them upon it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his Souldiers backe againe into his Campe. The next morning by breake of day there was a pretty little winde stirring, that onely blew off the top of his forced Mount, and the highest part of that masse of earth, as chaffe when they winnow Corne: and as the Sunne began to have any power, the North winde also rose, which forthwith filled all the Hill with dust. And withall came Sertorius Souldiers, who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all those dry clods of clay in pieces. The Horsemen on the other side, they still managed their Horses up and downe in it, to raise up the greater dust, which the winde carried as soone as it rose, and blew into the Caves of these barbarous People, full in their faces, through their holes and rifts of the Rocks. So they having no other vents nor aire any way, but there where the winde blew upon them: it did so blindfold their eyes, and filled their Caves with such a hot stuffing aire, that they were almost choaked withall, not able to take breath. For when they should draw their breaths, this stuffing aire and dust came in at their mouthes so fast, that they had much ado to hold out two daies, and on the third yielded themselves unto Sertorius mercy: the which thing did not so much increase his Power, as it wanne him Honour; by policy to have wonne such an unlikely Conquest, which by force could never have beene gotten; and where to fight was a matter impossible. So long therefore as he made Warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the advantage of him, because Metellus was an old man and heavey, and could not resist Sertorius lusty youth, that led a light Army, like rather to a company of Theeves and Robbers, than to an Army of men of Warre. But afterwards when Pompey was come over the Mountaine Pyrenei, and that both of them were encamped each before other, and that Pompey had shewed him all the Stratagems and Policies of Warre possible for a good Captaine to devise, and he the like unto Pompey, and found that Sertorius had the better of him, both in laying his Ambushes, and also in foreseeing to intrap him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be so great, that even in Rome it selfe he was thought to be the noblest Captaine, and of best conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwards also waxed greater, by the noble acts he did under Sylla, who gave him the Surname of Pompey the great, for that he deserved the honour of Triumph before his beard was growne. So, when he was come thus into SPAIN, divers Townes and Cities subject unto Sertorius, were halfe in minde to yeeld unto Pompey: but afterwards they altered againe, upon the chance that happened unto the City of LAURON, beyond all expectation. For Sertorius being gone to lay siege to it, Pompey in haste went thither with his Army to raise the Siege. Neare unto the City there was a little Hill very commodious to lodge a Campe in, and also to distresse them of the City: wherupon the one made haste to get it, and the other to keepe him from it. Notwithstanding, Sertorius was the first man, and got the Hill: and Pompey came even as he had taken it, who was very glad it had so fallen out, thinking to have made Sertorius sure at that time, being kept in on the one side with the City of LAURON, and with his Army on the other. Thereupon he sent unto the Citizens, and bade them care for nothing, more then to stand upon their Walls at their pleasure, to see Sertorius straightly besieged, who thought to have besieged them; them. This Message being brought to Sertorius, he smiled at it, and said, that he would teach Sylla's young Scholars (for so in mockery he called Pompey) that a wife Capitaine should rather see behind then before him: and therewithall he shewed the LAURONITANS five thousand Footmen well armed, which he had left in his Campe when he came to take the Hill where he was; to the end that if Pompey came by chance to assaile him, they should give a Charge upon his Rereward. Pompey having found this too late, durst not offer Sertorius Battell, fearing to be compassed in behinde: and on the other side he was ashamed to forsake the LAURONITANS, whom he was driven in the end to see utterly spoyled and destroyed before his eyes, and durst not once stir to helpe them. The barbarous People of the Countrey part seeing no hope of aide by him: yielded straight unto Sertorius, who did not onely pardon them, but also suffered them to goe whither they would. Howbeit he burnt the City, for no anger or cruelty (being a Capitaine that never shewed cruelty in anger) but to shame Pompey withall, and to stop their monthes that made such account of him: and that this brute might runne among the barbarous People; that Pompey himselfe being present, and might in manner have warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly City of his Confederates, neither durst nor could helpe them. Indeed Sertorius in continuance of this Warre sustained much losse and great hurt, howbeit it was alwaies through the fault of his Lieutenants: for, as touching himselfe, he was never overthrowne, nor those he led. And yet he ever wanne more honour in recovering of those Battells which his Captaines lost, then his Enemies did that had put them to the worfe. As in the Battell he wanne against Pompey, by the City of SUCRON: and in another he wanne against Pompey and Metellus both by the City of TUTIA. And as for the overthrow of SUCRON, it is thought it came through Pompeys ambition, making the more haste for feare Metellus should be partaker of the honour of his Victory: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to joyne with him, and therefore he fought the Battell with Pompey towards night, supposing the darknesse of the night would trouble his Enemies much, be a helpe to save themselves if they were overcome, and also to chafe the Enemies if it so happened they had the upper hand, because they were strangers and knew not the Countrey. When both Battells came to give Charge, Sertorius at the first was not directly against Pompey, but against Afranius who led the left Wing of Pompeys Battell, and himselfe was in the right Wing of his owne Battell. Howbeit Sertorius being advertised that the left Wing of his owne Army against which Pompey fought, was in such distresse as they gave backe, and could abide no longer, if they were not presently aided, straight left the leading of the right Wing, which he assigned over to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all speede possible unto the left Wing, which were then even as good as flying. And first he gathered them together againe which had turned their backs, and after put those also in good order that were yet a fighting; and so having encouraged them, both with his words and the presence of his person, he gave a new Charge againe upon Pompey, more courageously then before, (who thinking he had already wonne the Field, was then a chafing such as fled) and came so fiercely upon him, that he put all the whole Army of the ROMANS to flight, insomuch as Pompey himselfe escaped killing in the Field very hardly, being sore hurt, and saved by a strange meane. For the AFRICANS of Sertorius having taken Pompeys Horfe (which was richly trapped with Harnesse of Gold and other precious Furniture) falling out among themselves, and fighting for division of the same, in the meane time let Pompey go, and never followed after him. Afranius againe on the other side, whilst Sertorius was gone to helpe the other Wing of his Battell, made them all flee that stood before him, and followed killing of them even into the Trenches of their Campe, entring in amongst them that fled, and spoiled the Campe, being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeys Overthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from spoyle. Sertorius also coming thither upon the instant, finding Pompeys men in disorder, slew a number of them, and the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the Field to fight once more with Pompey. But receiving intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he founded the Retraite, and dislodged from the place he incamped, saying: Had not that old Woman come, I would have whipped that young Boy to ROME with rods. Now was Sertorius very heavie, that no man could tell him what was become of his white Hinde: for thereby all his subtilty and finenesse to keepe the barbarous People in obedience was taken away, and then specially when they stood in neede of most comfort. But by good hap, certaine of his Souldiers that had lost themselves in the night, met with the Hinde in their way, and knowing her by her colour, rooke her and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promised them a good reward, so that they would tell no living creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be secretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroad among them, and with a pleasant countenance told the Noblmen and chiefe Captaines of these barbarous People, how the gods had revealed to him in his Dreame, that he should shortly have a marvellous good thing happen to him: and with these words fate downe in his Chaire to give audience. Whereupon they that kept the Hinde not far from thence, did secretly let her go. The Hinde being loose, when she had spied Sertorius, ranne straight to his Chaire with great joy, and put her head betwixt his legs, and layed her mouth in his right hand, as she before was wont to doe. Sertorius also made very much of her, and of purpose appeared marvellous glad, shewing such tender affection to the Hinde, as it seemed the water stood in his eyes for joy. The barbarous People that stood there by and beheld the same, at the first were much amazed therewith, but afterwards when they had better bethought themselves, for joy they clapped their hands together, and waited upon Sertorius to his Lodging with great and joyfull shouts, saying, and stedfastly believing, that he

he was a heavenly creature, and beloved of the gods: whereupon they were marvellously pleased in their mindes, and certainly hoped that their Affaires should prosper daily better and better. Another time having straightened his Enemies with scarcity of Victuals, in the Territory of the SAGUNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they sent great Troopes of men to forage the Countrey, to get Victuals. Upon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either side, where Memmius was slaine, (the valiantest Capitaine Pompey had) courageously fighting in the middest of the Battell. Sertorius finding himselfe the stronger, followed his first Wing, making great slaughter of those that withstood him, untill he came unto Metellus selfe, who tarried his coming, defending himselfe more valiantly then was either hoped or looked for in a man of his yeares: insomuch as he was at the last hurt with a Partizan. Which was such a dishonour to the ROMANS, not unto them onely that saw it, but unto such also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to forsake their Capitaine, and turning their shame into anger against their Enemies, they covered Metellus round about with their Shields and Targets, and getting him out of the presse and fury of the Fight, gave such a fierce onser, as they drave the SPANIARDS to flee. Thus Fortune changing the Victory, Sertorius to give his scattered men time to save themselves, and leifure also for a new supply (which he caused to be presently leaved) to come at their pleasure, fled of purpose into a City of the Mountaines of strong situation, and there setting a good face of the matter, repaired the Rampiers and fortified the Gates, thinking nothing lesse then to abide there to be besieged, but onely to lay a baite for his Enemies, coming to besiege the City, hoping they should easily winne it, and in the meane time left pursuing of the barbarous People, which had thereby good leifure given them to save themselves. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppress the new supply that was coming to Sertorius, who had sent out his Captaines to the next Cities and Shires adjoining to leavie men, with expresse commandement, that when they had mustered a convenient number together, they should send them unto him, as they did. So when he understood of their coming, he easily passed through his Enemies to meete them, and with them suddenly came backe againe, and harried his Enemies worse then before, sometime cutting their Victuals from them by Land, through his Ambushes and continuall subtil policies, being quickly in every place whither they thought to go, with his light Army: and on the Sea also with certaine Pyrates Pinnaces, with the which he scoured all the Coast upon the Sea side. By this meanes both the Captaines his Enemies were compelled to sever themselves far one from the other, insomuch as Metellus went to winter in GAULE, Pompey remained in SPAIN (in great scarcity of all things for lacke of Money) to winter in the Territories of the VACCENANS, and wrote to the Senate of ROME, that he would returne with his Army into ITALY, if they sent him not Money out of hand, for that he had spent all his owne, daily fighting for the defence of ITALY. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME that Sertorius would be in ITALY before Pompey, because he had through his valiancy and great skill brought two of the most famous Captaines of their time to great extremity and distresse. Then did Metellus shew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadful Enemy. For he proclaimed by found of Trumpet, that if any ROMANE could kill him, he would give him a hundred Silver Talents, and twenty thousand Jugera of Land: and if he were a banished man, he promised he should be restored to his Countrey and Goods againe, buying his death by Treason, whom he could not overcome by force. And furthermore, being his chance once to winne a Battell of Sertorius, he was so jocond and proud for this Victory, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to say, Prince or Sovereigne Capitaine: and was contented the People should set up Altars and doe Sacrifices unto him in every City where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore Garlands of Flowers on his head, and would be bidden to dissolute Banquets, sitting at the Table in a triumphing Robe: and they made Images of Victory go up and downe the Hall, moved by certaine secret Engines carrying Triumphs of Gold, and Crownes and Garlands of Triumph, and Dancers of goodly young Boyes and faire Girles following of them, with Songs of Triumph in his praise. Wherein doubtlesse he deserved to be laughed at, shewing himselfe so much carried away with joy, and vaine glory, for one overthrow given unto him, whom himselfe was wont to call Sylla's fugitive, and the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On the other side, Sertorius noble courage was easily discerned: first, for that he called the banished men which were escaped from ROME, and come to him, Senators: and having them about him, called them the Senate, making some of them Treasurers, others Prætors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his Countrey. And in this also, that making Warres with the Souldiers of the Cities of SPAIN, and defraying the same at their owne charges, yet he never gave them any Authority, so much as in word, but ruled them alwaies with ROMANE Officers and Captaines: saying still, that he fought for the liberty of the People of ROME, and not to increase the Glory and Power of the SPANIARDS, to the hurt and dishonour of the ROMANS. For to say truly of him, he ever loved his Countrey well, and longed much to be sent for home againe: and yet in his greatest troubles, when things thwarted him most, then was his minde greatest, yielding no manner of shew or appearance to his Enemies, of any faint heart or discouragement in him. Again, when he was in best prosperity, and had most advantage of his Enemies, he sent unto Metellus and Pompey both, letting them understand, that for his part he was content to lay Armes aside, and to live at home like a private man; so that he might be lawfully restored and called home by Edict: and that he had rather be counted the meanest Citizen in ROME, then being a banished man out of his Countrey, to be called Emperour of the World. And it is said, that one of the chiefe causes which made him him desire so much to be called home againe, was the tender love he bare unto his Mother (that had brought him up from the time of his Fathers death) upon whom he cast all his love and delight: inasmuch as after that his friends in SPAIN had sent for him to come to be their Capitaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiving newes that his Mother was departed out of the World, it so strake him to the heart, that he had almost died for sorrow. For he lay seven dayes together continually on the ground weeping, and never gave his Souldiers the Watch-word, nor would be seene of any of his friends: untill that the other Noblemen and Captaines of his owne estate, came to him to his Tent, and were so importunate of him by intreaty and perswasion, that they got him out of his Tent to shew himselfe to his Souldiers, to speake to them, and to take order for his Affaires, which prospered very well. By these signes many have judged, that he was of a courteous and pitfull nature, and that naturally he was given to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessity to take charge of men of Warre, because he could not otherwise live quietly nor safely, being pursued by his Enemies, which would never let him rest, and thereupon entred into Warre, for his owne guard and safety. The Treaty selfe he made with King Mithridates, argued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had overcome was recovered againe (like a Wrestler that being overthrowne, getteth upon his feete to try another fall with his Enemy) and tooke upon him to invade ASIA. Sertorius fame was then so great, that he was spoken of through the World, by Merchants coming from the West, who blew abroad the report thereof all the East parts over, even into the Realme of PONT, like to Merchandizes which they went to seeke for in strange Countries. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded by the vaine vaunts of his favoured Courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and himselfe unto King Pyrrus, saying, that the ROMANES being set upon by them both, could not withstand two such excellent natures, and great Powers together, when the noblest Capitaine of the World should be joyned with the greatest and most puissant Prince that ever was: sent thereupon his Ambassadors into SPAIN unto Sertorius, with full Power and Commission to promise him Money and Ships towards the maintenance and charge of this Warre, in recompence whereof he desired that Sertorius would redeliver him the possession of ASIA againe, the which he had surrendered up unto the ROMANES upon the Peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his Councell together (which he termed the Senate) to consult upon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the same, considering that they asked them nothing but a Title in the aire, and a name of things which were not in their power, offering them therefore things present, whereof they had greater neede: yet would Sertorius never agree thereunto. Notwithstanding, thus much he granted Mithridates, that he should enjoy CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, which had ever bene Countries subject unto Kings, and whereunto the ROMANES had never any right: excepting this specially that he would never suffer him to usurpe any Countrey, unto the which the ROMANES had any just Title; and the which he had lost in Warres by force of Armes unto Fimbria, and had afterwards also willingly surrendered by agreement made betwixt him and Sylla. For he said he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his Victories, but not impair or hurt it by his Conquests. For a valiant man (said he) should covet to conquer with honour, but in no wise desire life with dishonour. His Answer being reported unto King Mithridates, did much amaze him: and some have written, that he then said unto his familiars: What would Sertorius command us then, if he sate among them in the Senate at ROME, who being an Exile now, and remaining in the farthest part of the World by the Sea Atlanticum, doth take upon him to bound the certaine Confines of our Kingdome, threatening us also with Warres, if we attempt any thing against Asia? All this notwithstanding, they were agreed upon Oathes taken betwene them, that Mithridates should enjoy the Countries of CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius should send him one of his Captaines with aide of men of Warre; and that upon performance thereof, the King should give him the summe of three thousand Talents, and forty Ships of Warre. So Sertorius sent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of ROME, who fled to him for succour: with whom Mithridates distressed certaine Cities of ASIA. And when Marius entred into them, with his Serjeants carrying the bundles of Rods and Axes before him, as before a Proconsul of the ROMANES, Mithridates gave him the upper hand, as his better, and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did set certaine Cities at liberty, and wrote unto others, declaring unto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodnesse did release them of their Taxe and Customes they paid: so that poore ASIA which had bene oppressed by the covertnesse of the Treasurers and Farmers of the ROMANES, and also by the pride and insolency of the Souldiers which lay in Garison among them, began to have some hope of change, and to desire the alteration of Government, which Sertorius offered. But on the other side, the Senators of ROME that were in SPAIN as banished men in Sertorius Army, and of the like dignity and estate that himselfe was of, they hearing say that all was well againe at ROME, and perswading themselves that they should be strong enough for their Enemies, having no cause to feare any more danger, began then to envie Sertorius greatnesse and Authority; but Perpenna specially among other, who by reason of his Nobility, being puffed up with a vaine presumption and ambitious selfe-will, practised to make himselfe chiefe of all the Army, and to that end threw forth amongst his friends and familiars such kinde of seditious words: "What cursed fortune (quoth he) my friends doth daily haunt us worse then other, making us that were willing to obey Sylla (commanding at this day both Land and Sea at his will) to choose rather to forsake our Lands and Countrey? And

"now being come hither in hope to live at liberty, we willingly make our selves Slaves, becoming Sertorius Guard for defence of his person in exile: who to requite us withall, payeth us with faire words, calling us the Senate, whereat every man laugheth to heare us so called; and in fine we must abide this dishonour to be at his commandement, and drudge and take as much paines as the SPANIARDS and LUSITANIANS do themselves. Hereupon the more part of them being carried away with these mutinous words, durst not yet shew themselves in actual rebellion against Sertorius, being afraid of his Authority: howbeit secretly underhand they overthrew his doings, by shewing extreme cruelty unto the barbarous People, by pretext of Justice, imposing great payments upon them, giving out it was Sertorius commandement. By which their lewd practises, many Cities revolted against him, and put themselves into his Enemies hands: and they daily also raised new mutinies and rebellions upon him. Furthermore, those whom he sent to pacifie the tumults, did handle themselves in such sort, that where they should have quieted the grudges and rebellions of the People, they set them farther out, and procured new tumults. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodnesse so altered, that he committed a most cruell act upon all the Noblemens children of that Land, which he brought up at Schoole in the City of OSCA: for some of them he put to death, and others he sold as Slaves. Thus Perpenna having many associates in his wicked Conspiracy against Sertorius, brought into his Confederacy also one called Manlius, who had chiefe charge in all the Army. This Manlius loved a young Boy exceedingly, and because he would let him know he loved him well, he told him on a time the whole plot of this Conspiracy, willing him not to reckon any more of others love but of his, and to love him onely: for he should see him a great man before it were long. The young Boy loving another better then him, called Aufidius, went and revealed unto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius marvelling to heare the Boy made privie to it, seeing himselfe also was of the Confederacy, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the Boy also named Perpenna, Gracinus, and some other whom Aufidius knew well to be of counsel, he was worse afraid then before, but yet seemed to make little of it, and told the Boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counselled him not to credit Manlius words, who was but a vaine man, and boasted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceive him. This notwithstanding, departing thence, he went forthwith unto Perpenna, and told him how their practice was discovered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not speedily put in execution. All the Confederates agreed it was true that he said, and thereupon they devised this Treason. They had suborned a Messenger to bring counterfeit Letters to Sertorius, feigning in the same that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a great Battell, in the which he had slaine a marvelous number of his Enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made Sacrifice unto the gods to give them thanks. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the present opportunity, invited Sertorius to supper to him, and all other his friends that were present (every one of the Conspiracy with him, and was so importunate with Sertorius, that in the end he promised him to come. Now Sertorius did ever use great modesty at the Boord, and would suffer no dissolute talke nor light parts at his meate, and had acquainted them also that used his Table, to talke of grave and wise matters, and yet one to be honestly merry with another, without any playing or uncomely talke. In the midst of Supper, they that sought occasion of quarrell, began to speake lewd words, counterfeiting to be drunke, and to play many vile parts, of purpose to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he could not abide to see those villanous parts, or that he mistrusted their ill will towards him, by fumbling of their words in their mouths, and by their unwonted irreverent manner shewed unto him: fell backwards upon the Bed where he sate at Meate, seeming no more to marke what they did or said. Perpenna at that instant tooke a Cup full of Wine, and making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpose. The Cup falling downe made a noise, and that was the Signe given among them. Therewithall Antonius that sate about Sertorius at the Table, stabbed him in with his Dagger. Sertorius feeling the thrust, strove to rise: but the trayterous murderer got upon Sertorius breast, and held both his hands. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murdered, not able to defend himselfe, all the Conspirators falling upon him. Sertorius death being blowne abroad, the most part of the SPANIARDS sent Ambassadors immediately unto Pompey and Metellus, yielding themselves unto them; and Perpenna with those that remained with him, attempted to doe something with Sertorius Army and preparation; but all fell out to his utter destruction and ruine, making the World know that he was a wicked man, who could neither command, nor knew how to obey. For he went to assaile Pompey, who had overthrowne him straight, and was in the end taken Prisoner. And yet in that instant of his calamity, he did not use himselfe like a valiant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to save his life, having Sertorius Letters and Writings, he offered Pompey to deliver him all Sertorius Letters sent him from the chiefe Senators of ROME, written with their owne hands, requesting Sertorius to bring his Army into ITALY, where he should finde numbers of People desirous of his coming, and that gaped still for change of Government. But here did Pompey shew himselfe a grave and innovation. For he put all Sertorius Letters and Writings on a heape together, and burnt them every one, without reading any of them, or suffering them to be read. And moreover, he presently put Perpenna to death, fearing he should name some, which if they were named, would breede new occasions of trouble and sedition. And as for the other Conspirators, some of them afterwards afterwards were brought to Pempey, who put them all to death : and the rest of them fled into AFRICK, where they were all overthrowne by them of the Countrey, and not a man of them escaped, but fell unfortunately upon the edge of the Sword, Ausidius onely except, Manlius companion in love. Eumenes parentage.

How Eumenes came to preferment by the Kings of Macedonia.

DUris the Historiographer writeth, that Eumenes was borne in the City of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a Carriers Sonne of the same Countrey, (who for poverty earned his living by carrying Merchandizes to and fro) and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought up, as well at Schoole, as at other comely Exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a Boy, Philip King of MACEDON chancing to come through the City of CARDIA, where having nothing to do, he tooke great pleasure to see the young men of the City handle their Weapons, and boyes to wrestle: and among them, Eumenes shewed such activity, and performed it with so good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But sure their report seemed truest, which write that Philip did advance him for the love he bare to his Father, in whose House he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his service with King Alexander his Sonne, where he was thought a wife man, and as faithfull to his Master, as any : and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe Secretary, yet the King did honour him as much as he did any other of his chiefe friends or familiars. For he was sent his Lieutenant Generall of his whole Army, against the INDIANS, and was Perdiccas Successor in the Government of his Province, Perdiccas being preferred unto Hephestions charge after his death. Now because Neopolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squires for the body unto the King) after the death of Alexander told the Lords of the Councell of MACEDON, that he had served the King with his Shield and Speare, and how Eumenes had followed with his Penne and Paper : the Lords laughed him to scorne, knowing that besides many great honours Eumenes had received, the King esteemed so well of him, that he did him the honour by Marriage to make him his Kinsman. For the first Lady that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barsine, Artabazus Daughter, by whom he had a Sonne, and called his Name Hercules : and two of her Sisters, he married the one of them called called Apama unto Ptolomies, and her other Sister also called Barsine, he bestowed upon Eumenes, when he deftributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lords and familiars to marry them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fell in disgrace with King Alexander, and stood in some danger by means of Hephestion. For Hephestion following Alexanders Court on a time, having appointed Eumenes Fife-player a lodging, which Eumenes Servants had taken up for their Master : Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor unto Alexander, crying out, that a man were better be a Fife and a Common-player of Tragedies, then a Souldier, sithence such kinde of People were preferred before men of Service that ventured their lives in the Warres. Alexander at that present time was as angry as Eumenes, and roundly tooke up Hephestion for it : howbeit immediately after having changed his minde, he was much offended with Eumenes, because he thought him not to have used that franke speech so much against Hephestion, as of a certain presumptuous boldnesse towards himselfe. And at another time also, when Alexander was sending Nearchus with his Army by Sea to cleare the Coasts of the Ocean, it chanced the King was without Money : whereupon he sent to all his friends to take up Money in prest, and among others, unto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred Talents. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and said, he had much ado to get him so much of all his Tenants. Alexander said nothing to him neither would he suffer them to take his hundred Talents : but commanded his Officers to set Eumenes Tent on fire, because he would take him tardy with a lie, before he could give order to carry away his Gold and Silver. Thus was his Tent burnt down to the ground, before they could make shift to save any thing : the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was sorry it was burnt, because all his Letters and Writings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in Niggots of Gold and Silver mingled together, about a thousand Talents, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away, but more then that, he sent unto all his Lieutenants, Captaines, and Governours of Countries, wheresoever they were, that they should send him Copies of all the Letters which they before had sent unto him, because all those which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephestion fell at variance againe, by reason of a Gift that was given him, inso much as very foule words passed betwixt Hephestion and him : yet did not the King give Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hephestion was dead, the King taking his death grievously whom he loved so dearly, gave no good countenance (and was very briefe besides) unto those whom he knew bare any grudge to Hephestion while he lived, and that he thought were glad of his death, but specially unto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephestion was known to him well enough : inso much as he would twit him withall, remembring him of the injuries he had offered Hephestion. But Eumenes being very wise, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the selfe same means that did him hurt : and devised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honour Hephestions Funerall with all Pompe possible) new inventions to set forth the same, of more magnificence then had before been seen, sparing for no cost, laying on Money bountifully, to make him a rich and stately Tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the MACEDONIAN Footmen, and the Noble men that had been nearest about him : and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will stucke to the Lords, but in words he seemed a Neuter and Friend to both parts, saying, It was not for him being a stranger, to thrust himself into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lords were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarrying behinde pacified the greatest part of the Souldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lords. Whereupon, after the Lords and Captaines had consulted together, and taken order for these contentions, they divided the Government of the Provinces among them, which they called Satrapes : in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that Coast upon Mare Ponticum, unto the City of TRAPZUNTE, the which at that time was not subject to the Empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as King. Howbeit it was said, that Leonatus and Antigonus would and put him in possession it, with a great and puissant Army, and make him Governour there. Yet afterwards Antigonus made none account of Perdiccas Letters unto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to Conquer all, despising all other. And Leonatus also came down into PHRYGIA, and undertooke the Journey of this Conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in his Journey thitherward, Hecateus Tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his Army, and prayed him rather to go helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were besieged in the City of LAMIA. So Leonatus being willing to take Sea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecateus : for they were not friends one with another, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes Father had with this Hecateus, about the Government of their City. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly unto King Alexander, saying, that he was a Tyrant, and besought the King that it would please him to set the CARDIANS at liberty. And therefore Eumenes refusing that Journey against the GRECIANS, alledged that he was afraid of Antipater, who had been his Enemy of long time, doubting that for the old grudge he bare him, and also to gratifie Hecateus, he would put him to death : Leonatus then revealed himselfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would passe over the Sea to aide Antipater, where indeed his meaning was to take the Kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him Letters sent from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the City of PELLA, and there he would marry him. When Eumenes was made private to his purpose : either because he feared Antipater, or else for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fond man, and very rash and unconstant in his doings, he stole away from him by night, with those few men he had (being about three hundred Horsemen, and two hundred Footmen well armed) taking all his Gold with him, which amounted to the summe of five thousand Talents; and fled with them unto Perdiccas, unto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereupon he was immediately of great credit about him, and called to counsell. Shortly after Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great Army which he himself did leade. Where Antipater was taken Prisoner, and Eumenes established Governour of the Countrey, who delivered the Charge of the great Cities unto his friends, and left them there Captains of Garrisons which he appointed, placing every where Judges, Receivers, Governours, and all such other Officers necessary as he thought meete, Perdiccas meddling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas again: as well to wait upon him, as also because he would ever be about the King. But Perdiccas thinking with himself that he alone could well enough performe the enterprize he went about: and considering also that the Realme he left behinde him stood needfull of a wise and skilfull Governour, whom he might trust with the safety of his State: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes back againe, under colour to fend him to his Government, but indeed to keepe the Realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined upon the frontiers of his Countrey whereof he was Governour, because Neoptolemus did under-hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proud and insolent Person, yet Eumenes still devised to hold him in, and kept him from attempts by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiving also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN Footmen were growne exceeding stout and insolent, he for a strength and defence against them, set up a company of Horsemen; and to bring it to passe, realeased all the Countrey men from paying of Tribute or Tax, being meete to serve on Horsebacke, and brought a great number of Horse of Service, which he gave amongst them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them couragions, by Honours and Gifts he gave to them that served well; and so by continual Exercise and often removing them from place to place, made them very ready and serviceable. Thus were the Noblemen of MACEDON, some much amazed, some others very glad when they saw how by this diligence Eumenes had in so short a time gotten about him such a number, as six thousand three hundred Horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus having subdued the GRECIANS, came on with their Army into ASIA to overthrow Perdiccas greatness and power: and newes also, that shortly they would invade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwise occupied in Warres, fighting against Protony, made Eumenes his Lieutenant-General, and gave him Commission and full Authority over all his Souldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA, and wrote Letters unto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the same that they should be obedient unto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly answered, that he would not be at this Warre: for the MACEDONIANS under his charge were ashamed to take Armes against Antipater; and moreover they would not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receive him for their Captaine, so much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other side, was as ready to play the Traitour, and to do Eumenes a shrewd turne, as Alcetas was. For being sent by Eumenes to come to him, where he should have obeyed him, he set his men in Battell ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the first fruite of his wise foresight of the Horsemen, which he had set up to make head against the Footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne Footmen were broken and overthrowen, he overcame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his Horsemen, and took all their Carriage. Then he made them march in order of Battell against the MACEDONIANS, who were dispersed every where, following the chafe of his Footmen, whom they had overthrowen. Thus coming upon them in this disorder; he drave them to throw away their Weapons, and to yeeld unto him: and moreover, every man to take his Oath to serve him faithfully in this Warre, wherefoever he would leade them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them unto Craterus and Antipater: who sent unto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he should not onely enjoy the Countreys and Provinces still which he had in Government, but furthermore that they would give him others unto them, and make him stronger then ever he was: besides that by the acceptance of the offer, he should be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was ever reckoned his Enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made answer: that having alwaies been Antipaters Enemy, he could not of a sudden become his Friend, specially seeing him use his Friends as Enemies: howbeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus Peace with Perdiccas, and to restore him againe to his favour, upon reasonable and indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he meant to assaile him, that then he would aide him so long as he had any breath in his Body, and would lose his life before he would breake his promise. This answer being brought unto Antipater, they fell to consult at leisure what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled upon his overthrow, was come unto them: who told them how the Battell was fought, and besought them both very instantly (but Craterus chiefly) to give him aide if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were so farre in love with him, that if they did but see his Hat, and hear him speake, they would all arme themselves and follow him. For to speake a Troth, Craterus was had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS: inasmuch as after Alexanders death, he was more desired of the common Souldiers, then any other Captaine, remembering how often he had for their sakes incurred Alexanders disgrace and displeasure, because he went about to perswade him to leave the King of PERSIANS manner, whereunto Alexander by little and little gave himself: and also for that he maintained and defended the custome custome of the Countrey of MACEDON, the which every man through pride and exesse began to forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus sent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himselfe with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best part of his Army, hoping to take him rardy and altogether unprovided, supposing he would give himselfe to pleasure and pastime, after so great a Victory. But Eumenes, like a wise and valiant Captaine, had taken such order, that he heard newes time enough of his Enemies coming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readinesse to resist him. Yet was not this the chiefe point of his skill in Warre: for he looked so precisely to his doings, that he did not onely keepe his Enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did; but making his men also to kill Craterus in Battell, before they knew against whom they should fight, and to keepe also so dreadfull an Enemy from their knowledge, that of all other shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policy. First, he made a rumour to be spred in his Hoast, how Neoptolemus and Pigres were againe come against him, with certaine Horsemen of all sorts gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to have removed in the night, a great desire of sleepe came upon him, in the which he had a marvellous strange Dreame. For it seemed unto him that he saw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with another, either of them leading a battell of Footmen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN fashion: who coming to give charge the one upon the other; the goddesse Minerva came to aide the one, and Ceres likewise to aide the other. Then he thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerva aided was overthrowen, and that Ceres had gathered eares of Corne and made a Crown of them, to give him that had wonne the Field. Hereupon Eumenes perswaded himselfe that this Dreame made for him, and promised him Victory: for that he fought for a fertile Countrey of Corne, where was great plenty of it. For all the Fields were sowne with Corne in every place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefit of long Peace, to see all the Corne-fields how greene they looked. But when he understood that the Enemies had given their Souldiers for the Signall of Battell, Minerva and Alexander, then was his first imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gave Ceres and Alexander for Signall of the Battell to his Souldiers, and commanded every man to make him a Garland of Wheate-eares to wear on their heads, and that they should wreath Flowers and Nofegaies about their Pikes. He was in minde many times to make his trustiest Captaines privy against whom they should fight, and not alone to trust himselfe withall, to keepe so necessary a thing as that secret: yet in fine, he kept his first resolution, thinking it the safest way, not to commit this danger, but to himselfe. Now when he came to give Battell, he would place never a MACEDONIAN directly against Craterus, but set two companies of men at Armes that were strangers against him, the which Pharnabazus (Atabazus Sonne) and Phonix Tenidian did leade. Then he specially commanded, that so soone as they saw the Enemies before them, they should straight give charge, giving them no leisure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Herald or Trumpet that they should send unto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himselfe, he led the right Wing of his Battell, with a Troope of three hundred men at Armes, the chiefe men of all his Army, where he would meete full with Neoptolemus front. When they had passed a little Hill that stood betweene both Battels, Eumenes Horsemen following his Commandement, ranne with full cariare to set upon their Enemies. Craterus seeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and cursed Neoptolemus that had deceived him in that sort, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his side, if they might but once see him: notwithstanding, he prayed them that were about him, to shew themselves like valiant men that day, and therewithall fiercely set Spurres to his Horse to meete with his Enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their Staves being broken, they fell straight to their Swords: but that day did not Craterus dishonour the memory of Alexander, for he slew many of his Enemies round about him, valiantly repulsed them that did assaile him, and many times overthrowen them. Yet in fine, one of the men of Armes of THRACIA gave him such a blow on the side, that he turned him off his Horse, and when he was down, many passed over him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his Horse, and appointed men about him to guard him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and even in the very pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other side, which had been mortall Enemies of long time, being on fire with an old malice, they fought up and down the one for the other. And at the two first courses they could not one light upon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they set Spurs to their Horses, their Swords drawn and with great cries gave Charge upon each other. And their Horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed Gallies had met with their Prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their Horses necks, closed together, and with both hands strived to pluck off each others Head-piece, and to rent their Polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing each other, their Horses ran from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrestled together. Neoptolemus got up first: but as he rose, Eumenes cut the ham of his Legge, and raised himself up withall. Neoptolemus staying himselfe upon one Knee, his other Legge being very sore hurt, defended himselfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could give him no deadly wound: nevertheless himselfe had a blow on the necke, that laid him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choler against him, went about to strip him, and fell a reviling of him, and being in that furious mood, remembered not that Neoptolemus had his Sword yet, who hurt him under his Curaces, even about his Groine, not farre from his privy Parts : howbeit the wound made Eumenes worke afraid then there was cause of hurt, for that Neoptolemus strength was gone before the stroke came, dying presently upon it. Eumenes having stripped him, found him selfe very ill (by reason of his wounds) on his Armes and Legs, which had many a fore gash : notwithstanding, he got up on his Horse againe, and rode towards the other Wing of his Battell, thinking his Enemies had been fighting still. But there being told that Craterus had his death wound, he went straight to the place where he lay, and found him yet alive, not past knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his Horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accursed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitifull state, and had also forced him to bein Battell against one of his dearest Friends, to make him the instrument of his utter undoing. This second Battell Eumenes wanne ten daies after the first Battell obtained, which got him great honour, for that he had discomfited one of his Enemies through wisdom, and the other by valiantnesse. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his Enemies, but of his Friends also that tooke his part, when they bethought them, that he being a stranger, had with the Weapons and Power of the MACEDONIANS themselves, slaine the greatest and most famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had been so happy, as to have lived and received the advertisement of Craterus death, no doubt he had been the greatest person of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill luck would have it, within two daies after that Perdiccas was slaine in a mutiny of his men in EGYPT, newes came to his Army of Eumenes Victory, and also of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were so offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, and gave Antigonus and Antipater Commission to execute the revenge. When Eumenes passing by Mount Ida (where the King kept a Race and breed of Horses) had taken away with him as many Horses as he would, and had sent Letters of advertisement thereof to the Kings Riders : Antipater, as it is reported, smiled, and in mockery said, that he marvelled to see Eumenes great care, to thinke that he should either give or receive any account of the Kings Goods. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great Plaines of LYDIA, especially neare unto the chiefe City of SARDIS, because he was the stronger in Horsemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra see the power of his Army. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high PHRYGIA, and wintered in the City of CELENES. But there Polemon, Alcidas and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the Army, saying that they had as much right to leade the Army as he. Eumenes answered them. Truly here is the common saying up and down : Desperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes having promised his Souldiers pay within three daies, to keepe his promise, sold them all the Farnes and Castles of that Country, together with the men and beasts of the same, whereof the Province was fully replenished. Thereupon his Lieutenants of the bands having bought certaine of them, went and tooke them by force, through Eumenes Engines of Battery which he suffered them to carry with him : and having taken them, they went and divided the spoile, paying every Souldier ratably his wages due. This device brought him againe in favour among his Souldiers. For certaine Papers being found in his Campe cast abroad by his Enemies, promising great Offices, and a hundred Talents besides to any man that killed Eumenes : the MACEDONIANS that served under him were so offended withall, that they presently set down an Order, that from that time forward a thousand of the best Souldiers among them (which also had Charge under them) should alwaies guard his Person, keeping Watch every night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Whereunto they all agreed : and Eumenes gave them those honours and rewards which the Kings of MACEDON were wont to give unto their Friends, and which they gladly received. For through their grant he had Authority to give Purple Cloakes and Hats to whom he thought good, which was the honourable Gift the King of MACEDON could give. It is true, that prosperity maketh simple men high-minded, whereby they seem (though they be not) very honourable, but specially when Fortune hath raised them to Honour and Wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble minde and stout courage, is best discerned in adversity : for he never yeelded to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had lost a Battell among the ORCYNIANS, in the Realm of CAPPADOCIA, through the treason of one of his Souldiers he being pursued, yet never gaveth Traitor any leasure to flie to his Enemies for safety, but tooke him and trussed him up. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his Horse head upon a sudden, and leaving his Enemies side-hand of him that had him in chafe, he closely stole by them without their knowledge, and held on journeying so long, untill he came to the selfe same plaine where the Battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering up the dead Bodies (the Captaines by themselves, and the Souldiers apart) he burnt them with the Doores, Gates and Windows of all the Villages and Townes thereabouts that he could get together : and instead of Tombes for them, he raised up great heapes of Earth. Inasmuch as Antigonus coming thither immediately after, he wondered much at his valiantnesse and invincible courage. Removing thence, he met with Antigonus Carriage, and might easily without danger have taken a number of Prisoners, as well free as bond, and have gotten all the Riches and Treasure which they had spoiled in so many sundry Warres, Townes and Countries : howbeit he was afraid that if his Souldiers were laden with that spoile, it would make them more heavy to march, and unable to flie, but specially more tender to abide to runne from place to place a long time together, being the onely meane wherein he trusted to come to end this Warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be wearie in following him so long a time, and therefore that he would turne some other way.

way. Moreover he perceived that it was impossible for him by his Authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking such a Prey, as offered it selfe unto them : whereupon he commanded them to stay a while, and bait their Horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the Enemies Carriage. But in the meane time he secretly sent a Messenger to Menander (who had the Charge and Conduct of all the Carriage) to will him to flie with all speed out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a Hill not far from thence, and safe from Horsemen, where they could not be environed, and there to fortifie himselfe, sending him word also, that he sent him this advertisement, for the old friendship and acquaintance that had been betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men trusse up their Carriage straight. Thereupon Eumenes openly sent certaine light Armed men to discover, and to bring him newes : and therewithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their Horses, as if he had meant to have led them against the Enemies. His Scouts were now returned, and told him that it was impossible either to distress or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of such strength, and therefore was not to be come by. Eumenes seemed to be very sorry for it, howbeit he led his Army from thence notwithstanding. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, and the MACEDONIANS that were in his Army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, and after that loved him better then ever they did before : because that having their Children in his hands whom he might have made Slaves, and their Wives also whom he might have defiled, he spared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humour, told them, Yea are deceived, my Friends : for it was not for your sakes, nor yet to pleasure you, that Eumenes tooke not your Wives, your Children, and your Goods, but onely for the fear he had to have shackles on his heeles, to let him from speedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled still before Antigonus, and wandering up and down, did himselfe with his Souldiers to get them somewhere else : either indeed for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was unwilling to have such a number about him, being too few to fight a Battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strange place of situation, called NORA, in the Confines of LYCONIA and CAPPADOCIA, with five hundred Horsemen, and two hundred Footmen well Armed : and when he was come thither also, he gave every one leave to depart that asked him licence, because they could not have abidden the discommodity of the place, which was very straight, and the lacke of necessary Victuals, which they must needs have wanted, if the Siege did continue long : and thus departed from them with very good words and loving countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the Fort, but would not besiege it, before he sent for Eumenes to come to him upon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the Heads of his Tribe, and that himselfe on the other side had not a Noble-man for whom he fought : and therefore if Antigonus would have him come and speake with him, that he should send him one of his chiefe Friends in Hostage. Againe, Antigonus being earnest with him, and telling him, it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power ; Eumenes answered him : I will acknowledge none better then my selfe, so long as I can hold my Sword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes request) sent his owne Nephew Ptolome into the Fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and saluted each other, as friends of old acquaintance and familiarity, and so fell in talke of divers matters : but all this while Eumenes never once made request to depart in safety, neither yet demanded pardon, but onely desired the confirmation of his Charge and Government, and that he might be restored to that which was given him. They that were present at that meeting, marvelled much at Eumenes, and greatly commended his Routnesse. Now whiles they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all partes of the Campe, to see what manner of man Eumenes was : because that after the death of Craterus, there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN Souldiers of any Captaine but of Eumenes. Nevertheless, Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes some mischief, commanded them aloud to give backe, and made stones to be throwne among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithstanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his Guard, and to take Eumenes in his Armes, and had much ado to deliver him safely into his Fort againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compassed this Fort of NORA round about with a Wall, and left a sufficient number of men to continue the Siege, and so went his way with the rest of his Army. In the meane time Eumenes remained besieged within his Fort, where there was plenty of Wheate, Water, and Salt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor of sweete taste, to sustaine them with their Bread. Yet with such as he had he kept them in good liking that were in house with him. For he made them every one after another sit at his Boord with him, and withall did fashion out that manner of diet, with a certaine life and familiarity of pleasant devices to entertaine them at their Meate. For besides that he sought to shew them as pleasant a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a sweete faire Face, not looking like a man of Warre, that all the daies of his life had been trained up in it : but like a fresh youth, being of such a constitution of body, that the excellentest Work-man that ever was, could not better set out all the parts and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be seene in him. His speech was not harsh nor churlish, but very milde and pleasant, as appeareth by the Letters he wrote. Now for the Siege, there was nothing that more annoyed the besieged then the narrownesse of the Fort wherein they were, which was not above two Furlongs compass about, and their Houses so little and narrow, that they could scant turne them in them, and did eate and drinke without any manner of Exercise for themselves, or their Horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishness that groweth by idleness, a thing most hurtfull to them that are acquainted with travell and paines, to keepe them in breath, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occasion were offered, put his men into the longest and widest Hall he had in his House (being fourteene Cubits long to walk up and down in) and taught them first of all to march faire and softly, and then by little and little to hasten their pace: for the Horses he had, them he made to be girt before, one after another, and then did softly trife them up with long Pulleys fastned to the beames, their hindmost part standing on the ground, and their foremost being aloft. The Horses being trified up in this manner, their riders came with loud cries behinde them and some with whips in their hands to lash them, that the Horse being mad withall, jerked out behinde, and sprang forward with his foremost legs to touch the ground, that they did but even raise it a little, so that every veine and sinew of them were strained by this meanes, that they blew, and were all of a foame withall; so good an exercise to them it was, as well to put them in breath, as to keepe their legs supple to run. After that, they had their Oates very cleane pickt and dressed, that they might digest them the sooner. Antigonus having long continued this Siege, news came unto him that Antipater, was dead in MACEDON, and that the Realm was in a great broile, through the Factions of Cassander and Polyperchon. Antigonus whose head was straight full of great imaginations, greedily coveting with himselfe the whole Kingdome of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his Friend, that through his helpe he might attaine his desired purpose. Thereupon he sent Hieronymus unto him to treat of Peace, and gave him the forme of the Oath which he would have him sweare unto him. When Eumenes had seene it, he would not be sworne in that manner, but corrected it, and said: that he did referre himselfe to the judgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him besieged, to judge which of those two formes was most meetest, that which Antigonus had sent him, or the same which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of Oath, there was a little mention onely made at the beginning of the bloud Royall, but in all the rest following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himselfe. But Eumenes in his forme of Oath, did first of all put Olympias the Mother of King Alexander, and the Kings his Sons afterwards: and for the rest he swore he would be Friend of the Friends, and Enemy of the Enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the Kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the Siege before NORA, did better like the forme of Eumenes Oath, then they did that of Antigonus. So having given Eumenes his Oath, and made him sweare according to that forme, they raised their Siege, and sent also unto Antigonus to take his Oath. All this accomplished, Eumenes redelivered the CAPPADOCIANS their Hostages, (which he had kept in NORA with him) and they that came for them, gave him in their stead, Horse of Warre, Beasts of Carriage, Tents and Pavillions. Thus he began to gather his men againe together, which were dispersed abroad after his overthrow, so that in few daies he was above a thousand Horsemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Antigonus: and he did wisely. For Antigonus had not onely commanded them to shut him up againe straighter then he was before: but besides that wrote sharpe Letters, and very angrily unto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the Oath. Whilest Eumenes wandered up and downe flying still, he received Letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatness) and specially from Olympias, which sent unto him to come into MACEDON, to take the Charge and Government of her young Sonne Alexander, whom they fought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewise received Letters from Polyperchon, and from King Philip, who commanded him to make War with Antigonus with his Army he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his Purse of the Kings five hundred Silver Talents (which had been taken from him before) which were in the City of CYNDES: and besides, to defray the Charges of the Warres, as much as he thought meet. And therewithall also they wrote unto Antigenes and Tentamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraspides, to wit, the Souldiers with the Silver Shields, or Shields silvered, which were of the old Bands of Alexanders Army. These two Captaines having received these Letters, did use Eumenes with very good words, and shewed him great countenance: yet a man by their looks might easily conjecture that they envied him; for either of them both thought themselves men sufficient, and worthy to command Eumenes, not to aide him. Howbeit Eumenes behaved himselfe very wisely, for as touching their envy, he pacified that, because he tooke not the Money which he was commanded to take for his owne use, for that he had no neede of it. And as for their ambition and presumption, disdaining to be commanded by him, though they could neither tell how to command nor obey, he did reclaime them by a superstition he laid before them, which was this. He made them believe that Alexander did appeare to him in his sleepe, and that he shewed him a Pavillion sumptuously set out in the state and magnificence of a King, in the which was a Royall Throne: and told him, that if they would keepe their Councell-place in that Pavillion, he would be present among them, and aide them in all their counsels, and conducts of their Warres, so that they would alwaies begin by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Tentamus to believe that which he spake, who would not go to him to consult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honourable for himselfe to be seene to go to other mens Gates. Wherefore with all their consents they incontinently set up a goodly rich Pavillion, which was called Alexanders Pavillion: and there they kept their Councels and Assemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest Causes. After this, they went towards the high Countreies, and met with Penceffas on the way (Eumenes very great Friend) who joynd with them, and other great peers of the Realme, with all their power besides. This did greatly strengthen the Army of the Noblemen of MACEDONIA, as touching the

the number of men, and their brave Armour and Furniture: but for their owne persons, because they had no man to command them since the death of Alexander, they were growne self-willed by dissolute liberty, and effeminate in their manner of life: and moreover they had gotten a Tyrannicall fiercenesse, nourished and increased by the vanities of the barbarous People. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with another, but shamefully flattered the old bands of the MACEDONIAN Souldiers, giving them Money, and making them Banquets and Feasts of Sacrifices. And thus in short time, of a Campe they brought it to be a dissolute Taverne, where the Noblemen got into the Souldiers favour that they might be chosen Chieftaines of all the Army: like as the common Peoples Voices are bought in free Cities (where the People do rule) to be preferred to honourable States and Offices of the Common-wealth. Now Eumenes found straight that these peeres of the Realme disdained one another, howbeit that they all feared and mistrusted him, and fought but for opportunity to kill him. Wherefore to prevent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupy Money, and so borrowed a great Summe of them specially whom he knew most hated him, to the end that from thenceforth they should no more distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the Money they had lent him. And thereof followed a strange thing: for other mens Money and Goods was the safety of his life. For where others give Money to save their lives, he by taking of Money saved his owne life. Now for the Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whilest they saw they were without danger of Enemies to make them afraid, they still hung upon them that gave them, being desirous to be made Generals, and came every morning to their uprising to waite upon them, and follow them wherefoever they went. But when Antigonus was come to Campe hard by them with a great and puissant Army, and that their case required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull Leader: not the Souldiers alone, but all the Peeres and States besides (which in Peace did brave it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit themselves unto Eumenes, to be at his Commandement. For when Antigonus assayed all the waies he could to passe over the River of Pastigris, the Peeres which were laied in divers places to let him from passing over, heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eumenes onely that resisted him, and fought with him, where he slew such a number of his men, that he filled the River with them, and tooke foure thousand of them Prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was sicke, these old bands did more plainly shew what opinion they had of him, and of others, to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them goodcheere at their Houses; yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthiest to be their Captaine, and to command them. For Penceffas having feasted them in the Kingdome of PERSIA, and given every Souldier a Mutton to Sacrifice, thought he had won great favour and credit among them. But shortly after, as the Army marched against their Enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerously sicke, and therefore would needs be carried in a Litter far from the Campe, to be out of the noyse, because he could take no rest. But they had not gone far, before they saw their Enemies, which having passed over certaine little Hills betwene them, were coming down into the Valley. When the Souldiers saw the glistering of the gilt Armour of their Enemies that glared in the Sunne, and the good order they marched withall in Battell ray, the Elephants with the Towers upon their backs, and the men at Armes with their Purple Coates upon their Armour (which was the Apparell they wore when they went to fight with their Enemies) then the foremost staid upon it, and cried out, willing them to send for Eumenes to leade them; for they would else go no further if they had not him for their General. And therewithall they raised their Pikes, and laid down their Shields at their feet, calling from one to another to stay, and to their private Captaines also: and told them plainly, that they would not stirre a foot from thence, nor fight at all, unless Eumenes were among them to leade them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speed, hastning his Slaves and Littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his Litter on every side he held out his right hand to the Souldiers, and told them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The Souldiers also as soone as they saw him, saluted him in the MACEDONIAN Tongue, and tooke up their Shields, clapping them against their Pikes with a great shout, bidding their Enemies come when they would, they should be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other side, being informed by certaine Prisoners which his Souldiers had taken in Skirmish, that Eumenes was fallen very sore sicke, and by reason thereof was carried in a Litter, thought now he should have no great adoe to discomfit the rest of the Army, and therefore made all possible speed he could to fight. But when he came so neare, that he might easily see the order and countenance of his Enemies, who were set in such good order of Battell, that it could not on any waies be amended, he was much amazed withall, and pawed a great while; and in the meane time spied Eumenes Litter a farre off, carried from on end of the Battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloud, as his manner was, and turning himselfe to his Friends, said: See, said he, I believe it is that Litter that maketh Warre with us, and doth offer us Battell. But with those words, he founded the retreat, and brought his men backe againe into his Campe. When this fear was a little passed over, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old trade againe, the Peeres to flatter the Souldiers, and the Souldiers to wax brave and stout against their Captaines: so that when they came to take their Garrisons for the winter time, they divided in a manner among them the whole Countreie of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a thousand furlongs off. Which Antigonus understanding, determined to set upon them, they mistrusting nothing; and so went suddainly towards them, by a shorter way then that he had already come.

come, but the worser way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if he met them thus disperfed asunder, their Captaines could not readily affemble them all together. But while he was in this his Journey, in the defart crooked way, he was so overtaken with such boisterous winds and extreame bitter cold, that his Souldiers could go no further, but were forced to tarry still, to provide them present remedy against the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their Enemies knew of their coming. For the barbarous People inhabiting the Mountaines, towards the Defart, being amazed to see such a number of fires in the Valley, sent presently with speed upon two Camels light laden, to advertise Pencestas, who being nearest unto the Mountaines was so feared with these newes, that he was at his wits end, not knowing what to do. For seeing his other Companions as much afraid as himselfe, he fled upon it, and carried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, assuring them that he would stay the sudden attempt of their Enemies, and that they should come three daies later then they looked for: which they believed. Then did Eumenes send Messengers into every quarter to all the Captaines, commanding them speedily to put their men in readinesse, and to meet him in a certaine place which he appointed. Himselfe went in the meane time with other Captaines to chuse a fit ground to lodge a Campe, the which might easily be seene from the top of the Mountaines which they must passe that come from the Defart: and there fortified the same with Trenches, and divided it out into quarters, making Fire in every place, such a distance off one from another, as they use commonly to make in a Campe. It was no sooner done, but Antigonus came to the top of the Mountaines, and saw these Fires asfarre off, which grieved him much: for he thought that his Enemies had long before knowne of his coming, and that they came against him. Being afraid therefore left his Enemies would compell him to fight, coming fresh upon him, his owne men being wearie and done with the paines they had abidden, coming through that defart Countrey: he tooke his way to leade backe his Army, not the nearest way by the which he came, but through the Coun-treys richly inhabited and replenished with great Cities and good Townes, to refresh his over-wearied People. Yet seeing he had none Alarmes given, nor any Skirmishes offered him, (as they use commonly when both Armies are neare together) and that the Valley-men told him that they had seene none other Army but his, saying that round about there was store of Fires: then he straight mistrusted that it was one of Eumenes Stratagemes of Warre, wherewith he had deceived him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to steale upon him, but to put all to the hazard of a Battell. But in the meane time, the most part of the Host was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimation every man had of his wisdom and sufficiency: inso much that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant-Generall should command the whole Army. This spited the two Captaines of the ARGYRASPIDES, Antigenes and Leutamus, who bare him such an inward grudge, that from that time forth they practised his death: and assembling together with many of the States and particular Captaines, they fate in Councell to know when, and in what sort they should kill him. Howbeit the most Voices assembled in this Councell, were whole of opinion, that they should take the benefit of his service in leading the Battell, and that immediately after they should put him to death. This being thus resolved upon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and another called Phadimus, went secretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded upon in the Assembly against him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they sought to pleasure him, but onely because they were afraid to lose the Money they had lent him. Eumenes gave them great thanks, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it unto his best Friends, and told them: You see how I am environed with a Troope of wilde and brutish beasts. That done, he made his Will, and tore all the Letters and Writings that had been sent him, because he would not have them suffer for him after his death, that had sent him secret advertisements. Afterwards, when he had disposed of all his private matters in this sort, he stood in a doubt whether he should lose the Battell, giving his Enemies the Victory, or whether it were better for him to sie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA and ARMENIA. Howbeit he resolved of nothing before his Friends. But when the mischief he was in, had put divers thoughts into his head, in fine, he determined to fight, and did set his Army in Battell-ray, perswading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous People to stand to it like men. And as for the old Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they so little needed exhortation, that they themselves did exhort Eumenes to be of good courage, saying that their Enemies would never abide them, because they were all the oldest Souldiers, and of greatest experience that had been in all the Conquests of King Philip, and of his Sonne Alexander; and that it was never heard that they had been overthrowne in any set Battell, the most of them being three score and ten yeares old, and the youngest no lesse then three score. Whereupon, when they ran with great fury to give charge upon their Enemies, they cried out aloud speaking to the Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were under Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your Fathers? And so assailing them with a lusty courage, and in rage withall. In a short space overthrew the Squadron of the Enemies, and slew the most part of them in the Field. Thus was Antigonus Army cleane overthrowne on that side: but on the other side where his men of Armes were, through Pencestas cowardlinesse (that handled himselfe very ill at that Battell) he had the upper hand and wanne all their Carriage, through his foresight in the greatest fury of the Battell, and the strength of the place where the Battell was fought. For it was a marvellous great great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet too hard underfoot, but covered over with a small fine sand, much like to a drie sand the Sea casteth up, and leaveth upon the shore. This sand being scattered abroad by riding and going too and fro of so many thousands of men and Hories during the time of the Battell foughten, had raised such a mighty dust and white smoke in the Element, as if they had stirred or tempered white-lime together: which troubled their sight so sore, as they could see nothing before them: in respect whereof Antigonus might easily seize all their Carriage, themselves being never a whit the wiser. The Battell being come to this passe you have heard, Tentamus sent presently unto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliver them their Carriage again, which he had taken and carried into his Campe. Antigonus made him answer, that he would not onely redeliver the goods unto the ARGYRASPIDES; but would moreover use them with all the favour he could so farforth as they delivered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke presently a wicked resolution, to deliver him alive into the hands of his Enemies. And with that determination they came near unto him, not making any countenance as though they would lay hands on him, but rather seeming to guard and defend his Person, as their manner was: some of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had won the Battell: and others accusing the Noble-men of cowardlinesse, saying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole Victory. But in fine, one of them having spied his time, flew to him, and tooke his Sword out of his hand: the others straight laid hold of him, and bound both his hands behinde him with his owne girdle. Antigonus understanding it, sent Nicanor thither to take him out of their hands, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes having made request unto them to suffer him to speake, as they brought him through the bands of these old MACEDONIAN Souldiers, it was granted him with condition, that he should make no motion unto them to turne from that they were determined to do, but to tell them of things, which (as he said) tended greatly to their benefit. Whereupon silence being made, he got up upon a little hillocke, and there spake unto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithlesse men, the wickedest that ever MACEDON bred! What so great Triumph or Victory, hath ever Antigonus wonne of you, having fought it such infinite waies, as you your selves doe now put into his hands, delivering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great shame, that being Masters of the Field, you will grant the honour of the Victory unto your Enemy, onely for a little covetousnesse of Money and paltrey stuffe which you have lost? And yet is not this all, but the worst behinde: to send your Captaines as you do to pay the Ranfome of your baggage. "For my self, though now they leade me bound, yet do I remain free unovercome, vanquisher of mine Enemies, and sold by them that should be my friends. Well, yet this request I onely make unto you in the Name of Jupiter, Protector of Armes, and for the honour of the gods, (unto whom all vowed Oathes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and conjure you, to kill me your selves in this place. For all cometh to one end. To be slaine in Antigonus Campe by the hands of mine owne Enemies, will ever be counted your deed: and you may be assured he will not be angry withall, for he onely desireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needs hold your hands from this attempt, unloose yet one of mine onely, that shall suffice to do the feat. And if for feare ye will not put a Sword in my hand, throw me bound yet hand and feete unto wilde Beasts: which if ye performe, then do I discharge you of your Oath taken between both my hands which ye have sworn unto your Captaine, as holily and perfectly performed. Upon this speech of Eumenes, all the rest of the Army had compassion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cried out to carry him away, and not give ear to his Preaching: and that it was a good deed to punish this wicked CHOERONESIAN, according to his deserts, considering that he had turmoiled the MACEDONIANS with endlesse Warre and Battell. And moreover, that it were too much shame that the worthiest Souldiers that ever served King Philip and Alexander, so painfully in all their Warres, should for recompence of their Service in their old age be turned a begging, their Wives having now lain three nights with their Enemies. With those words, they violently drave him on towards Antigonus Campe, who fearing lest the multitude of People that ranne to see him, would smother him in the presse, because every man ranne out of the Campe, he sent thither ten of the strongest Elephants he had, and a good number of men at Armes of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the presse. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus Campe, his heart would not serve him to see him in that miserable state, for that they had once been familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him in their custody, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would have him kept: who answered them: Like a Lion or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pity of him, and discharged him of his weightiest Irons, and sent one of his household Servants to him to see him well used, and suffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many daies before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing every man speake, and pondering their purposes and severall opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his owne Sonne Demarius spake for Eumenes, and made suite to save his life, contrary to all the other Lords and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any case have him die. Eumenes standing on these termes, asked his Keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus meant, that having his Enemy in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or nobly deliver him? Onomarchus churlishly answered him againe, that the time was past now to shew his courage, as though he feared not death: and that he should have shewed it in the Field at the Battell. So helpe me Jupiter.

pitier (quoth he) so have I done, and if thou believest not me, aske them that set upon me: for I never met with man yet more strong then my selfe, Onomarchus replied againe: sith now therefore thou hast found a stronger then thy selfe, why then canst thou not abide his pleasure? In fine, when Antigonus had resolved of his death, he commanded them to give him no more Meate: and thus taking his sustenance from him, Eumenes was three daies a dying. In the meane time came such Newes, that suddenly the Campe removed, and therefore before their departure, a man was sent to Eumenes to dispatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licenced his friends to take his Body and burn it, and then to gather his ashes and bones to send them to his Wife and Children. Eumenes being slaine in this manner, the gods appointed none other Judges to revenge the disloyalty and treason of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying Eumenes, but Antigonus selfe: who detesting them as cruell murderers, and perjured Persons to the gods, appointed Ithyrius Governour of the Province of ARACHOSIA, to kill them every Mothers Son what way he could, that none of them might ever see MACEDON againe, nor the Greekish Sea.

THE COMPARISON OF EUMENES with SERTORIUS.

The Government of Eumenes and Sertorius.

Here we have set downe the things worthy memory of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being strangers in a strange Countrey, and banished out of their owne, had alwaies been Captaines of divers Nations, and Chieftaines of great and warlike Armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his Faction gave him the chiefe place of Authority, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to command: where Eumenes having many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the Army, through his noble Deeds, obtained the chiefe place and Authority in the same. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be governed by a good Captaine: and for their own safety gave place to the other, seeing themselves unable to command. For Sertorius being a ROMANE, governed the SPANIARDS and LUSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHOERRONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which the SPANIARDS of long time had been subject to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had subdued all the World. Furthermore, Sertorius being then of great estimation, for that he was a Senator of ROME, and had charge of men of Warre before, came to the Dignity and Estate to be Chieftaine of a great Army. Where Eumenes came with small reputation, disdained for that he was but a Secretary: and when he began to come forwards, had not onely lesse meane to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets and impediments also, to hinder his rising and estimation. For many, openly stood against him, and secretly conspired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, untill his latter end, when certaine of his Companions secretly conspired against him. Therefore Sertorius end of all his dangers, was to overcome his Enemies: where Eumenes greatest dangers came through his Victories which he wanne of his owne men, through the malice of them that envied his Honour. Now for their Deeds of Armes, they are both in manner alike: but on the other side for their Conditions, Eumenes naturally loved Warre and contention, and Sertorius embraced peace and quietnesse. For Eumenes that might have lived in safety with Honour, if he would but have given place to his betters, and forsaken the Warres: liked better with the danger of his life to follow Martiall Feates, with the greatest Personages of MACEDON, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being unwilling unwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the safety of his Person to take Armes against them that would not let him live in Peace. For had not Eumenes been so ambitious and stout to strive against Antigonus for the chiefe place of Authority, but could have been contented with the second, Antigonus would have been right glad thereof: where Pompey would never so much as suffer Sertorius to live in rest. So the one made voluntary Warre onely to rule, and the other against his will was compelled to rule, because they made Warres with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loved Warre, preferring the covetous desire of a better Estate, above the safety of his life: and the other as a right Souldier, used the Warres onely for a meane to save his life by valiant defence of Armes. Furthermore, the one was slaine, mistrusting no treason against him: and the other, looking every houre for present death threatened him. Whereof the one argued a noble minde, not to mistrust them whom he thought his Friends: and the other shewed a faint heart, being taken when he meant to flie. So Sertorius death dishonoured not his life, suffering that of his owne Companions, which his deadly foes could never make him suffer. The other having no power to avoide his destiny before he was taken, and having sought meane to live being in Prison and Captivity, could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For begging life at his Enemies hands, he gave him his heart with his body, who before had but his body in his power.

Sertorius death more honest, then the death of Eumenes.

THE LIFE OF AGESILAVS.

Ann. Mund.

Rehidamus the Sonne of Zenxidamus, having honourably reigned in LACEDÆMON, left two Sons behinde him: Agis which he begat of that Noble Lady Lamprido, and Agessilavus a great deale younger, which he had by Eupolia, Melissippidas Daughter. So the Kingdome falling by succession unto Agis the elder, the younger Son Agessilavus remaining a private Person, was brought up after the LACONIAN manner, which was a straight kinde of Life: but withall it taught Children how to obey. Whereof it is thought the Poet Simonides calleth SPARTA, Damasimbratos: to wit, making men civill: for that by continuance of custome, it frameth the Citizens to be obedient to the Lawes, as much or more then any other City that ever was in the World, taming them from their childhood, as they do young Colts. The Law dispenceth with the Heires apparent to the Crown, from that straight subjection and hard Life: but Agessilavus had that excellency in him above all others of his Estate, that he came to the Dignity and Honour to command, having from his youth learned to obey. The which undoubtedly was the cause, that he knew better then any other King, how to please and beare with his Subject, helping his his Royall State and princely behaviour grafted in him by nature, with that courtesie and familiarity, which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the Boyes which were brought up together, Lysander fell in love with him, wondering at the modesty of his wit. For having better Spirit, and being more constant in his opinion than any of the other Children, striving ever to excell in all things, with such a vehemency he tooke all Travels in hand, that it was unpoffible to overcome him, much lesse to compell him. He was on the other side so milde and gentle, that every courteous word wrought in him better obedience then any feare could do; because it grieved him more to be reprov'd, then to take upon him any paine or labour. And for the deformity of his Leggs, the one being shorter then the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasant wit, he ufed the matter so pleasantly and patiently, that he would merrily mocke himselfe: which manner of merry behaviour did greatly hide the blame of the blemish. Yea further, his life and courage was the more commendable in him, for that men saw that notwithstanding his lameness, he refused no paine nor labour. Of his Person we have drawne no counterfeite, because he would not in any wise have it drawn, and did expresse command by his Will, that they should neither draw his Picture nor make any Mould or Image of his Body. Howbeit we finde that he was small of Stature, whereby his preference promisd no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was ever merry and pleasant, and never pensive nor troublesome in word nor looke, even to the last end of his life he was better loved, then the most fair creature that lived. Notwithstanding, the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemne King Archidamus in a summe of Money because he married a little Woman: saying, that he would beget them demy Kings, no Kings indeed.

In the time that his eldest Son Agis reigned King Alcibiades, being banished ATHENS, fled out of SICILE into LACEDÆMON, and had not long remained in SPARTA before they suspected him that he kept King Agis Wife, called Timea: for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the Child he brought to be his Sonne, saying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timea cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as she fate amongst her Women, softly she called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other side they report, that Alcibiades himself said it was for no hurt he meant to any man, that he lay with Queen Timea, but onely for the desire he had that some of the Kings of LACEDÆMON should be begotten of his Seed. Nevertheless at the length he was driven to forsake LACEDÆMON, mistrusting King Agis, who ever after doubted of the Child, and thought him a bastard: untill such time as being on his death Bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and so behaved himself, that Agis before many Witnesses, said he did acknowledge him for his Son. This notwithstanding, when King Agis was dead, Lysander that had then overcome the ATHENIANS by Sea, and was more in credit and Authority in the City of SPARTA then any other, practised to put the Crown upon Agesilaus head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest unto it, because he was a bastard.
The like did divers other Citizens say of him, which loved Agesilaus Vertue, and liked him passingly; for that he had been brought up from his childhood among them. But on the contrary part also, there was a Soothsayer or Wifard in SPARTA called Diopirbes, that had a number of old Prophecies without book, and was accounted a very skillfull man touching Prophecies and Divinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be King of SPARTA: and for proof thereof he told this ancient Oracle before the Councell.

*As fastly as thy stomacke is, O Sparta take good heed.
And stand upon thy guard, and looke about thee, I thee reed, For halting one day down will cast thine Empire to the ground.
By means of Warres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.*

Lysander replied against it, saying, that if the SPARTANS were afraid of this Oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For the gods cared not, if any man lame of a foot aspired to be King: but rather if he were a bastard, and not lineally descended of the Race of Hercules. For that, said he, were to make the Kingdome halt. Agesilaus furthermore alleadged, that the god Neptune himselfe had witnessed, that Leotychides was a bastard: for he drave Agis by an Earthquake, to runne out of his Wives Chamber, and that ten Moneths after that, and more, Leotychides was born. So was Agesilaus upon these allegations not onely proclaimed King of SPARTA, but he had given him moreover, as lawfull Heire, all his Brother Agis Goods, and Leotychides rejected as a bastard.
Notwithstanding, considring that his Parents by his Mothers side were very poor (yet honest men) he left them the moiety of all the Goods: by which Act, Agesilaus wonne all their good wills, where else they had envied him for his succession in the Kingdome. And (as Xenophon saith) by obeying his Countrey, he grew to such power that he might doe whatsoever he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the sway and Government of the Common-wealth; the Ephores Office changing yearly, the other being for life: the which Ephori were onely ordained to bridle the insolency of the Kings, for that they should not (as we have more amply written in Lycurgus Life) have absolute power in their hands. Upon this occasion, the Kings that succeeded in the Government, had (as it were) by Inheritance a present grudge and malice against them.
This notwithstanding, Agesilaus tooke a contrary course to all his Predecessours. For where others presently quarrelled with the Ephori and Senators, Agesilaus did honour and reverence them, and would never dispatch any matter without their privy, but was alwaies ready to goe when they did send him. When he was set in his Chaire of State to give Audience, if any of the Ephori chanced to come in, he would rise up unto them: and at the Election of any new Senator, he would for honours sake present him a Gown and an Ox. And thus cunningly seeming to honour

and increase the dignity of the Senators, winning their good wills, he made his power great, and the Realme much greater. Furthermore, his behaviour towards the rest of his Countymen was such, as his enmity was lesse faulty then his friendship. For he did never hurt his enemies without just cause, but he aided his friends even in unjust causes. And whereas he thought it a shame not to honour his enemies when they had done well, he could not find in his heart to rebuke his friends when they did amisse, but rather gloried in succouring and helping of them in their evil doings. For he thought it no shame to serve his friends turne, howsoever it were. Again, when any of his adversaries offended, he was as sorry for it as any man, and as ready to bear with it if he were intreated: whereby he allured and won the hearts of all men. The Ephori seeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in money, for that he made the common love of his Countrey private to himself. For as natural Philosophers hold opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of Nature, it would come to passe that the heavenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all things should be at a stay, by reason of the mutuall agreement between the world and them: even so, the Law-maker of LACEDÆMON seemed to have allowed ambition and strife in the Commonwealth, as a spur to vertue, by procuring alwaies some contention and emulation among great persons. And his reason was, that this base and effeminate favour, in winking one at another when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of Concord. And sure some think that Homer also law the same, for he would never else have made Agamemnon to have rejoiced to see Ulysses and Achilles at great words together, if he had not been of opinion, that envy and contention among great men, were very available for the Commonwealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to Cities, where they are violent, and do bring great dangers with them.
Now when Agesilaus was entred into his Kingdome of LACEDÆMON, newes were brought him out of ASIA, that the King of PERSIA prepared a great Navy to conquer the LACEDÆMONI-ANS signiory by sea. Lysander being glad of this occasion, longing to be sent again to ASIA to succor his friends whom he left there as Governors and Lieutenants of Cities and Provinces (of the which, some of them were driven away by their Citizens, others also put to death for abusing their authority, and ruling over-cruelly) perswaded Agesilaus to go into ASIA, to make war upon this barbarous King, far from GREECE, before his Army were gathered together. And to compasse this the easilier, he wrote unto his friends in ASIA, that they should send unto SPARTA to require Agesilaus for their Captaine, and so they did. Thereupon Agesilaus going to the assembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would give him thirty Captaines of the SPAR-TANS to be counsellors and assistants to him in these warres, two thousand free ILOTS, and fixe thousand of the confederates of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediately granted through Lysanders friendship towards him, and he was sent away straight with the thirty Captaines which he had requested; of the which Lysander was the chiefest, not onely for his riches and authority, but also for the good will he bare unto Agesilaus: who thought himself more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, then for his friendship he shewed him in bring him to be King. Now Agesilaus Army being assembled at the haven of Gerepha, himself with certain of his friends went unto the City of AULIDE, where in his sleep he dreamed that one said unto him: O King of the LACEDÆMONI-ANS, thou knowest that never none but Agamemnon, and now thy self, was chosen General of all GREECE: considering therefore that thou commandest the same people he did, that thou makest warres with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to go thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same sacrifice unto the goddesse, the which he made at his like departure. Agesi-laus straight upon this vision, remembered that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Sooth-sayers did sacrifice his own daughter in the same place: yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and said, he would sacrifice that unto the goddesse, which he thought would please her well enough; and that he would not follow that cruell devotion of this ancient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a Hinde crowned with a Garland of Flowers, and commanded his Soothsayers to sacrifice her, and would not suffer him to have the honour to do the sacrifice that was appointed for the same purpose by the Governours of BOEOTIA according to the custome of that place. The Governours of BOEOTIA understanding it were much offended, and sent their Officers to will Agesilaus not to do any sacrifice there, contrary to the law and custome of their Countrey. The Officers that were sent, performed their commision: and finding that the beast was slaine, and the quarters of it upon the Altar, they tooke and hung them off the Altar every way. This vexed Agesilaus, being ready to imbarke, and depart thence in choler against the THEBANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this unlucky prediction, which seemed to pronoscicate unto him, that he should prevaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arrived at EPHEsus, he presently millicked the honour he saw done unto Lysander, and the great train that waited on him. For all the Countymen there repaired continually to his house; and when he came abroad, they all followed him wheresoever he went; as though Lysander had indeed been in authority to do what he would, and that Agesilaus onely had but the name to be General, so appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in truth there was never GRECIAN Captaine in those parts that had won him such estimation, nor that was more feared then he: nor there was never man that was more beneficial to his friends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being fresh in memory, the Countymen of that Countrey perceiving the simplicity of Agesilaus, and how he was given to please the people, and carried no great majesty nor countenance with him, and observing in Lysander that wonted roughnesse and sharpe speech wherewith they had beene acquainted before; every man obeyed him, and nothing was done but what he commanded. This first of all made the other SPARTANS angry, for that it appeared they were come as it were to serve Lyfander, and not not as to counsell the King: but after that, Agelilaus himself also grew discontented, although of his own nature he was not envious, nor sorry to see others honoured besides himself. Yet being a man ambitiously given, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should do any noble exploit in this war, that they would impute it unto Lyfander, for the great estimation he was of, he began to deale in this sort with him. First he contrariad all his counsels: and what matters soever he preferred, which he was desirous should have taken effect. Agelilaus would none of that, but took some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lyfanders followers came to make suite to him for his favour, perceiving that they did leane unto Lyfander, he sent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in matters of judgements, if Lyfander were against any, they were fure to have the matter passe on their side. On the contrary part also, if Lyfander bare good will to the party, and favored the cause to gratifie him, they hardly escaped from setting a fine on their heads, Agelilaus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chance to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lyfander locking into the cause, diffembled not with his friends, but told them plainly, that it was for his sake they had those repulses and wrongs, and therefore did counsel them to wait upon the King, and those that had more credit then himself. Now Agelilaus supposed he gave that advice to make every man to malice him: wherefore, to despite him the more, he made him distributor of his victuals: and having done so, some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: Now let them go and honour my flesh-distributor, Lyfander being grieved withall, said unto the King: My Lord, you know how to oppresse your friends. And so do I, said Agelilaus, how to keep them under that would be greater then my selfe. It may be yet (replied Lyfander) I have not done as your Grace doth say: yet if you so conceive of me, put me I beseech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good service without offence. After this talke between them, Agelilaus sent him into HELLESPONT, where by practise he tooke prisoner a Noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus Province whereof he was Governor, and brought him to Agelilaus with a great summe of Gold and Silver, and neare about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgat not his grudge to Agelilaus, but being offended still, sought opportunity and means to defeat the two houses of the privilege of the Kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broile (in my opinion) in the City of SPARTA, had he not been prevented by death, in a journey he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we see, that ambitious minds observing no meane, are in a Commweale oft times more hurtful then beneficial. For though Lyfander was indeed intolerable, to shew himself so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agelilaus ignorant neither, that there were divers other meanes lesse reproachful to punish such a Noble man, that offended only by greediness of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe passion: the one not to know his Princes power; and the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afraid of Agelilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him understand that the King would be content to let the Cities of GRECE in ASIA at liberty: notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed war. Agelilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through GRECE, that he would do some noble exploit in his journey. Moreover he thought himself dishonoured for ever, that the ten thousand GRECIANS which were returned back from the farthest part of ASIA, even unto the sea Major (under the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had overcome the King of PERSIAES Army as oft as they listed themselves: and that he which was the Lieutenant General of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commanded both sea and land) should not do some deed worthy memory among the GRECIANS. Presently therefore to revenge Tisaphernes perjury by just deceit, he made a countenance as though he would first invade the Countrey of CARIA. Whereupon this barbarous person Tisaphernes gathered all his power together. But Agelilaus on a suddaine returned back againe, and entered into PHRYGIA, tooke there many Cities, and wan great spoile, making his men see by experience, that to infringe and breake a league made and avowed by oath, was a sacrilege, and contemning of the gods. On the other side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not only just and honourable, but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agelilaus being weaker in horsemen then his enemies, and finding the livers of the beasts which he had sacrificed, without heads, he returned into the City of PHEBUS, and there gathered horsemen together, letting the rich men understand (which would not themselves serve in person) that he did dispence with their persons, so that they did set out horse and man furnished for service in their place. Many of them took that course; and by this meanes Agelilaus within few dayes had leavyed a great number of men at Armes, instead of footmen that could do small service. For they that were unwilling to go to the wars, did hire them that were willing to serve in their place; and such as would not serve a horsebacke, did give them pay that were desirous to serve in their steads. In this he wisely followed King Agememnonus example, who did dispence with the person of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agelilaus commanded them that sold the prisoners by the Drum taken in the warres, that they should strip them naked, and so sell them, which they did. And sundry persons willingly bought their spoiles and raiment, but they scorned their bodies, because they saw them white skinned, soft and delicate: so that few men would out-bid the price for them, for that they thought those men unprofitable and good for nothing. Agelilaus also being present at this sale of purpose, said thus unto his men:

men: See, my friends, quoth he, these be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoiles for the which ye shall fight. The time being come now to put himself into the field, and to invade his enemies Countrey again, he gave out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceive Tisaphernes again, but Tisaphernes deceived himself. For he being deceived before by Agelilaus, gave no credit to this second rumor, but perswaded himself that doubtlesse Agelilaus meant then to enter into CARIA, and the rather for that it was a Woody Countrey, very ill for horsemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agelilaus invading (as he had given it out) the champion Countrey, in the which stood SARDIS the capital City of LYDIA, Tisaphernes was compelled to come to rescue it in haste; and being come thither with great speed with his horsemen he stole upon many of his enemies whom he found stragling out of order, spoiling the Countrey, and put the most of them to the sword. Agelilaus having intelligence of this, imagined with himselfe that the footmen of his enemy could not yet be arrived, and considering also that he had his Army whole about him, thought it best forthwith to bid him battell, rather then to delay time any longer. Thereupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed footmen, and commanded them straight to charge the enemy, whilst he caused the heavier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled upon it immediately: and the GRECIANS lustily following the chase, tooke their Campe, and made great slaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leisure enough not only to spoile and over-run the Kings Countrey at their pleasure, but also to see the revenge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruell enemy to the GRECIANS. For the King of PERSIA made another his Lieutenant immediately in his roome, called Tibbrautes, who strake off Tisaphernes head, and sent unto Agelilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of gold and silver to depart out of his Countrey. Thereto Agelilaus answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but the LACEDÆMONIANS; and that for his own part, it was an easier matter to enrich his souldiers then himselfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it a dishonour to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then spoiles. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tibbrautes some what, for that he had taken revenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS; for the sum of thirty talents given him to defray his charges, he withdrew his Army out of LYDIA, and went into PHRYGIA. In his journey he received from the council of LACEDÆMON the Scytala or scrowle of parchment wreathed about, advertising him that the Citizens had made also their General by sea, as he was by land. Agelilaus onely of all men obtained this honour, who without comparison was of all other the worthiest man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witnesseth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnesse of his authority. In this notwithstanding he was not to be blamed, when he made choice of one Pisander his wives brother, to be Lieutenant of the Navy, and forsooke other Captaines of better experience and elder years: seeking rather to please his wife, and to advance one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and safety of his Countrey. Afterwards he led his Army into Pharnabazus Countrey which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all sorts of victuals, but gathered together also a wonderful masse of mony. From thence he went into the Realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with King Cotys, who for his vertue and constant fidelity was very desirous of his friendship. The like did Spythridates, forsaking Pharnabazus, and came unto Agelilaus: and after he was come to him, he never went from him, but always followed him wheresoever he went. Spythridates had a young Son that was passing faire, called Megabates (of whom Agelilaus had great liking) and likewise a faire young woman to his daughter, of age to be married, whom Agelilaus caused King Cotys to marry. So taking of King Cotys a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footmen light armed, he returned backe to PHRYGIA, and there destroyd Pharnabazus Countrey which he had in Government, who durst not meete him in the field, nor trust to his holds, but still fled from him, carrying all the chiefest things with him, sitting from place to place, untill that Spythridates accompanied with Eripidas the SPARTAN, followed him so neare, that he tooke his Campe, and all his treasure in it. But there did Eripidas shew himselfe so hard and cruell, over-straightly searching out part of the spoile that had been imbezled, compelling the barbarous people to deliver it againe, ransacking every corner for it; that Spythridates was offended withall, that on a suddaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe unto the City of SARDIS. This more grieved Agelilaus then any thing that hapened to him in all his journey, for that he lost so valiant a man as Spythridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he carried away with him. Moreover, he was afraid lest they would detect him of miserable covetousnesse, a thing which he ever was careful to avoid, not onely in his own person, but also to keep all his Countriemen from it. But besides these known causes, the love he bare to Spythridates Son pinched him nearely, though when the Boy was with him, he strived with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection and desire he had of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him and to kisse him, Agelilaus turned his face from the Boy. The Boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloofe off. Agelilaus then repented him that he had not suffered Megabates to kisse him, made as though he marvelled why he did not kisse him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: Your selfe, O King, is in fault, because you durst not tarry, but were afraid to kisse so faire a Boy: for if he knew your minde, he would come againe, so that you turned your face no more away. When Agelilaus had heard them, he paused a while, and said never a word, but in fine answered them: It shall not need you say any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuse such an other kisse againe, then if all that I see before me were gold. Thus was Agelilaus disposed when

Megabates was with him: but in his absence he did so love him, that I dare scantily say, that if the boy had come againe into his presence, he would have refused a kisse at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus fought to speake with him, and one Apollonides a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend unto them both. Agesilaus, was the first that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarrying for Pharnabazus coming, he laid him down upon the deep grasse in the shadow, under a faire cypress tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, and they spread soft skins long haired, and Tapetry excellently wrought of divers colours, for him to sit upon the ground. But being shamed to see Agesilaus laid on the bare ground in that sort, he also lay down by him, though he had upon him a marvellous rich Gowne, of excellent Tissue and passing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began first to speake, and lacked no good persuasions and just complaints, for that he having been (as he was) a friend unto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre against the ATHENIANS, was then spoiled and sacked by them. Agesilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung down their heads for shame, not knowing how to answer him, considering that Pharnabazus had injury offered him, began to speak in this manner: Heretofore when we were friends with the King (my Lord Pharnabazus) we have used his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we use them: and since we see that thou wilt needs be a slave of his, marvell not though we hurt thee for his sake. But when thou shalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS then a slave to the King PERSIA, then make account that all these souldiers, this armour, our ships, and all we are to defend thy goods and liberty against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortal men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly: Surely, said he if the King do send hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be sure I will then take your part straight; but on the other side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this war, trust to it, I will do him the best service I can against you. This answer passingly pleased Agesilaus who taking him by the hand, and rising up with him, said unto him: I would wish (my Lord Pharnabazus) having so noble a minde as thou hast, that thou wert rather our friend then an enemy. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his Sonne being left behind, ran to Agesilaus, and smiling told him, King Agesilaus, I will make thee my friend: and therewith gave him a dart he had in his hand. Agesilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beauty of the young youth, and the courtesie he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might bestow on him. At the last he spied his Secretary Adams home, which had a rich caparison on: he straight tooke it from him, and gave the horse and furniture to this lively youth Pharnabazus Son, who never after forgate it. For it chanced afterwards, that being driven out of his Country by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESUS, Agesilaus made very much of him, and did not sticke to further him in his love abroad. For he had a great fancy and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought up in wrestling, one day to play for the best games. But when he was growne a big man and strong, and that he came to offer himselfe to be billed with them that should wraitle at the Games Olympical, being in some perill to be utterly refused; this PERSIAN that loved him, went unto Agesilaus, and besough his helpe, that this wrestler might not receive the foile to be rejected. Agesilaus being desirous to please him, performed his request with some difficulty. Thus Agesilaus in all things else was a strict observer of the Law: but in his friends causes to be straight laced in matters of justice, he said that was but an excuse for them that would do nothing for their friends. To this effect they finde a letter of his written unto Idrius Prince of CARIA, for the delivery of his friend. If Nicias have not offended, let him go; if he have offended, then pardon him for my sake: but howsoever it be, let him go. This was Agesilaus manner in the most part of his friends causes. Notwithstanding, occasions fell out often times, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the Commonwealt. As appeared one day when he was driven to remove in haste on a suddaine, and to leave one sicke behinde him whom he loved dearly: the sicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, besought him that he would not forsake him. Agesilaus (as Hieronymus the Philosopher reported) turned backe againe and said: O how hard is it, both to love and to be wise! Now had Agesilaus spent two yeares in this warre, and was spoken of throughout ASIA, being marvellously commended to the King himselfe, and for his great honesty, his continence, his courtesie, and plain dealing. For when he rode out into the Country with his owne traine onely, he would ever lie in the holiest Temples of the Gods, because he would the gods themselves should be witnesses of his private doings; whereas commonly we are loth that men should see what we do. Furthermore, amongst so many thousand souldiers as were in his Campe, there could hardly be found a worse mattresse then that himselfe did lie upon every night. And as for heate and cold, he could as easily away with either of both, as if by constitution of body he had been born to abide any weather and season. But above all, it was a pleasant sight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they saw the great Lords the Kings Lieutenants of PERSIA (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and given to all lust and pleasure) to honour and fear a man that went up and down in a poor Cape, being afraid of every short word that he spake like a LACONIAN, insomuch as many of them called to mind the Poets verses, who said:

As Mars hath no mercy, so Greece scorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being up and in garboile, they willingly yielded to him in every place, after he had taken order with the Cities, and had established the liberty of their Commonweale, without any bloodshed, or banishment of any person: he determined to go further into the land, and transporting the wars from the sea coasts of GREECE, to fight with the King of PERSIA in proper person person, and with the wealth and happinesse of the ECBATANIANS and the SUSIANIANS, and by that meane to his leisure from him, who sitting still before, made the GRECIANS make warre one with another, by force of money corriping the Governours of every City. In the meane time came Epycidas the LACONIAN unto him, and brought him news how SPARTA was grievously troubled with wars, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephori did send for him home, and commanded him to return to defend his Country.

Agesilaus sent for out of Asia.

Alas wretched Greece, how cruell slaughters hast Thou brought upon thee, for to lay thee waste?

For how should a man otherwise call this envy, treason, and civil conspiracy among the GRECIANS, who overthrew their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their wars against the barbarous people out of GREECE, and now to bring it against themselves? I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that the said GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which saw not Alexander the Great sitting in Darius Royall throne: but rather I would think they should have wept, to have left this honour unto Alexander and the MACEDONIANS, fondly losing so many famous Captaines of GREECE, at the battels of LEUCTRES, of CORONEA, of CORINTH and famous ARCADIA. Nevertheless, Agesilaus never did better act in his life, nor ever shewed better example of obedience and justice due to his Country, then he did in his return home. For sith Hannibal that began to have ill successe in his warres, being in a manner driven out of ITALY, thought never (but compelled) to return againe into his Country, to obey his Countreimen, which called him home to defend the warres the ROMANS had made at their owne doores: and that Alexander the Great, also being sent home upon the like occasion, did not onely refuse to returne into MACEDON, but made a jest at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with King AGIS, saying: Methinks when I heare these newes, whilest we are overcomming of King Darius here, there hath been a battell of Rattes fought in ARCADIA, sith then (I say) these two famous Captaines have made so little account of their Country, may we not thinke the City of SPARTA blessed to have had such a King, that so much revered his Country and obeyed the Law, as receiving only a little scrowle of Parchment commanding him to returne, he forsooke a world of goods and wealth that he quietly enjoyed (with assured hope and certainty of more) and embarked forthwith, leaving all the allies and confederates of his Country very sorrowfull, for that he had given over so noble an enterprise, which he had so happily begunne? Yes sure Nay furthermore he passed not for the saying of Demoftratus PHACIAN, who said, that the LACEDÆMONIANS, in publique matters were the worthiest men, and the ATHENIANS in private causes. For as he had shewed himselfe a good King and an excellent Captaine to the Common-wealth, so was he always courteous privately to his familiar friends. And because the PERSIAN coine was stamped on the one side, with the print of an Archer; Agesilaus being ready to depart, said, that ten thousand Archers drave him out of ASIA. For so much was brought unto THEBES and ATHENS, and distributed among the Orators and Governours there, who through their Orations made both those great Cities to rise, and make warre against the SPARTANS. In his return Agesilaus having passed the strait of HELLESPOINT, took his way through the Country of THRACIA, and never intreated barbarous King nor people to suffer him to passe, but only sent unto them to know whether they would he should passe through their Country as a friend, or an enemy. All Countries and Nations else received very honorably to their power, save the people called THROCHALIANS, unto whom King Xerxes himselfe gave presents that he might passe friendly through their Country: who sent unto Agesilaus to demand a hundred silver talents, and a hundred women to suffer him to passe through their Country. But Agesilaus laughing them to scorn, answered again: Why, how chanceth it that they came not themselves to receive them? So therewithall he marched forward against these barbarous people who were ranged in battell-ray to stop his passage: howbeit he overthrew them, and slew a great number of them in the field. The like demand he made unto the King of MACEDON, whether he should passe through his Country as a friend, or an enemy. The King made him answer, he would consider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quoth Agesilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The King then wondering at his great boldnesse, and fearing lest he would do him some hurt as he went, sent to pray him that he would passe through his Country as a friend. Now it chanced so that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDÆMONIANS: therefore as he passed through their Country, he did spoile and forrage it as his enemies Country, and sent Xenocles and Scythia to the City of LARISSE, hoping to persuade them to take part with the LACEDÆMONIANS. These two Ambassadors were retained there as prisoners. The SPARTANS were marvellously offended withall: and thought good that Agesilaus should besiege LARISSE with his Army. But he answered them, he would not lose one of those men, to winne all THESSALIE: and therefore found means that he redeemed them againe by composition. Peradventure this is not to be marvelled at in Agesilaus that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the City of CORINTH, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines slaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS, he seemed not to rejoyce at it, but rather to fetch a grievous sigh, saying: O poore GREECE, how unfortunate art thou, to have slaine with thine owne hands so many valiant Captaines of thine owne people, as joyning together, might at one field have overcome all the barbarous people? The PHARSALIANS harrying and troubling the rereward of Agelilaus Army, he put forth five hundred horsemen which gave him so lusty a charge, that he overthrow them by force. For this victory, he set up tokens of Triumph upon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victory pleased him above all the rest, because with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of himselfe, he had overthrowen the glory and pride of the enemies horsemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many years before. Thither came Diphris one of the Ephores unto him, sent of purpose from SPARTA, to command him immediately to invade BOEOTIA, with his Army. Now though Agelilaus intended some other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet because he would not disobey the Councils commandement of SPARTA, he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA was at hand, and therefore he sent for two Companies of them which lay in Campe by CORINTH. The LACEDÆMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honour Agelilaus for that he had obeyed their commandement so readily, proclaimed in the City, that as many young men as were desirous to go aide the King, should come to enter their names. Notwithstanding, they only chose but fifty of the valiantest among them, and sent them unto him. In the meane time, Agelilaus passed through the Countrey of THERMOPILES, and coasting over the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDÆMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the City of CHERONIA: where immediately after his arrival, he suddenly saw the Sunne Eclipsed, and darkened in the fashion of a new Moon. Even withall, came the newes of the death of Pisander unto him, who was slaine in a battell which he had lost by sea, fighting against Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Isle of GNIDOS. These newes were very heavy unto him, both for respect of the person his kinsman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the Common-wealth. Nevertheless, fearing his souldiers would be discouraged with the newes, and become faint-hearted, being ready to joyne battell, he commanded them that came from the Sea, to brute abroad a contrary tale to that they told him: and he himselfe to make good their speech, came out among them, with a Garland of flowers on his head, and did sacrifice to the gods, as thanking them for their good newes, sending to every one of his friends a peece of flesh sacrificed, as he commonly used to do, in any publique cause of joy. Then marching forward, he straight discovered his enemies farre off, and they likewise him: and thereupon put his men in battell ray, and gave the left wing unto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himselfe the right wing. The THEBANS on the other side, placed themselves in the right wing of their Army, and gave the left unto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Agelilaus side, writeth that he never knew of the like field fought. At the first onler, the conflict was not great between both, neither held long, because the THEBANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS straight, and Agelilaus the ARGIVES. But when either side understood that the left wings of their battell were in great distresse and that they turned their backs, they returned suddenly againe. And where Agelilaus might easily have had the victory without any danger, if he had suffered the Squadron of the enemies to passe by him, and afterwards to have charged them in the rereward: of a noble courage to shew his valiantnesse, he gave charge upon the vaward, to have honour in overcoming them. The THEBANS on the other side no lesse valiantly received him, and fought lustily on all hands: but the cruellest fight was about Agelilaus person, with the fifty young men that were sent to guard him, who shewed themselves very valiant. Agelilaus was sore hurt, notwithstanding their valiant resistance. his armour being passed through with their Pikes and Swords in sundry places: Whereupon they environed him round amongst them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of them, and many of themselves also being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too strong in the vaward, they were forced to do that which they refused at the first: and opening themselves, gave them passage through them. So when they were passed them, the SPARTANS perceiving how loosely and disorderly they marched, as thinking themselves out of all danger, followed them and gave charge upon their flank. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they rejoycing for their victory at this battell, retired faire and softly unto the mountaine Helicon. But Agelilaus not withstanding he was very sore hurt, with many a grievous wound, would not go into his Pavillion to be dressed, before he had been first at the place where the battell was fought, and had seen his men that were slaine brought away in their armours. As many of his enemies as were fled into the Temple of Minerva Italian, which was not farre from thence (where also were set up tokens of triumph offered unto her a long time before the THEBANS, when they had overcome the Army of the ATHENIANS, under the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had slaine also Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his men they should let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Agelilaus desirous to see if the THEBANS had any courage to come down to fight againe, commanded his souldiers to put Garlands upon their heads, and his Musicians to sound their Shalmes or Pipes, whilist he did set up a token of Triumph as victorious. Moreover, his enemies sending to him to aske leave to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victory. After that, being carried to the City of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a solemn procession and common sacrifice unto Apollo, and offered him the tenth part of all his spoiles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the summe of an hundred Talents. This thing done, he returned into his Countrey, where he was greatly honoured and esteemed of all his Citizens and Countermen, for his orderly life and noble behaviour: for he was no Changeling, but the selfe same man in state and condition that he was before he tooke his journey. He transformed not himselfe into strangers manners, as commonly other Captaines taines do, that returne out of a farre Country where they have made wars: neither did he scorne his Country fashions, or shewed himselfe disobedient to the Lawes thereof, but alwayes kept and observed them, without any manner of alteration in his meate and drinke, in washing or bathing, in his wives apparell, in his armoury, or any way else in his houshold stufe, as if he had never passed over the River of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his old gates standing, that were of so great continuance, that they were thought to be those which Aristodemus had set up. Xenophon also said, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more sumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDÆMON, is a kind of Coach or Chariot after the likenesse of Griffins, Harts, or Goates: upon the which they carried young Wenches in solemne procession in the City. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agelilaus: and Dicaearchus alio was much offended, that they neither knew Agelilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we find in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Agelilaus wives name was Cleora, one of his daughters called Apollia, and the other Prolyta. Moreover, Agelilaus speare is seen to this day in the City of SPARTA, even like unto others, and no manner of difference. Now Agelilaus perceiving certaine Citizens of SPARTA to stand upon their reputation, and esteeming themselves above others, because they kept horse in their stable, perswaded his Sister Cynisca to send her Coach and Coach-horses to the Olympian games to runne for the best prize, onely to let the GRECIANS see, that it was no act of any vertue, but simply of riches and cost. Furthermore having Xenophon the Philosopher about him, whom he loved, and made great account of, he perswaded him to send for his Sons to LACEDÆMON, that they might be brought up there, where they should learn the noblest science that men could possibly learne, to wit, to obey, and to command. When Lyfander was dead, Agelilaus at his return out of ASIA, found a great faction and conspiracy raised by his meanes against him in SPARTA: and because, it might appeare what manner of Citizen Lyfander was when he lived, he was likely to have openly shewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnassensis had written for him, and Lyfander should have conned without booke, to have spoken in open Assembly) that was to stirre innovation, and in manner have made a change of the whole Government of the Commonwealth of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit there was a grave Counsellour that having read the Oration and doubting the apparent reasons and perswasions alleadged, told him, that he would wish him not to plucke up the dead againe out of his grave, but rather to bury this Oration together with his body. Agelilaus liked the counsell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had been his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make some of them to be sent as Lieutenant of Army, or otherwise to have charge in the warres. In fine, he made it openly knowne, what covetous and wicked men they had been in their charges: so that when they were accused of it before the councill, he would then helpe and intreat for them. By this meanes he made them againe his friends, where they had been his enemies: infomuch as in the end, he had not one enemy at all. For the other King Agessipolis his colleague, whose father had been banished, he being a very young man, and of a gentle nature, medled not greatly with government of the Common-wealth. Nevertheless, he so behaved himselfe unto Agelilaus that he made him his very good friend: for both the Kings when they were in the City, did eate together in one hall. Then Agelilaus knowing that Agessipolis (as himselfe) was given to love, would ever minister talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the City, enticing him to love some one of them, which he himselfe did love: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in these LACONIAN loves there was no manner of dishonesty offered, but a true affection and honest regard to frame the boy helowed unto vertue and honest conditions: as we have more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus, Agelilaus by this meanes, having the whole authority (above all men in the City) in his hands, made his halfe brother Telenias Generall by sea, and himselfe with the Army by land went to besiege the City of CORINTH, where with his brothers helpe by sea he took the long walls of the same. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTH at that time, at Agelilaus arrivall there, were solemnizing the feast of the Isthmian games: who made them flie, even as they came from sacrificing unto the god Neptune, driving them to leave all their preparation and solemnity. Then divers banished men of CORINTH that were in his Army, besought him that he would keep these Isthmian games: but he denied them, yet was contented they should themselves solemnize them; and so himselfe remained there, during the time of the feast, for their safety. Afterwards when Agelilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Isthmian games, and there were some of them which having wonne the game at the first, did also winne it at the second time: and others that were victorious before, were this second time overcome. Whereupon Agelilaus said, that the ARGIVES shewed themselves ranke cowards, that esteeming so much (as they did) these playes and sacrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For himselfe, touching such like sportes and games, he ever thought it good to keep a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour such solemne assemblies and common feasts with his presence, as were commonly used in SPARTA, and tooke great pleasure to see the sports between the young Boyes and Girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Calpides an excellent Stage Player (wonderfully esteemed of among the GRECIANS for a singular man in that Art) meeting Agelilaus on a time, at the first did his duty to him, and then arrogantly thrust himselfe among them that walked with him, thinking the King

King would have made much of him : but perceiving he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him : O King Agesilavus, do you not know me ? Agesilavus looking upon him, answered : What, art not thou Callipides the Stage-Player ? and so made no further account of him. Another time being desired to hear a man that naturally counterfeited the Nightingales voice, he would not hear him, saying, I have often times heard the Nightingale it selfe. Another time also when Menecrates the Physician (having by good fortune cured a desperate disease) called himselfe Jupiter, and arrogantly usurped that name, presuming in a letter he wrote unto Agesilavus, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Jupiter, unto King Agesilavus, greeting : Agesilavus wrote againe unto him, Agesilavus unto Menecrates * health. So, whilst Agesilavus was in the territory of CORINTH (where he had taken the Temple of Juno) beholding his souldiers forraging and spoiling the Countrey round about, Ambassadors came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwayes hated the THEBANS, and besides that thought it then very requisite for the good successe of his doings, to make light of it, seemed as he neither heard nor saw them that spake unto him. But even at that very instant, as by divine revenge to cry quittance, there fell a great mishap upon him : for before the Ambassadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bands called the Mothers, were slaine every man by Iphicrates : which was the greatest losse that they in a long time before had sustained. For they lost a great number of valiant souldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS : who being well armed every man, were slaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Agesilavus went straight into the field with hope to save them, or at the least to be revenged : but receiving certaine intelligence by the way that they were all slaine, he returned againe to the Temple of Juno from whence he came, and then sent for the Ambassadors of the BOEOTIANS, to give them audience. But they, to requite his former disdain unto them, made no manner of speech of peace, but only requested him to suffer them to enter into CORINTH. Agesilavus being offended, answered them : If it be to see your friends triumph of their victory, yemay safely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambassadors with him, he destroyed the CORINTHIANS Countrey, even to the walls of their City. And when he had made the Ambassadors see, that the Citizens of CORINTH durst not come out into the field to defend their Countrey, he gave them leave to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was overthrowne, which by flight had escaped, he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwayes removing his Campe before day, and never encamped till darke night, because the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) should not rejoyce at their losse. After this voyage, to gratifie the ACHAIANS, he entred with them into the Countrey of ACARNANIA, and brought great spoiles from thence, after he had overcome them in battell. Moreover, when the ACHAIANS besought him to remaine with them all the Winter, to keep his enemies from sowing of their ground, he made them answer, he would not. For, said he, they will be afraid of warre the next year, when all their fields shall be sown with Corn : and so indeed it came to passe. For the Army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the King of PERSIAES Army, being Lords of the Sea, without let of any destroyed and spoiled all the coast of LACONIA. Moreover, the City of ATHENS did reare up her walls againe by the helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the King of PERSIA, and to that end sent Antalcidas Ambassador unto Tiribazus, most shamefully and cruelly betraying to the King, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whose liberty Agesilavus had made warres with him before. So, it was Agesilavus hap not to be foiled with any part of this shame : for Antalcidas that was his enemy, sought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he saw warre did daily increase the authority, honour, and fame of Agesilavus. Notwithstanding, he answered one of them, that reproved him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did favour the MEDS : No, said he, they do not so, but the MEDS do play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nevertheless, threatening warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace, he compelled them to yeeld unto that the King of PERSIA liked. But surely he did this chiefly for respect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to set the Countrey of BOEOTIA at liberty again, should be so much the weaker. This plainly appeared soone after by that that followed. For Phabidas having committed a foule act, in open peace to take the Castle of the City of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themselves also not being very well pleased withall, and those specially which were Agesilavus enemies) Phabidas being asked in great anger, at whose commandement he had done that sudden enterprise, to lay all the suspicion of the fact upon him, Agesilavus for Phabidas discharge, letted not openly to say, that the quality of the fact was to be considered of, whether it were profitable for the Commonwealth, or not : and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his Countrey, to do it of his owne head without commandment. All this notwithstanding he was wont to say in private talke, that justice was the chiefeft of all vertues, and therefore that valiantnesse without justice was of no validity, and that if all men were just, valiantnesse were of no estimation. And to them that told him, the great King will have it so : Why, said he, and wherein is he better then my selfe, if he be no juster ? Judging very wisely therein, that they should esteeme a King (whether he was of great or small power) by his justice, as by the beame of Princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the King of PERSIA having sent him a private letter desiring his friendship, Agesilavus refused it, saying : that common friendship was enough betwixt them, and that they should need none other, so long long as that was kept. But this notwithstanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his first good opinion. And gave place to his will and ambition, specially against the THEBANS, at that time when he did not only save Phabidas, but also procured the City of SPARTA to take the fault upon them which he had committed : and to justifie it, by keeping the Castle of Cadmea still and making Archias and Leontidas Governours of the City of THEBES, by whom Phabidas came by the Castle of Cadmea, and possessed it. Thereupon every man thought straight, that Phabidas was he that had put the matter in execution, but that Agesilavus gave the counsell to do it : as things falling out afterwards, did manifestly prove the supposition true. For, after that the THEBANS had driven the Garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the Castle of Cadmea, and restored their City againe to liberty, burthening them that they had traiterously slaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were Tyrants, though in name Governours) he made warre with them : and Cleombrotus, reigning then King with him after Agesipolis death, was sent before into BOEOTIA with an Army : Agesilavus was dispensed with by law for going any more to the wars, by reason of his age, for that he was forty yeares old from the first groweth of haire on his face, and therefore went not that journey : being ashamed that the THEBANS should now see him fight to revenge the Tyrants deaths, who had but a little before taken Armes for the banished men against the PHILASIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrary faction unto Agesilavus : and was then Governor in the City of THESPIES, a valiant and stout man of his hands, but ever fuller of vain hope, then of good judgement. He desiring fame, and supposing that Phabidas came to dignity and great estimation through his valiant enterprise at THEBES : perswaded himself that he should win much more honour, if of himselfe he took the haven of Piræa, suddenly stealing up on the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by sea. It was thought commonly that this was a practise devised by Pelopidas and Gelon, Governours of BOEOTIA, what had allured certaine men to faine themselves very devout and friendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. These men praising and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none so worthy as himselfe alone, to take in hand so noble an enterprise. Thus by their perswasions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vilencie was nothing inferior unto that treacherous winning of the Castle of Cadmea at THEBES : although it was attempted with lesse hardinesse and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plain of THRIASION, where he made account to have been at the walls of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him, seeing certaine fires from the Temples of the City of ELEUSTIN, were all afraid and amazed : yea he himselfe also fainted perceiving he was discovered, and so turned backe with shame and dishonour to the City of THESPIES, without any exploit done, saving only a little spoile taken. Thereupon accusers were straight sent from ATHENS unto SPARTA, who upon their arrivall found that they needed not accuse him, for that the Council and Governours of the City had already sent for him to come unto them, to condemne him of high treason. But he durst not return to SPARTA, fearing the fury of his Countreimen, thinking indeed that they would seem as though the wrong had beene done to them, because it should not be thought that they had caused it to be done. This Sphodrias had a Son called Cleonymus, a very faire Boy, with whom Archidamus (Agesilavus Son) was farre in love : who then was marvellous sorry to see this Boy he loved, in so great danger to lose his Father, and yet durst not be seene to helpe him, because Sphodrias was one of Agesilavus adversaries. Notwithstanding, Cleonymus making his moan to him with teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his Father Agesilavus (whom they feared above all men else) Archidamus followed his father three or four dayes together, and durst not breake the matter to him : in fine, the day of the next Session being at hand, when judgement should be given on Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had prayed him to be an humble suiter to him touching his Fathers fact. Agesilavus understanding that his Sonne loved Cleonymus, would not withdraw him from loving him, because the Boy even from his childhood gave alwayes good hope that one day he would sure make as honest a man as any other whosoever : neither made he any countenance to his Sonne, as though he would do any thing at his suite, but only answered him, for that, he would doe as became him in such a case. Whereupon Archidamus being bashfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would see him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias friends despaire of his life more then before, untill Erymoches, one of Agesilavus familiars talking with them, told them that for the fact it selfe, Agesilavus thought it a shamefull deed, and as much disliked it as might be : but for Sphodrias selfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and saw that the Common-wealth had neede of men of such service. This was Agesilavus common talke to please his Sonne, when any man came to speake to him of Sphodrias accusation. Infomuch that Cleonymus found straight how Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be : and then Sphodrias friends also tooke heart againe unto them, to sollicite his cause, and to be earnest suiters for him. Agesilavus among other had this speciall property, that he loved his children dearly : and a tale goeth of him, that he would play with them in his house when they were little ones, and ride upon a little cock-horse, or a reed, as on horsebacke : infomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the manner, playing among his children, he prayed him to say nothing, till he had little children himselfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his Judges. The ATHENIANS understanding it, sent to proclaime warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Agesilavus was much reproved, because that to please the fond affection of his Son, he had hindered justice, and brought his City to be accused among the GRECIANS for such grievous crimes. Agesilavus perceiving that King Cleombrotus his companion went

Agésilas subtle device to shew the weakness of the allies.

Agésilas fell suddenly sicke of a dangerous disease.

Epaminondas the Theban sent Ambassador unto Lacedæmonians.

The strife betwixt Agésilas and Epaminondas for the liberty of Boeotia went with no very good will to make warre with the THEBANS, he breaking the order set downe for leading of the Army, which was kept before, went to the warres himselfe in person, and so invading BOEOTIA, he both received and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas seeing him hurt one day, Now truly (said he) the THEBANS have paid you your deserved hire, for teaching them against their will to be souldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For indeed they the THEBANS became better souldiers and warriors than they were before, being daily trained and exercised in Armes through the continual invasions of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Also this was the reason, why the old Father Lycurgus his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make war too oft with one selfe people, because that by compulsion they should not be made expert souldiers. For this cause did the confederates of LACEDÆMON hate Agésilas, saying, that it was not for any known offence to the state, but for very spite and private malice of his owne, that he fought to undo the THEBANS in this manner: and that to follow his humor, they consumed themselves going yearly to the warres one while this way, another while that way, without any necessity at all, following a few LACEDÆMONIANS, themselves being alwayes the greater number. Then it was, that Agésilas desiring to make them see what number of men of warre they were, used this device. On a time he commanded all the allies to sit down together one with another by themselves, and the LACEDÆMONIANS also by themselves. Then he made a Herald proclaim that all Pot-makers should stand up on their feet. When they were up, he made them cry to the Braiers to rise also. After them in like manner, the Carpenters: then the Masons, and so consequently all occupations one after another. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamation, were all in manner on their feet. The LACEDÆMONIANS, not one of them rose: because all base mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupy. Then Agésilas laughing at them: Lo, my friends (said he) do you not see now that we bring more souldiers to the field then ye do? At his return from this journey of THEBES, passing by the City of MEGARA, as he went up into the Council-house within the Castle, there suddenly tooke him a great Crampe in his left leg, that swelled extremely, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but blood which had filled the veines: a Physician of SYRACUSA in SICILE being there, straight opened a veine under the Ankle of his foot, which made the paine to cease: notwithstanding there came such abundance of blood, that they could not stanch it, so that he swounded oft, and was in great danger of present death. In fine, a way was found to stop it, and they carried him to LACEDÆMON, where he lay sicke a long time, so that he was past going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time received great overthrowes both by sea and land, and among other, their greatest overthrow was at the battell of LEUCTRES, where the THEBANS overcame and slew them in plaine battell. Then the GRECIANS were all of one minde to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambassadors and Deputies from all the Cities of GREECE, and met at LACEDÆMON to that end. One of these Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philosopher, but as yet unskillfull in warres. He seeing how the other Ambassadors curried favour with Agésilas, onely he of the rest kept his gravity to speak freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GREECE in general, declaring to them all, how warres did onely increase the greatnesse and power of the City of SPARTA, and contrarily did minish and decay all other Cities and Townes of GREECE: and for this cause, that he did counsel them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all, to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Agésilas perceiving then that all the GRECIANS present at the assembly gave him good eare, and were glad to hear him speake thus boldly of peace, asked him openly, if he thought it meet and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set clear at liberty againe? Epaminondas presently and boldly againe asked him, if he thought it just and requisite to set all LACONIA clear againe at liberty? Agésilas being offended therewith, stood up on his feet, and commanded him to answer plainly whether they would set all BOEOTIA at liberty or not? Epaminondas replied unto him with the self same speech againe, and asked him whether they would set all LACONIA at liberty or not? That nettled Agésilas so, that (being also glad of such a cloake, for the old grudge he ever bare unto the THEBANS) he presently put the name of the THEBANS out of the Bill of those which should have been comprised within the league, and cryed open war upon them in the Market-place. For the rest he licensed the other Deputies and Ambassadors of the people of GREECE to depart, with this conclusion, that they should lovingly take order among themselves for the controversie betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together: and they that could not fall to such agreement, that then they should try it by wars, for it was a hard thing to take up all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chance was at that time in the Country of PHOCIDE with his Army, unto whom the Ephori wrote, that he should forthwith spoile the THEBANS Country: and therewith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fancy to the journey, and were loth to make war with them, but yet durst not refuse to go, nor disobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many signes prefiging ill lucke, as we have written in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this war all that he could, Agésilas would needs forward, hoping he had now found opportunity to be revenged of the THEBANS, sith all GREECE besides was in peace and at liberty, themselves onely exempted from Treaty of peace. If there had been no other thing in it but the very shortness of time, that made it manifest enough that this war was begun in a jeere, without any manner of reason. For the general peace amongst the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, & the LACEDÆMONIANS were overcome at the battell of LEUCTRES the fifth fifth of June: so as there was but twenty dayes between them. There were slaine a thousand LACEDÆMONIANS with their King Cleombrotus, and the choicest and the valiantest SPARTANS about him. Among them was also slaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias Son, of whom we spake before: who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings foote, three times got up againe, but at the length was slaine, valiantly fighting against the THEBANS. This great overthrow changing to the LACEDÆMONS unlooked for, and withall so glorious a victory unto the THEBANS, as GRECIANS fighting with GRECIANS had never the like: the vanquished City of SPARTA notwithstanding deserved no lesse honour and commendation for her fortitude and worthinesse, then did the victorious City of THEBES. For as Xenophon writeth, that as among good men even in table talke, and in their sports and mirth, there falleth out ever some thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: even so in like case, no lesse but rather more, ought Noblemens words to be weighed, and their countenances marked, as well in adversitie as in prosperity. At that time by chance there was a common feast day in the City of SPARTA, which was full of strangers that came to see the dances and sports of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arrived that brought the newes of the battell lost at LEUCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumour straight ran all about, that they were all undone, and how they lost the signiory and commandment over all GREECE, would not suffer them for all this to breake off their dance in the Theater, nor the City in any thing to change the forme of their feast, but sent unto the parents (to every mans house) to let them understand the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they themselves remaining still in the Theater to see the dances and sports continued, to judge who carried the best Game away. The next morning when every man knew the number of them that were slaine, and of those also that were escaped, the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the Market-place, looking chearefully on the matter, and one of them embraced another. On the other side, the parents of them that escaped, kept their houses with their Wives, as folke that mourned. If any of them had occasion to go abroad out of their houses for any matter of necessity, ye would see him look so heavily and sad, that he durst not talke with you, lift up his head, nor look you in the face. Besides all this, even amongst the women there was greater difference: for the mothers of them that were to return from the battell, were sad and sorrowfull, and spake not a word: contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went friendly to visite one another, to rejoyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates began to forsake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victory, would invade PELOPONNESUS, then they began to be pricked in conscience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their City for that they had thrust out of the Kingdome a man perfect of limbes, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the gods to beware of that above all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valiantnesse, and his authority was such thereby, that they did not onely use him in warre as their King and soveraigne Captaine, but in civil causes also wherein there rose any question, they ever used his counsel and advice: as they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Trefantas (being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houses, and of greatest power within the City) lest they should move some stir or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no Office in the Common-wealth: it is shame and reproach to give them any wives, and also to marry any of theirs: whosoever meeteth them, may lawfully strike them, and they must abide it, and not give them a word againe: they are compelled to wear the poore tottered cloth Gownes, patched with cloth of divers colours; and worst of all, to shave one side of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamy they deserved, specially then standing in need of a great number of men of warre, they referred themselves altogether unto Agésilas, to take such order in it as he thought good: but Agésilas then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, said in open assembly at LACEDÆMON, that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policy he kept the law inviolate, and saved also the honour of those poore men: and withall, to put these youths againe in heart, being amazed with this fear, he led the Army into the Country of ARCADIA, and would give no battell, but onely tooke a small City of the MANTINEANS, and foraged the Country. This againe did a little revive the City of SPARTA with some hope, to make that it should not utterly despaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas invaded the Country of LACONIA with forty thousand footmen well armed, besides an infinite number of other light armed, and naked people, that followed his Campe for the spoile: so that in all, there were about threescore and ten thousand fighting men that came in with him to invade LACONIA. It was well neare six hundred years sith the DORIANS possessed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time till then they never saw enemies in their Country that durst invade them: but then they fackled and burnt all that came in their way. even unto the River of Eurotas, and hard adjoining unto SPARTA, and no man durst come out to resist them. For Agésilas (as Theopompus writeth) would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to go out to fight against such a tempest and fury of warre; but having fortified the middlest of the City, and guarded every end of the streets with souldiers, he patiently bare all the braggies and threats of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bade him come in the field to defend his Country, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, having himself procured this warre. If this went to Agésilas heart, no lesse grievous were those troubles to him that rose within the City: as the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to see that they did before their eyes: and of silly women also, which no ground nor place, could hold, but ranne up and downe as fraught of their wits, to hear the noise the enemies made and to see the fire which they raised all the fields over. Much more sorrowfull also did this make him, when as he bethought himselfe, that entering into his Kingdom at such time as the City of SPARTA was in greatest prosperity that ever it was, he now saw his honour eclipsed, and the glory of his Kingdome overthrowne: and the rather, for that himself had often vaunted, that LACONIAN women had never seen the smoake of any enemies Campe. And as they say of Antalcidas one day, that he answered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantnesse of one anothers Nation, alleading for himselfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driven the LACEDÆMONIANS from the River of Cephissus: It is true, said the LACONIANS; but we did never drive you from the River Eurotas. The like answer made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that cast him in the teeth. There are divers of your LACONIANS buried in the Countrey of ARGOLIDE. So are there none of yours, said he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did secretly send his children into the Isle of CITHERA, fearing lest the City of SPARTA should be taken, Agesilaus perceiving that the enemies forced to passe over the River to enter the City, he stood to defend the middle part of the City, being the highest place of the same, and there had his men set in order of battell. Now at that time, by chance the River of Eurotas was swelled greater then of ordinary, by reason of the Snow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldnesse, then roughnesse of the same in passing it over. Some shewing Agesilaus how Epaminondas marched formost before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was never off him, saying never a word but this only: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminondas having done all that he could possible to give the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, even within the City selfe of SPARTA, that he might there have set up some tokens of triumph, he could never entice Agesilaus to come out of his Fort: wherefore he was driven in the end to depart thence, and so went to destroy all the rest of the Countrey. There fell out a conspiracy of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and took that quarter of the City where the Temple of Diana stood called Ifforim, a place of strong situation, and ill to disresse. Hereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS in fury would straight have set upon them. But Agesilaus fearing great mutiny and stirre upon it, commanded that no man should stirre: and himself unarmed, in a poore Gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that strength: Sirs, ye have not obeyed my commandement, this is not the place I appointed you to assemble in, neither all of you in one place; for I willed you to disperse your selves, some one way, some another way, shewing them the quarters of the City. The traitors hearing these words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not betrayed: and so leaving that strength, went into those parts of the City that he had shewed them. Agesilaus then bringing others thither, possessed the Fort of Ifforim, and took fiftene of those conspirators, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out another conspiracy farre greater then the first, of the SPARTANS themselves, which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sudden stirre and garboile; and to punish them in so great a trouble, it was hard: on the other side to neglect it, the conspiracy was over dangerous. Agesilaus having consulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any judgement of law: where never SPARTAN before them suffered death, without due order of law. Again, whereas divers of their neighbors, and of the ILLOTS themselves (whom they had billed in their hands of fouldiers) stole away and ranne to their enemies, which did much discourage them that remained: he warned his men that they should every day go to their Couches where they lay, and that they should take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, because they should not know the number of them that were fled in this fort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, some say that they went out of LACONIA by reason of the Winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADIANS discharged their Bands, and every one departed his way in disorder. Others also hold opinion, that they continued there three monethes together, during which time they destroyed the most part of the Countrey. Theopompus writeth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS having determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN unto them, sent from Agesilaus, who brought them ten talents that they should depart out of their Countrey. Thus had they money given them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselves had long before determined to have done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other Historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All do acknowledge truly, that Agesilaus onely was the cause that the City of SPARTA was saved: who leaving his ambition and selfe-will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safety. Nevertheless, after this great overthrow, he could never raise SPARTA againe to her former greatnesse. For like a whole body, which having acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: even so Lycurgus having framed a perfect state of Government in the Commonwealth of SPARTA, to make her Citizens live in peace and amity together; when they did enlarge it by great Kingdomes and Realmes, the which the good Law-maker thought unmeet to continue happy life, they were straight overthrowne, and all went to wracke. By this time Agesilaus was grown old, and could no more go to warres for very age: but his Sonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACUSA sent unto them, wan a battell against the ARCADIANS, called called the tearlesse Battell; for there died not one of his men; and they slew a great number of their Enemies. This Victory plainly shewed the great weaknesse and decay of the City of SPARTA. For in former times it was so common a thing unto them to overcome their Enemies in Battell, that they did sacrifice nothing else to the gods in token of thanks, within the City, but a poore Cocke and they that had fought the Battell, made no boast of it, neither did they that heard the newes, greatly rejoyce at it. For when they had wonne that great Battell at the City of MANTINEA, which Thucydides describeth, the Ephori onely sent the Messenger that brought the newes, for reward, a piece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then when newes was brought of this Victory, and that they understood Archidamus came home victorious, neither man nor woman could keepe the City, but the father himselfe went first of all to meete him, with the teares in his eyes for joy, and after him all the other Magistrates and Officers of the City; and a swarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the Rivers side, holding up their hands to Heaven, and thanking the gods, as if their City had redeemed and recovered her shame and lost honour, and began now to rise againe, as before it did. For until that time, some say, that the Husbands durst not boldly looke their Wives in the faces, they were so ashamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the City of MESSINIA being by Epaminondas reedified and replenished with People, he called home againe out of all parts, the natural Inhabitants of the same. The SPARTANS durst not fight with him (nor to hinder his purpose) though it spighted them to the hearts, and were angry with Agesilaus, for that in his reigne they had lost all that Territory, which was as great as all LACONIA selfe, and for goodnesse and fertility to be compared with the best parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilaus would not agree to the Peace which the THEBANS sent to offer him: and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the Enemies kept in deeds. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not onely without recovering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the City of SPARTA by a war-like Stratagem, in the which he was deceived. For the MANTINEANS being newly revolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and having sent for the LACEDÆMONIANS, Epaminondas receiving intelligence that Agesilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his Power to aide the MANTINEANS, marched away secretly by night from TEGGA, without the privy of the MANTINEANS, and went straight to SPARTA; the which he had almost surprized on the sudden, going another way then Agesilaus came (being in manner without men to defend it. Howbeit a THESIAN called Euthymus, as Calisthenes saith (or as Xenophon writeth, a CRETAN) brought Agesilaus newes of it; who dispatched a Horse-man straight to advertise them of the City of SPARTA, and marching forward himselfe to returne, stayed not long after before he arrived. He was no sooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who passing over the River of Eurotas, gave assault to the City. Then Agesilaus perceiving that there was no more place nor time of security as before, but rather of desperation and courage, he valiantly defended it, more then an old mans yeares could beare. Thus, through courage and desperate minde, whereto he was never brought before, neither did ever use it; he put by the danger, and saved the City of SPARTA from Epaminondas hands, setting up marks of Triumph for repelling of the Enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to see the LACEDÆMONIANS how honourably they rewarded their Nurse and Countrey for their good education, but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into every part of the City, with a few about him, to repulse the Enemies wheresoever the danger was greatest. It is said also, that at that time there was one Isadas the Sonne of Phabidas, that did marvellous strange things to behold, both in the face of his Enemies, as also in the sight of his Friends. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being starke naked, and unarmed, his bodyointed with oyle, having in one hand a Bore-staffe, and in the other a Sword, in this manner he went out of his house, and ranne amongst them that fought, killing and overthrowing his Enemies that withstood him, and was not once hurt, either for that the gods preserved him for his manhoods sake, or else because men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediately gave him a Crowne, in honour and reward of his valiantnesse: but withall they set a Fine on his head to pay a thousand Silver Drachmas for his rash attempt, to hazard himselfe in Battell, unarmed for defence. Shordy after they fought another great Battell before the City of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas having overthrowne the first Ranks of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and courageously disressing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiving him (as Diodorides writeth) slew him with his Bore-speare. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithstanding, do call the off spring of this Anticrates, Machariones, as much to say, as Sword-men, as though he had slaine him with a Sword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did esteeme this Anticrates so much, for that deadly stroke he gave (because they were afraid of Epaminondas while he lived) that they gave him that slew him, great Honours and Dignities, and discharged all his off-spring and kinned from payment of Subsidy and common Contributions, which priviledge one Callicrates, a Kinman of this Anticrates, enjoyed even in our time. After this Battell, and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS having taken peace generally amongst them, Agesilaus would needs exclude the MESSINIANS from being sworne to this Peace, saying: That they need not sweare, because they had no City. Now, forasmuch as all the GRECIANS else did receive them as amongst the number, and tooke their oath unto this Peace, the LACEDÆMONIANS brake off from this generall Peace, and none but they onely made Warre, in hope to recover the MESS-ENIANS Country; and all through the allurements of Agefilaw, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS a cruell and unsatiable man for Warres, to deale so craftily, and all to breake this generall League. Againe, he brought himselfe in discredit with all men, being compelled to make his City bare of Money, borrowing of them still, and raising sundry Contributions amongst them: whereas indeed it had been his best way to have ended all these miseries, having so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to have lost so great an Empire of so many Townes and Cities both by Sea and Land, and all to plague his Country, to winne the Land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame unto him of all other, when he gave himselfe unto one Tachos, a Captaine of the EGYPTIANS, every man thinking it a shamefull part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefeest man of all the GRECIANS, and the which had filled the World with report of his fame and glory) should for Money let out his person to hire, and the glory of his name, unto a barbarous person, a traytor and rebell to his King and Master, to become a mercenary Captaine and Souldier to do him Service. And moreover, he being now fourscore yeares of age and upwards, his body all mangled with wounds, though he had undertaken this honourable charge for the recovery of the liberty of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserved some blame: for noble acts have their time, yea rather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocrity. But Agefilaw had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in service, specially for benefit of the Common-wealth, but perswaded himselfe that it was a dishonour to him to live idle in a City and do nothing, till death should come and make his summons: thereupon therefore he leaved men of Warre through all GREECE with the Money Tachos sent unto him, and with them tooke Sea, having thirty SPARTANS Councillors and assistants to him, as he had in his first Journey. Now A-gefilaw being arrived in EGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and Governours of King Tachos came to the Sea shore, and honourably received him: and not they onely, but infinite numbers of EGYPT-IANS of all sorts (that were marvellous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agefilaw) came thither from all parts to see what manner of man he was. But when they saw no stately Traine about him, but an old gray-beard layed on the grasse by the Sea side, a little man that looked simply of the matter, and but meanly apparelled in an ill-favoured thread-bare Gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembering the merry tale, that a mountaine should bring forth, and was delivered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him Presents to welcome him, that he tooke Meale, Calves, and Geese, and such grosse things: and refused all Confections, Perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to give them to the ILOTS his Slaves. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted marvellously in the Rush Papyrus, and liked the Garlands they made of them, for their fitnessse and the handfomnesse, the which he carried home with him when he departed thence. Having spoken at that time with Tachos, who was assembling his Army to go on his Journey, he was not made Captaine-generall, as he looked he should have bene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the strangers, Chabrias Generall of all the Army by Sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos himselfe in person. This at the first grieved Agefilaw to the heart, being driven whether he would or not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this EGYPTIAN. So he failed with them into PHENICIA, against the PHENICI-ANS, imbalming himselfe against his noble disposition and minde, and gave him place, untill he saw time of revenge. It chanced that one Neftanebos a Nephew of this Tachos, having the leading of part of this Army, rebelled against him, and being chosen King by the EGYPTIANS, he sent unto Agefilaw, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also unto Chabrias, and prayed him to joyne with him, promising great rewards unto them both. Tachos understanding that, besought them both that they would not forsake him. Chabrias for his part also did likewise intreat Agefilaw, and perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agefilaw answered him: For thee, Chabrias, thou comest of thine owne good will, and therefore mayest doe what thou thinkest good, but so is it not with me: for I am sent hither a Captaine by my Country, to serve the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honesty for me to make Warre with him, whom I am sent to serve and aide: were it not that they themselves which sent me, do now command me the contrary. This answer being made, he sent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuse Tachos, and to commend Neftanebos. Both they also for their parts sent to intreat the Councill of LAC-EDÆMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promising to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACEDÆMONIANS having heard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agefilaw should consider of this matter: and wrote secretly to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the Common-wealth of SPARTA. So Agefilaw taking with him the mercenary Souldiers which he had brought out of GREECE, went unto Neftanebos, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefit of his Country, to bewray a wicked thing: but indeed taking away the Vizard to benefit his Country, they might by a better name rightly have termed it Treason. Howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS placing the chiefeest point of honour, to consist in the benefit of their Country, did acknowledge nothing to be justice, but that which they thought might serve for the advancement of the glory of SPARTA. Tachos seeing himselfe forsaken thus by his mercenary strangers, fled. But now on the other side, there arose another King in the City of MENDES against this Neftanebos, who having leaved to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Neftanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agefilaw, told him, that indeede they were a great number of men of all sorts together, and specially men of handy-craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, because they knew not what Warre meant. But Agefilaw answered him againe: It is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and unskilfulnesse, which is hardelt of all to deceive. For war-like stratagems do most prevail against men that have greatest feare and experience: and therefore they foresee one thing rather then another. But men of no judgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor have forecast, and therefore do give him no more advantage that seeketh to deceive them, then the Wrestler by sleight is able to overthrow him whom he cannot stir nor remove. Afterwards the MENDES-IAN King himselfe sent unto Agefilaw, to winne him if he could. Neftanebos then began to be afraid. For when Agefilaw counsellled him to try it by Battell as soone as he could, and not to prolong this Warre against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their over-multitude might intrench him round about, and prevent him in divers things: then he began to feare and suspect him more, and thereupon retired into a great City, well walled about, and of great strength. Agefilaw being offended that he mistrusted him thus, tooke it inwardly: but being ashamed to turne againe unto the third, and also to depart without any Exploit done, he followed him, and inclosed himselfe within those Walls. The Enemies pursuing him hard, came unto the City, and began to intrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN Neftanebos fearing a long Siege, determined to give them Battell. Thereto the hired GRECIANS gave consent, as desiring no better match, and the rather also for that there was but small store of Corne within the City. But Agefilaw perswading the contrary, would in no wise consent to it: whereupon the EGYPTIANS thought worse of him then before, and plainly called him Traytor to their King. Howbeit he did patiently beare all these accusations, expecting time to performe an Exploit he intended, which was this: The Enemies had cast a deepe Trench without to compasse them in. When this Trench drew neare to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commanded the GRE-CIANS to arme and to put themselves in readinesse: then he came unto the EGYPTIAN, and said unto him: Lo here is an excellent occasion presented to save thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I saw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing lest otherwise we should have lost it. Now sith the Enemies themselves have with their owne hands given us the way to save our selves by this Trench they have cast, the which as much as is finished thereof doth hinder their great multitude to helpe themselves, and that which is yet left unfinished, doth give us opportunity to fight with them of even hand: determine to shew thy valour, and following us, save thy selfe and thy People. For the Enemies which we shall assaile before us, shall never be able to abide us: and the other by means of the Trench which defendeth us on every side, can no way hurt us. Neftanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great widdome, and so thrusting in among the GRECIANS, did assaile the Enemies: the which were soone overthrowne and put to flight, as many as durst resist and make head against them. Agefilaw having wonne Neftanebos againe to trust him, he once againe deceived his Enemies with the like subtilty wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knew not how to avoid. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: suddenly againe he would turne this way and that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a straight sluice, walled about on either side, with great broad ditches full of running water: so that when they were even in the midst of it, he suddenly stopped their passage with the front of his Battell, which he cast to the breadth of the sluice, and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his Enemies, which could never compasse him in behinde, nor flanke him on the sides. They having in this sort made some small resistance, in the end turned their backs and fled, and left a great number slaine in the Field: the residue after that last Overthrow forsooke their Captains, and fled stragling here and there. Thus the Affaires of the EGYPTIAN King after that time had good successe, and he was quietly stablished in his Kingdome, making much of Agefilaw: and doing him all honour possible, prayed him to tarry with him all that Winter. Howbeit he would needes hasten home to his Country, which was in Warre with others, knowing that his City of SPARTA was without Money, because they were driven to give Pay to Strangers. Thereupon Neftanebos in the end tooke his leave of him very honourably, presenting him a Gift (besides all other honours he did him) of two hundred and thirty Silver Talents in ready Money, to defray the charges of the Warre in his Country. Howbeit the Sea being rough in the Winter-quarter, he died by the way, having notwithstanding recovered Land with his Ships in a desert place of the Coast of LYBIA, which was called the Haven of Menelaus, after he was fourescore and foure yeares old: of the which he had reigned one and forty yeares King of SPARTA, and thirty yeares thereof and more he was alwaies taken and reputed for the greatest person, and in manner Chiefeistaine-generall of all GREECE, untill the Battell of LEUCTRES. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS having a custome to bury the dead bodies of their Citizens that died out of their Country, in the same place where they departed (the bodies of their Kings excepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Agefilaw, anointed his body with waxe for lacke of honty, and carried him home to SPARTA in this manner. His Sonne Archidamus succeeded him in the Kingdome, whose Issue successively reigned after him, unto the time of Agis (who was the fifth King in succession after Agefilaw) whom indeed Leonidas put to death, because he sought to restore the LACEDÆMONIANS ancient discipline and forme of life.

HE ROMANES seemed to have loved Pompey from his childhood, with the selfe-affection that Prometheus in the Tragedie of Aeschylus appeareth to have borne unto Hercules, after that he was delivered by him: when he said:

So great a hate I have not to the Father, But that I love the Sonne of him much rather.

For the ROMANES never shewed more bitter hate against any other Capitaine, then they did unto Strabo Pompey's Father. Truly so long as he lived, they feared his greatnesse obtained by Armes, for indeed he was a noble Capitaine: but being stricken with a Thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the Beire whereon his body lay as they carried him to buriall, and did thereto great villany. Contrariwise, never any other ROMANES (but Pompey) had the Peoples earnest good wills so soone, nor that in prosperity and adversity continued longer constant, then unto Pompey. One onely cause procured the Fathers hate, and that was, an unsatiable and greedy desire of Money. But Pompey his Sonne, was for many occasions beloved: as for temperance of life, aptnesse to Armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulness of word, and courtesie in conversation: so that there was never man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gave without disdain, and tooke with great honour. Furthermore, being but a child, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wanne mens good wills before he spake: for his countenance was sweet, mixed with gravity, and being come to mans state, there appeared in his gesture and behaviour a grave and Princely Majesty. His haire also stood a little upright, and the cast and soft moving of his eyes, had a certaine resemblance (as they said) of the Statues and Images of King Alexander. And because every man gave him that name, he did not refuse it himselfe: inso much as there were some which sporting-wife did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucius Philippus a Confull, was not ashamed to say openly in an Oration he made in Pompey's favour, that it was no marvell if he being Philip did love Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the Curtizan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiarity which she had with Pompey being a young man: telling that after she had lien with him, she could not possibly rise from him, but she must needs give him some sweet quip or pleasant taunt. She would tell also how one of Pompey's familiars and companions called Geminus, fell in love with her, and was a marvellous earnest Suiter to obtaine her good will: and that she answered him flatly, she would not, for the love she bare to Pompey. Geminus thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himselfe. Pompey desirous to pleasure him, granted the request: howbeit Geminus after that, would not come neare Flora, nor speake unto her, albeit albeit it appeared that he yet loved her. But Flora tooke this not Curtizan-like, for she was sicke a long time for very griefe of minde, and she thought she tooke upon it. All this notwithstanding, it is said that this Flora had then such fame for her passing grace and beauty, that Cecilius Metellus setting forth and beautifying the Temple of Castor and Pollux, with goodly Tables and Pictures, among the rest, he caused her Picture to be lively drawne for her excellent beauty. Furthermore, Pompey against his nature, dealt very hardly and uncourteously with the Wife of Demetrius, his franchized Bondman (who while he lived was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thousand Talents) fearing to be taken with her beauty, which was very singularly faire, left he should be thought in love with her. Now though herein he seemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the worst, yet could he not thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his Wives, he would let passe and winke at many things that were against the profit of the Common-wealth. To prove his sober and temperate diet, and how he was contented with common Meats, a word (they say) he spake when he was very sicke, and could taste no meate, is specially noted. For to bring his stomach to him againe, his Physician willed him to eate a Thrush. So seeking all about to get him one, there was no Thrush to be bought for Money, for they were out of season. Norwithstanding, one told him that he should not misse of them at Lucullus Houise, for he kept them up all the yeare through. Why, what then, said he, if Lucullus riot were not, should not Pompey live? Therewithall, letting his Physicians counsell alone, he made them dresse such meate as was every where common. But of that we will speake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the Field with his Father that was in Armes against Cinna, there lay with him in his Tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius; who being bribed with Money, had promised Cinna to kill him, and other Confederates also had promised to set their Capitaines Tent on fire. This Conspiracy was revealed unto Pompey as he sate at supper, which nothing amazed him at all, but he dranke freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time, he stole out of his owne Tent, and went unto his Father to provide for his safety. Terentius thinking the houre come to attempt his Enterprize, rose with his Sword in his hand, and went to Pompey's Bed where he was wont to lie, and gave many a thrust into the Mattresse. After he had done that, all the Campe was straight in an uprore for the malice they bare unto their Capitaine, and the Souldiers in all haste would needes have gone and yeilded to their Enemy, beginning already to overthrow their Tents, and to trusse away bagge and baggage. The Capitaine for feare of this tumult, durst not come out of his Tent: notwithstanding Pompey his Sonne ranne amongst the mutinous Souldiers, and humbly besought them with teares in his eyes, not to doe their Capitaine this villany; and in fine threw himselfe flatly to the ground overthwart the gate of the Campe, bidding them march over him, if they had such a desire to be gone. The Souldiers being ashamed of their folly, returned againe to their lodging, and changing minde, reconciled themselves with their Capitaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediately after that Strabo, Pompey's Father, was departed out of the World, Pompey being his Heire, was accused for the Father, to rob the common Treasure. Howbeit he confessed and avowed, that it was Alexander one of his Fathers infranchized Bondmen that had stolen the most part of it, and brought him in before the Judges. Norwithstanding, he was accused himselfe, for taking away the royles and arming cords of Hunters nets, and Bookes that were taken in a sculum. He confessed the having of them, and that his Father gave him them when the City was taken: howbeit that he had lost them since, when Cinna returned unto Rome with his Souldiers, who breaking into his Houise by force, spoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitive sentence, in which time Pompey shewed himselfe of good spirit and understanding, more then was looked for in one of his yeares: inso much as he wanne such fame and favour by it, that Antistius being Prætor at that time, and Judge of his matter, fell into such a liking with him, that secretly he offered him his Daughter in marriage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, and the parties were secretly assured. This was not so closely conveyed, but the People perceived it, by the care and paines Antistius tooke to favour his matter. Inso much, when the Judges gave judgement, and cleared him, all the People together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voyce, Talassio, Talassio, being the usuall and common cry they used of old time at Mariages in Rome. This custome by report of ancient folke came up in this manner. At what time the chiefe Peeres and Lords of Rome did ravish the Souldiers Daughters, which came to Rome to see common Sports played, there chanced a few rascals (as Hog-heards or Neat-heards) to carry away a goodly faire woman. They fearing she should be taken from them, cried out in the streets as they went, Talassio, as if they would have said, she is for Talassio. This Talassio was a young Gentleman well knowne, and beloved of most men: so that such as heard him but named onely, did clappe their hands for joy, and cried out with them, Talassio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custome, that ever since they have cried this word Talassio unto them that are newly married, because the marriage of that faire young Maide proved fortunate, and happy unto Talassio. And this methinks foundeth nearest to the truth of that they report of this Wedding-cry of Talassio. Shortly after this judgement given, Pompey married Antistia. After that, going unto Cinna's Campe, they wrongfully accused him of somewhat, whereupon he being afraid, secretly stole away. Now when they could not finde him in Cinna's Campe, there ranne straight a rumour abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did set upon him for this occasion. But he thinking to save himselfe by flying, was straight overtaken by a private Capitaine that followed him with his Sword drawne in his hand. Cinna seeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and took his Seale from his finger wherewith he sealed his Letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tush, said the Capitaine, I come not to seale any Covenant, but to chastise a Villaine and cruell Tyrant: and therewithall thrust his Sword through him, and slew him presently. Cinna being slaine in this fort, Carbo succeeded him, and tooke the Government in hand, being a more cruell Tyrant then the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and desired of the most part of the ROMANES, for the grievous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought themselves happy to change Governour: for their City was brought into such misery, as hoping no more to see ROME recover her last liberty, they desired yet a more tolerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALY called PICENUM (now the Marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more great love and good will of the City for his Fathers sake. He seeing that the noblest men of ROME forsooke their Houses and Goods, to flee from all parts unto Sylla's Campe, as unto a place of safety, would not go to him as a fugitive and cast-away to save himselfe, without bringing him some Power to increase his Army, but would honourably go thither with an Army, as he that meant first to do himselfe pleasure. So he left the good will of the PICENTINES, who willingly tooke his part, and rejected them that were sent by Carbo. Among them there was one Tindius, that stepping forth, said that Pompey which came from the Schoole the last day, must now in haste be a Capitaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time Pompey being but three and twenty yeares old, tarrying to receive no authority from any man, took it upon him of himselfe; and causing a Tribunal to be set up in the middle of the Market-place of AUXIMUM, a great populous City, he commanded the two Brethren called the VENTIDIANS (being the chieftest men of the City, and they that for Carbo's sake withstood his doings) without delay forthwith to avoid the City: and so began to leave men, and to appoint Capitaines, Serjeants, Centiniers, and such other Officers as appertaine to Martiall Discipline. Then he went to all the other Cities of the same Marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled every man, and all the rest willingly yielded unto him: whereby in short space he had gotten three whole Legions together, Munition to entertaine them, Carriages, and all manner of Beasts for carriage. In this sort he tooke his Journey towards Sylla, not in haste, as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by small Journeys, staying still where he might hurt his Enemy, causing the Cities every where as he came to revolt from Carbo. Nevertheless, three Capitaines of the contrary part; Carina, Celsus, and Brutus, all three did set upon Pompey together, not all in a front, nor of one side, but in three severall places they compassed him with their Armies, thinking to have made him sure at the first onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting forth his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, having placed his Horsemen (among the which he was himself in person) before the Battell of his Footmen. Now the men of Armes of the Enemy which were GAULES, coming to give Charge upon him, he ran one of the chieftest among them through with his Lance and slew him. The other GAULES seeing him slaine, turned their backs, and brake their owne Footmen: so that at length they all fled for life. Therewithall the Capitaines fell out among themselves, and some fled one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the Townes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare, came all in to Pompey, and yielded themselves. Afterwards Scipio the Consull coming against Pompey to fight with him, when both Battels were in manner ready to joyn, before they came to throwing of their Darts, Scipio's Souldiers saluted Pompey's men, and went on their side: so was Scipio driven to flee. And in fine, Carbo himselfe having sent after him divers Troopes of Horsemen by the River of Arfis, Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assaile them, that he drave them into such places as was almost impossible for Horsemen to come into. Whereupon they seeing no way to scape, yielded themselves Horse and Armour, all to his mercy. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these Overthrows: wherefore, as soone as he understood of it, fearing lest Pompey should miscarry, being environed with so many Capitaines of his Enemy, he made haste to march towards him for to aide him. Pompey understanding of his approach, commanded his Capitaines to arme their men, and put them in Battell ray, that their Generall might see them bravely appointed when he should present them unto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour; and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla saw him afar off coming towards him, and his Army marshalled in so good order of Battell, and such goodly men that so bravely advanced themselves, being courageous for the Victory they had obtained of their Enemies, he lighted on foote. When Pompey also came to do his duty to him, and called him Imperator (as much as Emperour, or Sovereigne Prince). Sylla resaluted him with the selfe name, beyond all mens expectation present, little thinking that he would have given so honourable a name unto so young a man as Pompey, who had not yet beene Senator: considering that he himselfe did contend for that Title and Dignity, with the Faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gave him every way, was answerable to his first kindeesse offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rise and put off his Cap to him: which he did not unto any other Noblemen about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in himselfe. Wherefore when Sylla would straight have sent him into GAULE, because Metellus that was there, was thought to have done no Exploit worthy of so great an Army as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Capitaine that was of greater fame and experience experience then himselfe: yet if Metellus of himselfe were contented, and would intreat him, that he would willingly go and helpe him to end this Warre. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAULE, did of himselfe wonderfull Exploits, and did so revive Metellus old courage and valiantesse to fight, which now began to faint, like boyling Copper that being poured upon the cold and hard Copper, doth melt and dissolve it, as fast or faster then fire it selfe. For like as of a Wrestler, who hath beene counted very strong, and the chieftest in all Games, having ever borne the prize away where he had wrestled, they never record among them his childish victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: even so I am afraid to speake of the wonderfull deedes that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great Warres and Battels which he had wonne afterwards. For I am afraid that whilst I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe over his chieftest Acts and most notable Enterprizes, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had overcome all ITALY, and was proclaimed Dictator, he did reward all his Lieutenants and Capitaines that had taken his part, and did advance them to honourable place and dignity in the Common-wealth, frankly granting them all that they requested him. But for Pompey, reverencing him for his valiantesse, and thinking that he would be a great stay to him in all his Wars, he sought by some meanes to alie him to him. Metella his Wife being of his opinion, they both persuaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to marry Emelia the Daughter of Metella, and of her first Husband, the which also was another mans Wife, and with childe by her Husband. These Marriages were cruell and tyrannicall, siter for Sylla's time, rather then agreeable to Pompey's nature and condition: to see Emelia, this new married Wife, taken from her lawfull Husband, to marry her great with childe; and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her Father, and for respect of her Husband that did put her away. For Antistius was murdered within the very Senate-house, being suspected to take part with Sylla for his Sonne-in-law Pompey's sake: and her Mother voluntarily put her selfe to death, seeing her Daughter received such open wrong. By these apparent causes, those unfortunate Marriages fell out into a miserable Tragedie, by meanes of the death of Emelia, who shortly after miserably died with childe in Pompey's House. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Island at his devotion, as a safe place to receive all Sylla's Enemies: that Carbo also kept the Sea thereabouts with a certaine number of Ships: that Domitius also was gone into AFRICK: and divers other Noblemen that were banished, that had escaped his Proscriptions and Outlawries, were all in those parts. Against them was Pompey sent with a great Army. Howbeit he no sooner arrived in SICILE, but Perenna left him the whole Island, and went his way. There he favourably dealt with all the Cities, which before had abidden great trouble and misery, and set them againe at liberty, the MAMERTINES only excepted, which dwelt in the City of MESSINA. They despising his Tribunal and Jurisdiction, alledged the ancient Order and Priviledge of the ROMANES, set downe in times past amongst them. But Pompey answered them in choler: What doe ye prattle to us of your Law, that have our Swords by our sides? It seemeth also that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his misery. For sith he must needs die, as there was no remedie but he should, when it had beene better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would have imputed it to his malice that so had commanded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had beene thrice Consull at ROME, to be openly examined, and he sitting in his Chaire of State or Tribunal, condemned him to die in presence of them all, in the great audience and murthering of every one that was present. So Pompey bade them take him away and carry him to execution. When Carbo came to the Scaffold where he should be executed, and seeing the Sword drawne that should cut off his head, he prayed the Executioners to give him a little respite and place to untrusse a point, for he had a paine in his belly. Caius Oppius also, one of Julius Caesar's friends, wrote that he dealt very cruelly in like manner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, said he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and saw like unto him: when he was brought unto him, he took him aside, and walked a few paces about in thorn when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commanded his Guard to carry him away, and to dispatch him. Howbeit we may not give too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, speaking of Julius Caesar's friends or foes. For Pompey indeed was compelled to make away the greatest personages of Sylla's Enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken; but for the rest, all those that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was contented to wince at, and would not understand it: and moreover did helpe some besides to save themselves. Now Pompey was determined to have taken sharp revenge of the City of the HIRMAEANS, which had lately taken the Romans part. But Sthenus one of the Governours of the City, craving audience of Pompey, told him he should doe them wrong and injustice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durst take upon him to say the offence of them all, Sthenus answered straight, that it was himselfe, that had persuaded his friends, and compelled his enemies, to doe that which they did. Pompey being pleased to heare the franke speech and boldnesse of this man, first forgave him the fault he had committed, and consequently all the other HIRMAEANS. Pompey understanding that his Souldiers did kill divers then in the high-ways, he sealed up all their Swords, and whole Seale forever was broken, he was well favouredly punished. Pompey being busied about these matters in SICILE, received Letters and Commission from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediately into AFRICK, to make Warre

Warre upon Domitius with all his power, who had leaved already more men of Warre then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICK into ITALY: and had there overthrowne all the ROMANES doings, being become of a fugitive out-law, a cruell Tyrant. Pompey thereupon having speedily put himselfe in readinesse to take the Sea, left Memmius his Sisters Husband Governor of SICILE: and so himselfe imbarqued, and hoised Saile with sixscore Gallies; and eight hundred other Ships or Bottomes, to transport their Victuals, Munition, Money, Engines of Batttery, and all other carriage whatsoever. After he was landed with all his Fleete, part at UTICA, and part at CARTHAGE, there straight came to him seven thousand Souldiers from the Enemies, and yeelded themselves, besides seven whole Legions that he brought with him. They say moreover, that at his arrivall, he had a present chance happened unto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his Souldiers stumbled on a Treasure by chance, and got thereby a great masse of Money. The residue of the Army hearing that, thought sure that the Field where this Treasure was found, was full of Gold and Silver, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamity. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, could have no rule of his Souldiers; neither could he choose but laugh to see so many thousand men digging the ground, and turning up the Field: untill in the end they wearied themselves, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey, with his Army set in Battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quagmire before him, that ranne with a swift running streame, very ill to get over: besides that, from the very breake of day it had poured downe and rained so fast, and was so great a winde withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they should not fight, commanded his People to trusse away, and remove. Pompey on the other side, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, suddenly made his men to march, and passed over the Valley. The Enemies perceiving that, being altogether out of order, were marvellously amazed, and in that hurly burly would have made resistance. But they were neither all together, nor yet evenly set in Battell ray, and had besides the winde beating the raine full in their faces. So did the storme much hurt unto the ROMANES also, for they could not see one another: inso much as Pompey himselfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his owne Souldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the Battell, and was somewhat long before he answered him. In fine, when he had overthrowne his Enemies with great slaughter (for they say, that of twenty thousand of them, there were but three thousand saved) Pompey's Souldiers saluted him by the name of Imperator: but he answered them, that he would not accept the honour of that Name; so long as he saw his Enemies Campe yet standing: and therefore, if it were so they thought him worthy of that Name, that first they should overthrow the Trench and Fort of their Enemies, wherein they had intrenched their Campe. The Souldiers when they heard him say so, went presently to assaile it. There Pompey fought bare-headed, to avoid the like danger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the Campe by force, and in it slew Domitius. After that Overthrow, the Cities in that Countrey came and yeelded themselves, some willingly, and others taken by force: as also they tooke King Juba that had fought for Domitius, and his Realme was given to Pompey. But Pompey being desirous further to imploy his Power, and the good fortune of his Army, went many dayes journey into the maine Land, and still conquered all where he came, making the Power of the ROMANES dreadfull unto all the barbarous People of that Countrey, the which made but small account of them at that time. He said moreover, that the wilde Beasts of AFRICK also should feele the force and good successe of the ROMANES: and thereupon he bestowed a few dayes in hunting of Lions and Elephants. For it is reported, that in forty dayes space at the uttermost, he had overcome his Enemies, subdued AFRICK, and had established the Affaires of the Kings and Kingdomes of that Countrey, being then but foure and twenty yeares old. So when he returned unto the City of UTICA, Letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to discharge all his Army, and to remaine there with one Legion onely, tarrying the coming of another Capitaine that should be sent to succed him in the Government of that Countrey. This commandement grieved him not a little, though he made no shew of it at all: but his Souldiers shewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to give out broad speeches against Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatsoever became of them) to forsake him, and they would not that he should trust unto a Tyrant. Pompey seeing that he could not perswade them by any reason to be quiet, rose out of his Chaire and retired into his Tent weeping. But the Souldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his Chaire of State, where he spent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and command them, and he desiring them to obey Sylla, and leave their mutinies. But in fine, seeing them importunate to presse him to it, he sware he would kill himselfe, rather then they should compell him, yet they scant left him thus: Hereupon it was reported unto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Sylla when he heard that, said to his friends: Well, then I see it is my destiny in mine old dayes to fight with children. He meant so, because of Marius the younger, who had done him much mischief, and had besides put him in great danger. But afterwards understanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to go and meete Pompey, and to receive him with all the honour they could: because he would go beyond them all in shew of good will, he went out of his House to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to say, Great, and commanded all them that were present to give him that Name also. This notwithstanding some say, that it was in AFRICK this Name was first given him by

by a common cry of all his whole Army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeede it is true, that Pompey himselfe being sent Proconsull into SPAIN, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his Letters and Commissions with the name of Pompey the Great: for this name then was so commonly knowne and accepted, as no man did envie it. And therefore rightly is the wisdom of the ancient ROMANES to be both commended and had in admiration, which did not onely reward service in the Field with such honourable Names and Titles, but Civill Service and good Government also in Peace at home. For there were two, whom the People of ROME called Maximi, to say, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made Peace and agreement betwixt the People and Senate: the other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine Bondmen infranchised, who through their riches and favour had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honour of Triumph, but Sylla denied it, alleadging that none could enter in Triumph into ROME but Consuls or Prætors. For sith Scipio the first, who in SPAIN had overcome the CARTHAGINIANS, never desired this honour of Triumph, being neither Consull nor Prætor, much lesse should he stand upon demand of Triumph into ROME, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and besides, it would purchase him envie of his Honour and Greatnesse. These reasons did Sylla alleadg against Pompey, and told him plainly, that if he were bent to stand in it, he would resist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honour the rising, not the setting of the Sunne: meaning thereby, how his owne honour increased, and Sylla's diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he said; but perceiving by their countenances that stood by, that they wondered at it, he asked what it was he said. When it was told him, he marvelled at the boldnesse of so young a man, and then cried out twice together, Let him then triumph a Gods name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, would needs be brought in in triumphant Chariot drawne with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the Gate of the City being too narrow, he was driven to leave the Elephants, and was contented to be drawne in with Horses. Now his Souldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised them, going about to trouble and hinder his Triumph, he said he passed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of Triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called Servilius, who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompey's Triumph, who said openly, Now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserveth Triumph: being evident enough, that if he would, he might then have easily become made Senator: he sued not for that, but as they say, fought honour by a stranger meane lesse honourable. For if he had become made Senator so young, it had not bene so great a matter: but to have such honour before he was Senator, that was marvellously to be noted. But this wanne him the more favour and good will still amongst the common People: for they were glad when after his Triumph they saw him in company amongst the ROMAN Knights. On the other side, it spighted Sylla to see him come so fast forward, and to rise to so great credit: notwithstanding being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keepe it to himselfe untill that Pompey by force, and against Sylla's will, had brought Lepidus to be Consull, by the helpe and good will of the People, that furthered his desire. Thereupon Sylla seeing Pompey returning overthwart the Market-place from the Election, with a great Train of followers to honour him, he said unto him: O young man, I see thou art glad of this Victory, and so hast thou cause; for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to have had such favour of the People, as for thy sake to have made Lepidus Consull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the City: but I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy businesse, for thou hast advanced a dangerous enemy to thy selfe. Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discovered most his ill will unto Pompey, was in his last will and Testament: for he gave Legacies unto every one of his friends, and some of them he made Tutors and Overseers of his Sonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would have kept Sylla's body from buriall in the Field of Mars, and that his Funerall should not be openly solemnized, he contrariwise brought him very honourably and safely to the ground. Shortly after Sylla's death, his words of prophecy unto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proved true. For Lepidus usurping the Authority which Sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred straight in Armes, stirring up againe those of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be avenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, spying for occasion to rise againe. True it is, that his Colleague and fellow-Consull Catulus (whom the best and foundest part of the People followed) was thought a marvellous honest man, both just and modest: howbeit, a better Governour in Peace, then a good man of Warre, inso much as time required Pompey's skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose himselfe, but tooke part straight with the Nobility and honestest men, and was presently chosen Capitaine of their Army against Lepidus, who had already wonne the greatest part of Italy, and with an Army under the conduct of Brutus, kept GAULE on this side the Mountaines called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the rest, Pompey easily overcame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODONA, besieging of Brutus. In the meane season Lepidus came to ROME, and being hard at the Walls, demanding the second Consullship, made them afraid in the City with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all sorts. Howbeit this feare was cooled straight, by a Letter which Pompey sent to ROME, advertising how he had ended this Warre without any blood-shed: for Brutus either betraying his Army, or being betrayed of it, yeelded himselfe unto Pompey, who gave him a certaine number that the Knights of ROME having served a certaine time in the Warres appointed by their order, should bring their Horse into the middle of the Market-place before the two Censors, declaring every Capitaine under whom they had served, in what Journeys and Countreys they had beene: and having also delivered account of their good behaviour and service, they then prayed to be dismissed from the Warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good service, then were they honourably rewarded: or otherwise, openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Leptinus the two Censors, being honourably set in their Tribunal or Judgement-seate, taking view of all the ROMEAN Knights that mustered before them, to be seene and examined, they marvelled when they saw Pompey coming at the farther end of the Market-place, having all the markes of a Consull borne before him, and himselfe leading his Horse in his hand by the bridle. When Pompey came neerer, and that they saw it was he, he commanded his Serjeants that carried his Axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the Barres with his Horse, where the Censors sat. Then the People flocked about him, wondering and rejoycing, being very silent. The Censors themselves also were marvellous glad to see him so obedient to the Law, and did him great reverence. In fine, the elder of the Censors did examine him in this sort. Pompey the Great, I pray thee tell me if thou hast served so long time in the Warres as the Law did appoint? Then answered Pompey aloud: Yes verily that I have, and under no other Capitaine then my selfe. The People hearing this Answer, made an open shout for joy, they were so glad to hear it: and the Censors themselves came from their Judgement-seate, and went to accompany Pompey home to his House, to please the great multitude of People that followed him, clapping of their hands with great signes of joy. At the end of their Consulship, when milking increased further betwene Pompey and Crassus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time never spake in open Assembly, but then got up into the Pulpit for Orations, and told the People openly, how Jupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commanded him to tell both the Consuls from him, that they should not leave their Charge and Office before they were reconciled together. For all these words Pompey stirred not. But Crassus first tooke him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the People: My Lords, I thinke not my selfe dishonoured to give place to Pompey, sith you your selves have thought him worthy to be called the Great, before he had any haire on his face, and unto whom you granted the honour of two Triumphs before he came to be Senator. When he had said his minde, they were made friends together, and so surrendered up their Office. Now for Crassus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neare as he could, gave over to please mens causes any more, and began by little and little to withdraw himselfe from frequenting the Market-place, and matters of judgement, coming seldome abroad, and when he did, he had alwaies a great Traine following him. It was a rare thing also to see him any more come out of his House, or talke with a man, but he was ever accompanied with a great number, and he rejoyced to himselfe to see that he had alwaies such a Traine after him: for that made him to be honoured the more, and gave him greater countenance to see him thus courted, thinking it dishonour to him to be familiar with meane persons. For men that rise by Armes, are easily despised, when they come to live like private Citizens: because they cannot fashion themselves to be companions with the common People, (who Citizen-like use a common familiarity together) but looke to be their betters in the City, as they are in the Field. Yea and contrarily, they do acknowledge themselves to be their inferiours in Warres, will thinke foule scorn if they be not their superiours in peace. And by this meanes when they have a noble Warriour among them that followed publick Causes, (which hath triumphed for many Victories and Battels he hath obtained) they obscure his Glory, and make him an underling unto them: whereas they do not otherwise envie any Souldiers that are contented equally to give them place and authority, as plainly appeared shortly after by Pompey himselfe. By such an occasion, the power of Pirats on the Sea, tooke beginning in the Countrey of CILICIA, which was not reckoned of at the first, because it was not perceived until they grew bold and venturous in King Mithridates Warres, being hired to do him service. And afterwards the ROMEANS being troubled with Civil Warres, one fighting with another, even at ROME Gates, the Sea not being looked to all this while, it set them a gogge, and made them go farther then ever they did before. For they did not onely rob and spoyle all Merchant-venturers by Sea, but rifled also the Islands and Townes upon the Sea-coast: insomuch as then there joyned with them men of great Wealth and Nobility, and of great wisdom also, and entered into their fellowship, as into a commendable faculty. Now they had set up Arsenals or Store-houses in sundry places, they had sundry Havens and Beacons on the Land, to give warning by fire all along the Sea-coast, and those well kept and watched: moreover, they had great Fleets of Ships ready furnished, with excellent good Gallies of Ores, skillfull Pilots and Mariners, their Ships of swift saile, and Pinnaces for discovery, but withall so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the Peoples of their Gallies were all gilt, the Coverings of the same all of Purple Silke, delighting onely to make a glorious shew of their Pillage. All the Sea-coast over, there was no sight of any thing but Musick, singing, banqueting, and rioting, Prizes of Capitaines and men of great quality, and ranfome of 1000 Prisoners: and all this was to the shame and dishonour of the ROMEANS. Their Ships were about 1000 in number, and they had taken 400 Townes. They had spoyled and destroyed many holy Temples that had never been touched before: as the Temple of the Twins in the Isle of CLAROS, the Temple of Venus Strabon, the Temple of Earth in the City of HERMION, and the Temple of Esculapim in EPIDAUROM: the Temples of Neptune in ISTHOMOS, TENARIA, and

and CALABRIA: and the Temples of Apollo in ACTIUM, in the Isle of LEUCADES: the Temples of Juno in SAMOS, in ARGOS, and in LUCANIA. They had also many strange Sacrifices and certaine Ceremonies of Religion among themselves, in the Mount Olympus, and among other, the Mistry of Mithres, which is the Sunne: and remaineth yet in being unto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent parts and injuries they did the ROMEANS upon the Sea, they wentaland, and where they found any houses of Pleasure upon the Sea-coast, they spoyled and destroyed them: and on a time they tooke two ROMEAN Prators, Sexitius and Belinus, being in their Purple Robes, with their Sergeants and Officers attending on them, and carried them quite away. Another time also they stole away the Daughter of Antonius (a man that had received honour of Triumph) as she went a walking abroad in the Fields, and she was redeemed for a great summe of Money. But yet the greatest spite and mockery they used to the ROMEANS, was this, that when they had taken any of them, and that he cried he was a Citizen of ROME, and named his Name: then they made as though they had been amazed, and afraid of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighs, and fell down on their knees before him, praying him to forgive them. The poore Prisoners thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled themselves as though they seemed fearfull. For some of them came unto him, and put shooes on his feet: others clapt a Gown on the backe of him after the ROMEAN fashion; for fear (said they) lest he should be mistaken another time. When they had plaide all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their Ship-ladders, and put him on it, and bad him go his way, he should have no hurt: and if he would not go of himselfe, then they cast him over the board by force, and sent him packing. These Rovers and Sea-pirates had all the Sea Mediterraneum at commandement: insomuch there durst not a Merchant looke out, nor once traffick that Sea. And this was the onely cause that moved the ROMEANS (fearing scarcity of Victuals, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recover the Signiory againe of the Sea from these Pirats. The first man that moved it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be onely Admirall or Generall by Sea, but should have absolute power to command all manner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge, was Gabinus, Pompeys friend. The summe of this Decree gave him full power and absolute Authority of all the Sea from Hercules Pillars, and of the maine Land, the space of foure hundred Furlongs from the Sea, (for the ROMEANS Dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding within that compass were many great Nations and mighty Kings.) Furthermore, it gave him power to choofe of the Senate fiftene Lieutenants, to give unto every one of them severall Provinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the Treasure, of the generall Receivers of the State, to defray the charges of a Fleet of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leave what men of Warre he thought good, and as many Gallies and Mariners as he listed. This Law when it had been read over among them, the People confirmed it with very good will. Yet the Noble-men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this Authority did not onely exceed all envie, but also that it gave them apparent cause of feare, to give such absolute power unto a private person. Whereupon they were all against it but Cesar, who favoured the Decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey as the People, whose favour he sought. The Noble-men fell marvelously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consuls was very hot with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steps, but peradventure he would come short of that end he made. Thereupon the People thought to have killed him. After that, Catulus stood up to speake against this Edict. The People at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of envie, to speake many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, advised the People to spare him, and not to venture in such dangerous Warres (one after another) a man of so great account, as they ought to make of him. If ye chance to lose him, said he, whom have you then to put in his place? The People then cried out: Your selfe. Then perceiving that he lost his labour, seeking to turne the People from their determination, he left it there, and said no more, Rufinus rose next after him to speake, but he could have no audience. When he saw that he could not be heard, he made a signe with his fingers, that they should not give Pompey alone this Authority, but joyne another with him. The People being offended withall made such an outcry upon it, that a Crow flying over the Market-place at that instant, was stricken blind and fell down amongst the People. Whereby it appeareth that a fowle falling out of the aire to the ground, did not fall for that the aire is broken or pierced with any force or fury: but because the very breath of the Voice (when it cometh with such a violence, as it maketh a very Tempest in the Aire) doth stricke and overcome them. Thus for that day, the Assembly brake up, and nothing past: and at the day appointed when this Decree should passe by Voices of the People, Pompey went abroad into the Countrey. There being advertised that the Decree was past for the confirmation of his charge, he returned again that night into the City, because he would avoide the envie they would have borne him to have seene them run out of all parts of the City unto him, to have waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and sacrificed unto the gods: and audience being given him at an open Assembly, he handled the matter so, that they gave him many things besides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation set down and appointed at the first Decree. For he ordained that the Common-wealth should arme him five hundred Ships, and they leaved for him six score thousand Footmen, and five thousand Horsemen, and chose besides foure and against the twenty Senators, which had every one of them been Generals of Armies, and two generall Treasurers.

furers also. While things were thus preparing, the price of Victuals fell by chance, which rejoiced the People so much, that they stucke not to say, that the Name of Pompey onely had already ended this Warre. This notwithstanding, he divided all the Sea betweene the Lands into thirteene Regions, and in every of them he appointed a certaine number of his Ships, and moreover one of his Lieutenants over them. Thus having disperfed his power all abroade, he brought all the Pyrates Ships that were in a Fleete together, within his danger: and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a Dock. Now for them that had disperfed themselves betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase they fled all into CILICIA, as Bees into the Bee-hive, against whom he would needs goe himselfe in person with threescore of his best Ships. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had scourd all the THUSCAN Sea, the Coast of LYBIA, SARDINIA, SICILE, and of CORSICA, of all those Theeves which were wont to keepe thereabouts, and this he did within forty daies space, taking infinite paines, both himselfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Consuls called Piso, did all the best he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had discharged his Oare-men, for that he envied Pompeys prosperitie: Pompey sent his Ships before to make towards ITALY to arrive at the City of BRUNDISIUM. He in the meane time went through THUSCAN to ROME, where, so soone as his coming was knowne, all the People ranne out to meet him, as if he had been absent a long time: and that which made the People more joyfull to see him, was the suddaine change of Victuals unlooked for, that daily came to the Towne out of all parts. But Piso went neare to be deprived of his Consulship: for Gabinus had the Decree written, and ready to present to the People. But Pompey would not suffer it. So, having gently brought all to passe as he desired, he went unto the City of BRUNDISIUM, and there tooke Sea, and hoisted saile. Now though his hasty Voyage, and shortnesse of time made him passe by many good Cities without coming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so passe by the City of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had sacrificed to the gods, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the City, he read two Writings that were made in his praise, the one within the Gate which said thus:

The humbler that thou doest thy selfe as man behave, The more thou doest deserve the Name of God to have:

And the other Writing was without the Gate, which said,

We wist for thee, We waite for thee, We worship thee, we waite on thee.

Now because Pompey having taken certaine of these Rovers by Sea that kept together, did use them gently when they required pardon, and having their Ships and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other Companions being in good hope of his merer, fled from his other Captaines and Lieutenants, and went and yeilded themselves, their Wives and Children into his hands. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of themselves, and by that meanes he came to have knowledge of the rest, and to follow them where they went, whom he tooke in the end: but knowing that they deserved no pardon, they hid themselves. Yet the most part and the richest of them, had conveyed their Wives, Children and Goods, and all other their Family unmeet for Warres, into strong Castles and little Townes upon Mount Taurus: and such men as were able to carry Weapons, imbarked, and lay before a City of CORACESIUM, where they tarried Pompey, and gave him Battell first by Sea, and there were overcome, and afterwards they were besieged by Land. Howbeit shortly after, they prayed they might be received to mercy, and thereupon yeilded their Bodies, Townes, and Ilands, which they had fortified, and were hard to have taken and worfe to have approached. Thus was this Warre ended, and all the Pyrats in lesse then three Moneths driven from the Sea wheresoever they were. He wan also a great number of other Ships, besides foure score and ten Gallies armed with Copper Spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number above twenty thousand persons) he did not onely consider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise part on the other side to let them go at liberty, to gather force againe, being so great a number of them as indeed they were, and all poor men and Soldiers. Therefore weighing with himselfe that man by nature is not born a wilde or a savage beast, but contrarily becometh a brute beast changing nature, when he falleth to Vice: and againe is made tame, and civill in time, changing place and manner of life: (as the brute beasts that being wilde by nature do also become gentle and tractable, with gentler usage by continuance) he determined to draw these Pyrates from the Sea into the upland, and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in Towns, and manuring the Ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine small Townes of the CILICIANS, that were scant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giving them Land to keepe them with. The City of the SOLIANS also, that notlong before had been destroyed by Tigranes the King of ARMENIA, being desirous to replenish that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed divers also in the City of DYMA in the Countrey of ACHATA, which at that time lacked Inhabitants, and had great store of very good Land. Now therefore his Enemies reproved him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest Friends misliked him. For Metellus that gentle person (a cousin to that Metellus which was his Colleague, and made Wars in SPAIN with him against Sertorius) was sent Prator into CRETA, before Pompey was chosen Generall against the Pyrates. This CRETA, next unto CILICIA, was even a second Den of Pyrates. Metellus finding there a great number of these Theeves, took many of them and put them to death, even all that came to his hands. Then, such as had escaped from him, being straightly besieged, sent unto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercy: declaring unto him, that the Isle of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, because all parts of that Region from the Sea, came just within the compasse limited him on the Land. Pompey pardoning them upon their submission, wrote unto Metellus, and Fact against Metellus. commanded him to leave off his Warre, and therewithall charged all the Cities, that they should not obey Metellus Commandements. After that he sent Lucius Octavius one of his Lieutenants, who entered into the Towns Metellus besieged, and fought for the Pirats. This made Pompey not onely hated and envied, but derided also: for that under his Name he had protected such vile Theeves, that had neither God nor Law, and given them his Authority to save their lives, for a little envy and emulation he bare unto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reprove Achilles, and say that he shewed not the part of a wise man, but of a young fool besides himself, for desire of Glory making a signe to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to strike at Hector, to the end that as Homer said:

When others had the Honour of it wonne.

But Pompeys Fact was worfe then this: for he fought for the common Enemies of the World, and onely to deprive a ROMANE Prator of Triumph, who had done great good service to have destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not off his Warre for Pompeys Letters, but having taken the Pirates by assault, he put them to death: and afterwards having done Octavius open shame through his Campe, he let him goe. When Newes came to ROME, that the Pirates Warre was brought to good end, and that Pompey having no other service in hand, went visiting the Cities up and downe, one Manlius a Tribune of the People, put forth another Decree unto them of this effect: That Pompey taking all the Army Lucullus had, and the Provinces under his Government, with all BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept, should goe make Warre upon the Kings, Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands notwithstanding all his jurisdiction and Army by Sea, in as Royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was even to one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMANE Empire. For by this second Decree, he had all these Countries, not named in his former Commission, added to amplify his Authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the Armies and Forces with the which he had overcome those two mighty Kings. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the injury that was offered unto Lucullus, depriving him of the honour of his doings, to give it to another, that should rather succeed him in honour of Triumph, then in danger of Warres, knowing that they did him too manifest injury, and shewed themselves too unthankfull: but that which most grieved them, was to see Pompeys power established in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore one of them perswaded and encouraged another, stoutly to withstand this edict, and not to suffer their liberty to be lost in this sort. Notwithstanding, when the day came that this Decree should passe, they were so afraid to anger the People, that their hearts failed them, and none durst speake against it but Catulus onely, that earnestly inveighed against the passing of it a long time together, and greatly blamed the People. At the length, perceiving he had wonne never a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they should looke to seeke out some Mountaine or high Rocke to retire safely unto, to defend their liberty, as their Ancestors had done in old time before them. All this prevailed not, for the Decree passed by the Voices of all the Tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lord almost of all that, which Sylla by force of Armes, and with great effusion of Bloud (having made himselfe Lord of ROME) had before in his Power. When Pompey had received Letters from ROME, advertising him what the People had past in that behalf, some say that at the receipt of them in the presence of his familiar Friends that were about him, and rejoiced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieved him marvellously to have such great Offices and charge laid upon him, one in the necke of another, and burst forth in these words: O gods, shall I never see an end of such a world of troubles as I have! Had it not been better for me to have been a meane man borne and unknown, then thus continually to be in Warre with Armour on my backe? What, shall I never see the time, that breaking the neckes of spite and envy against me, I may yet once in my life live quietly at home in my Countrey with my Wife and Children? When Pompey spake those words, his familiar Friends could not abide to see his deepe dissimulation, knowing that besides his naturall ambition, and covetous desire to rule, he was glad in his heart that he had his Charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deeds forthwith bewrayed. For he presently sent out Precepts into every quarter, commanding all sorts of Soldiers to come to him immediately, and made all the Princes and Kings within precinct of his Charge to come unto him, and going through the Countries, altered and changed all that Lucullus had established before. Furthermore, he did release the penalties enjoyned them, and took from them also the Gifts that Lucullus bestowed on them. In fine, this was all his purpose and desire: to make them that honoured Lucullus know, that he had no further power and authority to do any thing. Lucullus finding himselfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either side thought good they should meet and talke together: which came so to passe, for they meet in the Countrey of GALATIA. And because they both were Captaines of the ROMANE Armies, and had done many famous Acts, they had their Sergeants and Officers that carried the bundels of Rods before them, wreathed all about with Lawrell Boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close and woody Countrey, all covered with green Trees; and Pompey on the other side had passed through a great sandy plaine, where no Tree was growing, Thereupon Lucullus Sergeants seeing the Lawrell Boughes drie and withered away, which Pompey's Sergeants carried, they gave them of their green and fresh Boughs to beautifie the Rods and Axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honour from him. In truth Lucullus had been Consul before Pompey, and so was he also older man then he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, because he had triumphed twice. At their first meeting, their entertainment and discourse was with great ceremony and courtiesse as might be, one highly praising the others Deeds, rejoicing at each others good successe: but at parting they fell to hot words together, Pompey upbraiding Lucullus avarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, so that their friends had much ado to part them. Lucullus departing thence, divided the Lands in GALATIA, which he had conquered, and bestowed them and other Gifts on such as he thought good. Pompey on the other side camping hard by him, specially commanded the People in every part to obey him in nothing that he did: and besides he tooke all his Souldiers from him leaving him onely sixteene hundred; which he supposed were such, as for disdain and ill will they bare him, would do him but small service. Furthermore, to blemish the glory of his doings, he told every body Lucullus had fought with the pompe and shadow onely of these two Kings, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for Warres, with Shields, Swords, and Horses. Lucullus for revenge on the other side said, that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of Warre, like a cowardly buzzard that preieth upon dead bodies, which others have slaine: and to cut asunder the remaine of this Warre ended by another, as he had done before, attributing the honour of the overthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus and Spartacus, to himself, where indeed Metellus Cressus, and Catulus did overcome them. And therefore it was no marvell, that he fought the glory and honour to Triumph for the Kingdomes of PONTUS and ARMENIA: fith that through his subtle practises he had obtained Triumph for a few slaves and fugitives. Lucullus being now gone his way, Pompey sent good Garrisons unto all the Coasts upon the Sea, from the Province of PHOENICIA, unto the Realme of BOSPHORUS. That done, he tooke his journey by land towards Mithridates, who had in his Campe thirty thousand Footmen, and two thousand Horsemen, and yet durst not offer Battell, but camped first upon a Mountaine of great strength, and hard to get up on: notwithstanding shortly after, he forsooke it for lack of Water. He was no sooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it: who, conjecturing by the nature of the Plants and Trees in that place which were very green, and also by divers holes he found, that by reason thereof should be some Springs, he commanded them to digge wells in every corner; so that in a very short time all his Camp had Water enough, and he wondered at Mithridates that he could not finde that out in all the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped round about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a Wall within his owne Campe: who after he had abidden the Siege five and forty daies, fled away with all the choice of his Army, unknowing unto Pompey, having first slaine all the sick and impotent persons within his Campe. After that, Pompey found him another time by the River of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would passe over the River before he could prevent him in time, he raised his Campe againe, and marched away at midnight. About that time, they say, that Mithridates saw that in a Dreame which did Prognosticate what would happen. He thought, that having the winde in the poope of the Ship, he was under faile in the midst of the Sea of Mare Bosporum, and that he was marvellous glad of it, and rejoiced with them that sailed with him, thinking himselfe certainly past all danger: yet suddainly againe, that all this Joy left him, and that he floa ted up and down the waves of the Sea, upon a little piece of the Ship that was broken, trusting to the mercy of the Winds. As he was troubled with this ill favoured Dreame, certaine of his Familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come so neare, that there was no shift, but they must needs fight to defend their Campe. Thereupon his Captaines straight began to put his men in battell ray, ready to fight. Pompey understanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venture his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compasse them in to keepe them from flying, and then in the morning to set upon them more easily, his men being the better Souldiers. But Pompeys old Captaines were so earnestly in hand with him to perswade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they should give charge. Now it was not so dark but they could somewhat see, for the Moon that was very low and upon her setting, gave light enough to discern the body of a man: yet because the Moon was very low, the shadow which gave out further far then their bodies, came almost even to their very Enemies, which did let them that they could not certainly judge what space of ground was between them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they cast their Darts at the ROMANS, but they hurt never a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMANS perceiving that, rah upon them with great cries. But the barbarous People durst not abide their charge they were so afraid, but turned their backs, and ran away for life, so that they were slaine down right. Thus were there ten thousand of the barbarous People slaine and more, and their Campe also taken. As for Mithridates himself, at the beginning of the onfet, he made a lane through the ROMANS with eight hundred Horsmen, and passed cleane through them. But incontinently his men dispersed upon it, some one way, some another way, so that he was left alone but with three persons onely, whereof Hypsicratea was one of the number, which had ever been valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cause Mithridates called her Hypsicratea. She at that time being arrayed like a man of Armes of PERSTIA, and mounted also on a Horse after the PERSTIAN manner, was never weary with any long Journey the King made, nor never left to waite upon his Person, until such time as the King came to a strong Castle called Inora, where was great store of Gold and Silver. Howbeit Tigranes sent to let him, and further proclaimed by Trumpet, that he would give a hundred

dred Talents to him that could kill him. Thereupon, passing by the head of the River of Euphrates, he fled through the Countrey of COLCHIDE. In the meane time, Pompey invaded the Countrey of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the younger, who was revolted againt his Father, and went to meet with Pompey at the River of Araxes, which hath his beginning almost about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the East, and falleth into Mare Caspium. So they both together marched on further into the Countrey, receiving such Towns as yielded unto them. But King Tigranes (that not long before had been consumed and destroyed by Lucullus) understanding that Pompey was of a milde and gentle nature, he received his Garrisons into his strongest Forts and Royall Houses, and went himselfe with his Friends and Kinsmen to meet Pompey, and to yield himselfe unto him. When he came hard to his Camp, being a horse-back, there came out two Sergeants of Pompeys and commanded him to light and go in a foot, for there was never man seen a horse-back within the ROMANS Campe. Tigranes did not onely obey them, but further plucked off his Sword and gave it them: and in fine, when he came almost to Pompey, taking of his Royall Hat from his head, he would have laid it at Pompeys feet, and falling down most shamefully on the ground, imbraced himselfe to embrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himselfe prevented him, and taking him by the hand, made him to sit down by him on the one side of him, and his Son on the other. Then he said unto them both: as for the other losses you have sustained heretofore, you must thank Lucullus for them; who hath taken from you SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you have left you till my coming, I will let you enjoy it, paying to the ROMANS a fine of six thousand Talents for the injury you had done them, provided also, that your Son have the Kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the Conditions of Peace. The ROMANS then saluted him King. He was so glad thereof, that he promised to give every Souldier half a Mina, every Centiner ten Minas, and to every Colonell of a thousand men a Talent. His Son was very angry withall: inasmuch as Pompey sending for him to come to Supper to him, he answered againe, that was not the friendship he looked for at Pompeys hands, for he should finde many other ROMANS that would offer him that courtiesse. Pompey for his answer, clapped him up as a Prisoner, and kept him to beled in Triumph at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates King of PARTHIA sent Ambassadors to Pompey to demand this young Prince, that was his Sonne in law, and to tell him that the River of Euphrates must be the uttermost Confines of his Conquests. Pompey answered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his Sonne, then the Father in Law: and as for limiting of his Borders, that he would do it with justice. So, leaving Afranius in ARMENIA, to keepe the Countrey, Pompey passed by other Nations which inhabit about Mount Caucasus, having Mithridates in chafe: of which Nations, two of the chiefest and of greatest power, are the ALBANIANS and IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do stretch out unto Mount Moschimus, and to the Realme of PONTUS. The ALBANIANS lie towards the East, and Mare Caspium. These men first suffered Pompey to passe through their Countrey, upon his sending to them. But winter having stollen upon the ROMANS while they were there, and they busily occupied about Saturnes Feasts: the barbarous People having leaved about forty thousand fighting men in one Campe together, came and passed over the River of Cyranus. (This River cometh from the Mountaines of the IBERIANS, and receiving the River of Araxes into it, which passeth through ARMENIA, disperfed it selfe into twelve severall Moneths, and so falleth into Mare Caspium. Some notwithstanding hold opinion, that Cyranus received not the River of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it selfe, and falleth into the same Sea, neare unto the mouths of the other.) Pompey might if he would, have kept them from coming over the River, yet did he suffer them quietly to passe over. When they were all over, he went againt them, overcame them in Battell, and slew a great number of them in the Field. Afterwards he pardoned their King, submitting himselfe unto Pompey by his Ambassadors, and made Peace with him. Then from thence he went againt the IBERIANS, who were no lesse in number then the ALBANIANS were at the first, and also better Souldiers, and were resolutely bent to do good service unto Mithridates, and to drive out Pompey. These IBERIANS were never subject to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and escaped also from being subject to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander never said in the Countrey of HYRCANIA: whom also Pompey overcame in a great and bloody Battell, having slaine nine thousand in the Field, and taken ten thousand Prisoners. From thence he went into the Countrey of COLCHIDE. There Servilius met him by the River of Phasis, with the Fleet of Ships with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himself amongst a People that were neighbours unto the Straights of BOSPHORUS, and the Maritimes Meotides he found it a hard piece of work. Furthermore also, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him back to be revenged of them. Thereupon he had made a strong defence a great way along the River side, with a marvellous number of great Trees, feld and layed across one over another. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty passed through them, he fell into an ill-favoured Countrey, where he should travell a great way before he could come to any Water. Thereupon he caused ten thousand Goats Skins to be filled with Water, and to went forward to meet with his Enemies whom he found by the River of Abas, being six score thousand Footmen, and twelve thousand Horsmen; but all (or the most of them) armed with wilde Beasts Skins. Their Chieftaine was Cossis the Kings owne Brother. He, when the Battell was begun, flew upon Pompey, and threw a Dart at him, and hurt him in the Flanke. Pompey on the other side, ranne him through with his Lance on both sides, and slew him stark starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this Battell, which fought on the barbarous Peoples side, coming from the Mountaines that run along the River of Thermodon. For, after the Overthrow given, the ROMANES spoyling the dead, found Targets and Buskins of the AMAZONES, but not a body of a Woman among them. They also do inhabit on the side of the Mountain Caucasus that looketh towards Mare Hyrcanum, and do not border upon the ALBANIAN: but the GELB and the LELEGES are betwixt them, with whom they company two Moneths onely every year, meeting together by the River of Thermodon; all the rest of the year they live apart by themselves. After this Battell, Pompey going to invade the Countrey of HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to goe backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venomous Serpents which he met with, being come within three daies journey of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there received Presents which were sent unto him from the Kings of the *ELYMIA*N and the MEDES, and wrote very courteously unto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with part of his Army against the King of the PARTHIANS, who had invaded the Countrey of GORDINA, and harried and spoyled the King Tigranes Subjects. Notwithstanding he drave him out, and followed him unto ARIELITIDE. Furthermore, all the Lemmans and Concubines of King Mithridates being brought unto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but sent them all home againe to their Parents and Friends, because the most of them were either the Daughters of Princes, of Noblemen, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his Lemmans had most credit about Mithridates, unto whom he had left the Charge of his Castle, where the greatest part of his Treasure of Gold and Silver lay, was a Singers Daughter, who (as they said) was not rich, but an old man. She having sung one night before Mithridates, being at Supper, he fell in such fancy with her, that he would needs have her lie with him the same night, and the old man her Father went home offended, because the King would not so much as give him one gentle word. But the next morning when he arose, he marvelled to see the Tables in his House full of Plate of Gold and Silver, and a great company of Serving-men, Groomes of Chamber and Pages, and that they had brought him marvellous rich Apparell, and a Horse ready at the Gates bravely furnished, as the Kings Familiars did use when they went abroad into the City: he thought it was done in mockery, to have made sport with him, and therefore would have run his way, had not the Serving-men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that died of late, which the King had bestowed on him and that all this he saw, was but a little Portion in respect of the other Goods and Lands he gave him. So the old man believing them, at the length did put on this Purple Gown they brought him, and got up on Horseback, and riding through the Streets cried, All this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told them: Masters, ye may not wonder to hear me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not Stones at them I meet, I am so mad for joy. Such was Stratonices Birth and Parentage, as we have told you. She did then deliver this Castle into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich Presents, but he would take none of them, other then such as served to adorne the Temples of the gods, and to beautifie his Triumph, and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the King of the *IBERIAN*S, having sent him a Bed-reed, a Table, and a Chaire of cleane Gold, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him: he delivered it over unto the Treasurers custody, to be accountable for it unto the Senate. In another Castle called Canon, he found certaine secret Letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him marvellously to reade, because thereby he plainly understood the Kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poisoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne Sonne, and Alcaus the SARDINIAN, because he had wonne the Bell, at the Horse-race before him. There was also interpreting of Dreames, that either himselfe or his Wives had dreamed, and also Love-letters betwixt Monima and him, Theophanes writeth also, that there was found an Oration of Rutilius, in the which he enticed and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMANES to death that were in ASIA. Howbeit in reason men thinke that this was a shamefull lie, maliciously devised by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, because he was but a counterfeite to him: or peradventure to gratifie Pompey, whose Father Rutilius in his Histories describeth to be as wicked a man as ever lived. Thence Pompey departed towards the City of AMISUS. There his ambition brought him to commit such Facts, as he himselfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his Enemy being yet alive, he tooke upon him, to establish Lawes, to give Gifts, and distribute such Honours, as Captaines that had obtained Victory were wont to doe, when they had ended all Warre and trouble. For he himselfe (Mithridates, being yet the stronger in the Realme of BOSSPHORUS, and having a great puissant Army about him) did all that which he reproved another for, appointing Provinces, and giving out Gifts to every man according as he deserved: to gratifie twelve barbarous Kings, with divers other Princes, Lords and Captaines that came to him thither. Writing also to the King of PARTHIA, he did decline to give him that Title, which others were wont to doe in the direction of their Letters, calling him King of Kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great desire to winne SYRIA, and to go through the Countrey of ARABIA, even unto the red Sea, because he might enlarge his Conquests and Victories every way, even unto the great Sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole Earth. For in LYBIA, he was the first ROMANE that conquered all to the great Sea. On the other side, in *SPAIN*e he enlarged the Empire of ROME, and brought the Confinnes thereof unto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, having lately the *ALBANIAN*S in chafe, he came almost unto Mare Hyrcanum. Thus he put himselfe in Journey, intending his circuite unto the red Sea, specially because he saw Mithridates dates so ill to follow, and worse to overcome by force when he fled, then when he fought any Battell: and that made him say, that he would leave a sharper Enemy behinde him then himselfe; and that he meant Famine. For he appointed Souldiers with sufficient number of Ships, to lie in waite for the Merchants that failed to the Countrey of BOSSPHORUS, to carry them any Victuals or other Merchandizes, prohibiting them upon paine of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best part of his Army, and in his way, found the bodies of the dead ROMANES which Mithridates had overthrowne under the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet unburied. So he caused them all to be taken up, and honourably buried. Lucullus having forgotten, or otherwise neglected to doe it, in my conscience that was the chiefe cause why his men did hate him. Pompey now having by Afranius subdued the *ARABIAN*S dwelling about Mount Amanus, went himselfe in Person into SYRIA, and made a Government and Province of it, being wonne of the ROMANE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull King: and conquered all JUDA also, where he tooke King Aristobolus, and builded certaine Cities there, and delivered others also from bondage, which by Tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chastised well enough. Howbeit he spent the most part of his time there, deciding of Controversies, pacifying of Contentions and quarrels by Arbitrement, which fell out betwixt the free Cities, Princes and King, and sent of his Friends into those places where he could not come himselfe. For on a time when he was chosen Arbitrator betwixt the PARTHIANS and the *ARMENIAN*S, touching the Title of a Countrey which both parties claimed, he sent three Commissioners thither to judge definitively betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame and renowne were great, no lesse was his Vertue, Justice and Liberality, which indeed did hide many faults, his Friends and Familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did use them so well that complained unto him, or that had to doe with him in any matter, that he made them contented patiently to beare their covetousnesse and straight dealing. One of his chiefe Familiars about him whom he loved best, was called Demetrius, a bondman enfranchised, who otherwise was very discreet in his doings, but being somewhat too bold of his good Fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a young man, yet of good judgement and of a noble minde, in Pompeys absence went to see the City of ANTIOCH. Now for himselfe, his manner was alwaies to goe on foot, and all his friends besides that did accompany him to honour him, were on Horseback. He perceiving as farre off, a great sort of People coming towards him all in white, and of one side of the Street little Children, and on the other Boyes, round about him as in a ring: at the first he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his sake to honour him, that they made this Procession, which he in no wise would have had done. Thereupon he commanded his Friends to light from their Horses, and go on foot with him. But when they came neare to the Gate of the City, the Master of the Ceremonies that led this Procession, having a Garland on his Head, and a Rod in his hand, came unto them, and asked them, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes Friends laughed to heare this question: then said Cato, Alas poore City: and so passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey himselfe was cause that Demetrius had the lesse ill will borne him, then otherwise he should have had: because they saw how boldly he would use Pompey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden some to Dinner or Supper; while he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would tarry till they were all come: Demetrius would be set at the Board, and presumptuously have his Head covered even to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIA out of his journey, he had already purchased the goodliest Houses of Pleasure, and fairest Walkes that were about ROME, and had sumptuous Gardens also, the which the People commonly called, Demetrius Gardens: though his Master Pompey was but meanelly housed till his third Consulship. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous stately Theater, called Pompeys Theater; and joynd unto that also another House, as a Pent-house to his Theater, farre more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. In-fomuch as he that was Owner of it after him, when he came into it, he marvelled, and asked whereabouts it was that Pompey dined and supped. These things are reported thus. Now the King of the *ARABIAN*S, that dwelt about the Castle called Petra, having never until that time made any account of the ROMANES Army was then greatly afraid of them, and wrote unto Pompey, that he was at his devotion, to doe what he would command him. Pompey thereupon to prove him, whether he meant as he spake, brought his Army before this Castle of Petra. Howbeit this Voyage was not liked of many men, because they judged it was an occasion found out to leave following of Mithridates, against whom they would have had him rather have bent his force, being an ancient Enemy to ROME and that began to gather strength againe, and prepared (as they heard say) to leade a great Army through SCYTHIA and PANNONIA into ITALIA. But Pompey thinking he should sooner diminish his power by suffering him to go on with Warres, then that he should otherwise be able to take him flying: would not toile to follow him in vaine. And for these causes he would needs make Warres in other places, and linger time so long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the Castle of Petra, and had lodged his Campe for that day: as he was riding and manning his Horse up and down the Campe, posts came flinging to him from the Realme of PONTUS, and brought him good newes, as was easily to be discerned as farre off by the heads of their Javelings, which were wreathed about with Lawrell Boughs. The Souldiers perceiving that, flocked straight about him: but Pompey would make an end of his riding first, before he he read these Letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his Horse, and returned into his Campe, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand upon to speake unto them; and againe, the Souldiers would not tarry the making of one after the manner of their Campe, which men of War do make themselves, with great Turves of Earth, laying one of them upon another: but for haste and earnest desire they had to hear what newes there was in the Letters, they laied together a heape of Saddlestone upon another, and Pompey getting up on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himselfe with his owne hands, because his Sonne Pharnaces did rebell against him, and had wonne all that which his Father possessed: writing unto him, that he kept it for himselfe and the ROMANS. Upon these newes, all the Campe, ye may imagine, made wonderful joy, and did Sacrifice to the gods, giving them thanks and were as merry as if in Mithridates Person alone, there had died an infinite number of their Enemies. Pompey by this occasion, having brought this Warre more easily to passe then he hoped for, departed presently out of ARABIA; and having speedily in few daies passed through the Countries lying by the way, he came at length to the City of AMISUS. There he found great Presents that were brought unto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the Kings Bloud, and amongst the rest, Mithridates Corpe, which would not well be discerned by his Face, because they that had the carrying of his Body had forgotten to drie up the braine: nevertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine scarres he had in his Face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to avoide envy, sent him away unto the City of SINOPE. He wondered much at the marvellous sumptuous rich Apparell and Weapons that he wore. The scabbard of his Sword (which cost foure hundred Talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a Hat of Mithridates, of wonderful workmanship, being begged of Caius his Foster-Brother was secretly given to Fannus the Son of Sylla, without Pompeys privy. But afterwards when Pharnaces understood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey having ordered all things, and established that Province, went on his Journey homewards with greater Pompe and Glory. So coming unto MITYLENE, he released the City of all Taxes and Payments for Theophanes sake, and was present at a certaine Play they yearly make for Games, where the Poets report their Works contending one with another, having at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompeys Acts and Gestes. Pompey exceeding well of the Theater, where these Plaies were made, and drew a Modell or Platforme of it, to make a statelier then that in ROME. As he passed by the City of RHODES, he would needs heare all the Rhetoricians dispute, and gave every one of them a Talent. Pofidonius had written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetorician, upon the theame and proposition Pompey selfe did give them, touching the Generall question, Pompey did the like at ATHENS unto the Philosophers there. For he gave towards the redeifying of the City againe, fifty Talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALY, to have been very honourably received, and longed to be at home to see his Wife and Children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge given him to mingle Fortunes prosperity with some bitter sop of adversity, laid a block in his way at home in his owne House to make his returne more sorrowfull. For Mutia his Wife had in his absence played false at Tables. But Pompey being then farre off, made no account of the reports nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare unto ITALIE, and that he was more attentive to give eare to the ill reports he heard, then he sent unto her to tell her, that he refused her for his Wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither ever after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Notwithstanding, in Ciceroes Epistles, the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ranne abroad in ROME, which troubled them sore, being given out that he would bring his Army straight to ROME, and make himselfe absolute Lord of all the ROMANE Empire. Crassus thereupon, either for that he believed it indeed to be true or, (as it was thought) to make the accusation true, and the envy towards Pompey the greater, conveyed himself, his family and goods suddenly out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALIE, called all his Souldiers together; and after he had made an Oration unto them, as time and occasion required, he commanded them to sever themselves, and every man to repaire home to apply his businesse, remembering to meet at ROME together at the day of his Triumph. His Army being thus dispersed, and straight reported abroad for newes, a marvellous thing happened unto him. The Cities seeing Pompey the Great without Souldiers, having but a small traine about him of his familiar Friends onely, went all of them to meet him, not as though he were returned home from his great Conquests, but from some Journey taken for his pleasure. Such was the love of the People to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: so that if he had been disposed to have made any innovation in the Common-wealth, he had not needed his Army. In those daies there was a Law, that no man should enter into ROME before his Triumph: whereupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to deferre the chusing of Consuls for a few daies, because he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yeare. They denied him his request, by Cato's meanes that hindered it. Pompey marvelling to hear of boldnesse and plaine speech, which he onely used of all other to defend his just Causes, had a marvellous desire to win him, and to make him his Friend. So Cato having two Nieces, Pompey desired to marry the one himselfe, and the other for his Son. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompey, that it was a colour onely to win and corrupt him, denied him flatly. His Wife and Sister on the other side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliance with Pompey the Great. About that time it chanced, that Pompey being very desirous to prefer Afranius to be Consul, he caused certain Money to be given among the Tribes of the People, and the same was delivered out to some, even in his own Gardens: This thing being reported abroad in the City, every man spake ill of Pompey: that he put the Consulship to sale for Money unto those that could not deserve it by Vertue, fith himselfe onely had obtained it by purchase of many a noble and worthy deed. Then said Cato to his Wife and Sister: Loe now, we had been partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equity and his honour. But now to his Triumph: For the statelinessse and magnificence thereof, although he had two daies space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the Shew, that were not seen, which would have served to have set out another Triumph. First there were Tables carried, whereon were written the Names and Titles of all the People and Nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow: The Kingdome of PONTUS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the People that dwell about PHOENICIA and PALAESTINE, JUDAEA, and ARABIA: and all the Pirats which he had overcome both by Sea and by Land, in all parts of the World. In all these Countries he tooke about a thousand Castles, few lesse then nine hundred Townes and Cities: of Pyrates Ships eight hundred; and nine and thirty desolate Townes left without Inhabitants, replenished againe with People by him. Moreover, these Tables declared, that the revenue of the Common-wealth of ROME before these Conquests he made, amounted yearly but to five thousand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the summes he had added unto the former revenue, they should now receive eight thousand and five hundred Miriades: and that he brought presently in ready Gold and Silver, and in Plate and Jewels, to put into the common Treasure, the value of twenty thousand Talents, besides that which had been distributed already among the Souldiers: of the which, he that had leaft for his share, had fiftene hundred Drachmaes. The Prisoners that were led in the shew of this Triumph, besides the Captaines of the Pyrates, were these that follow: The Sonne of Tigranes King of ARMENIA, with his Wife and Daughter: the Wife of King Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime: Aristobolus King of JUDY: Mithridates Sister, with five Sonnes of hers, and some Ladies of SCYTHIA. The Hostages also of the IBERIANS and the ALBANIANS and also of the Kings of the COMMAGENIANS: over and besides a great number of other marks of Triumphs which himselfe or his Lieutenant had won at sundry Battels in divers places. But the greatest honour that ever he wan, and which never other Consul of the ROMANS but himselfe obtained, was this, that he made his third Triumph of the three parts of the World. Divers other ROMANS had triumphed thrice before him: howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICA: the second time of EUROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by these three Triumphs, that he had triumphed in manner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time) as it is reported by them which compare his doings unto Alexander the Great) under foure and thirty yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare forty. O happy had it been for him, if he had died when he had Alexanders Fortune: for all his life afterwards, made his prosperity hateful, or his adversity miserable: impugning the honour and authority he had gotten by his valiantnesse, favouring mens unjust Causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honour, and unawares brought his greatnesse to nothing. For like as when the strongest places of a City, which receiving their Enemies into them, do give them the benefit of their owne strength: even so through Pompeys Power, Caesar growing to be great, overthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he employed to the overthrow of others. And thus it fortuneth: Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had uncourteously used him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to ROME. For the Senate did counsell and encourage him to deale in the Affaires of the State, seeing him waxe very slow, and given too much to his ease and pleasure, by reason of his great Wealth he had gotten. So when Pompey was come, he began to speake against him; and through the friendship and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and rejected. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driven to have recourse unto the Tribunes of the People, and to fall in friendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent and vilest person was Clodius, who received him, and made him a Prey unto the People. For he had Pompey ever at his elbow, and against his honour carried him up and down the Market-place after him, to speake as occasion served, to confirme any matter or device which he preferred unto him to flatter the common People. And further, for recompence of his good will, he craved of Pompey (not as a thing dishonourable, but beneficiall for him) that he would forsake Cicero, who was his Friend, and had done much for him in matters of Common-wealth. Pompey granted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in danger of Law, and requiring Pompeys friendship to helpe him, he shut his door against them that came to speake in his behalfe, and went out himselfe at another back door. Cicero thereupon fearing the extremity of Law, willingly forsooke ROME. At that time, Julius Caesar returning home from his Prætorship out of SPAIN, began to lay such a Plot, that presently brought him into great favour, and afterwards much increased his power, but otherwise utterly undid Pompey and the Common-wealth. Now he was to sue for his first Consulship, and considering the enmity betwixt Pompey and Crassus, if he joynd with the one, he made the other his Enemy: he devised to make them friends, a thing seeming of great honesty at the first sight, but yet a pestilent device, and as subtil a practise as could be. For the power of the City being before divided into two parts, (as a Ship evenly ballast of each side) maintained the Common-wealth upright; and being now brought into one mans power, there was no possibility to withstand it, so that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon Cato wisely told them afterwards, that said, the civill Warres betwixt Pompey and Caesar was cause of the destruction of the Common-wealth: that their enmity and discord was not the chiefe original cause of this misery, but rather their friendship and agreement. For by their friendship Caesar was choen Confull, who straight fell to flatter the People and poore men, and made a Law for the restoring of the Colonies belonging to ROME and for distributing of Lands to them that had none, imbasing the Majesty and Dignity of the chiefe Magistrates, and making the Confullship in a manner no better then the Tribuneship of the People. Bibulus his Colleague and fellow Confull, did what he could to resist him, and Cato also did aide him to his power, untill Caesar openly brought Pompey into the Pulpit for Orations before the People, and calling him by his Name, asked him if he did give his consent to the Decrees which he did set forth. Pompey answered him, he did. Why then, said Caesar, if any man will by force let the passing of this Law by Voices of the People, wilt thou then come to helpe them? Yes that I will indeed, said Pompey: against them that threaten with the Sword, I will bring both Sword and Target. Pompey in all his life never did not spake thing that men more miliked, then that which he said at that time. His Friends excused him, and said it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware: but his deeds afterwards shewed, that he was altogether at Caesars Commandement. For not many daies after, he married Julia the Daughter of Caesar, which was affianced or made sure before unto servilius Capius, when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Capius anger, he gave him his owne Daughter in marriage, whom he had also promised before unto Fanffus, the Sonne of Sylla: and Caesar also married Calpurnia the Daughter of Piso. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with Souldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Confull Bibulus came into the Market-place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they fuddainly set upon him, and brake the bundels of Rods which his Officers carried before him: and some one, whatsoever he was, cast a basket of horf-Dung upon his head. Moreover, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very fore hurt. By this meanes having cleared the Market-place of all their Enemies, they passed the Law for divison of Lands, as they would themselves. The People being fleshed with this bait, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would never stick at any matter that they would have passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was against: and they appointed unto Caesar also, the Government of the GAULES on this side and beyond the ALPES: and ILLYRIA for five yeares space, with four whole Legions. The next day following were appointed Consuls, Piso Caesars Father in law, and Gabinus the greatest flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things stood in these termes, Bibulus though he were Confull, kept himselfe close in his Houfe for eight Moneths space, and onely sent out Bils and set them up on every post in open places, accusing Pompey and Caesar. Cato on the other side, as if he had been inspired with the spirit of Prophecie, told openly in the Senate-Houle, what would become of the Common-wealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay still and took his pleasure, and would no more meddle in the Common-wealth. At that time it was that Pompey said, it was more unseasonable for an old man to follow his pleasure, then to attend matters of the Common-wealth. Yet himselfe shortly after was so doted of his young Wife, that he would follow her up and down in the Countrey, and in his Gardens, and leave all Affaires of weight aside. Whereupon Clodius being then Tribune of the People, dispised Pompey, and began to enter into seditious attempts. For when he had driven Cicero out of ROME and had sent away Cato to make Warres in CYPRUS, and that Caesar also was occupied in GAULE, and finding that the People in like case were at his Commandement, because to flatter them he did what they would have him: he attempted incontinently to undoe some thing that Pompey had established. Amongst other things, he took young Tigranes out of Prison, and ever carried him up and down with him wherefoever he went, and continually pickt quarrels unto Pompeys Friends, to try what credit he had. In the end Pompey coming abroad one day into the common Assembly, to hear how a matter of his was handled, this Clodius having a company of vagabonds and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be seen from the rest, began to aske these questions out aloud: Who is the licentious Captain in all this City? What man is he that seeks for a man? What is he that scratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a company of Dancers and Singers, when he spake and clapped his hands on his Gown, answered him straight aloud to every question, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys heart, that was not wont to hear himselfe so ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any such kinde of fight: but yet it made him bite the lippe more, when he saw the Senate glad to see him thus aflamed and reproved, as a just revenge and punishment for his vile betraying and forfaking of Cicero. So great stirre and uproare being made upon this in the Market-place, and many men sore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken also in the preffe of the People with a Sword in his hand, very neare unto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwise fearing Clodius insolvency and proud words) he would never after come into the Market-place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home still, consulting with his Friends what way he should take to appease the anger of the Senate against him. Thereupon one of his Friends called Culeo, perswaded him to put away his Wife Julia, and utterly to refuse Caesars friendship, and to sticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithstanding he was contented to hearken unto them that gave him counsell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall Enemy, and in great favour with the Senate. Thereupon he brought Cicero Brother into the Market-place, to move the matter to the People, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and divers were slaine of either side: notwithstanding,

he overcame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by Decree of the People, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in favour with the Senate, and standing with the Law propounded to give Pompey Authority to cause Corne to be brought to ROME, he once againe made him have power both by Land and Sea over all the Territories of the ROMANS. For all the Havens, Martts, and Faires, and all Store-houses of Corne, yea moreover all the Trade of Merchandize and Tillage, came under Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accusing him, said: that the Senate had not made this Law for the dearth of Victuals, but that they made a dearth of Victuals, because the Law should passe, to revive Pompeys Power and Authority againe, that was almost under foot. Other say, that this was a device of Lentulus Spinther the Confull, who gave Pompey the greater Authority, because he might be sent to put King Ptolomy againe into his Kingdome. This notwithstanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred another Law to send Pompey without an Army, with two Sergeants onely to carry the Axes before him, to bring Ptolomie in favour againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This Law seemed not to milike Pompey: but the Senate with honest colour put by this Law, as being afraid lest Pompeys person would miscarry in so doing. Nevertheless, little Papers were found throwne about the Market-place, and the Senate-house, declaring that Ptolomie desired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers stead. Timagenes writeth notwithstanding, that Ptolomie went to ROME, and left EGYPT, without any occasion given him, at the perswasion of Theophanes, who perswaded him to doe so, because he would give Pompey occasion to make new Warres. But Theophanes craft and subtilty made not this matter so credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether untrue: for his ambition was nothing so vile or ill, as that was. So Pompey having now full Authority to cause Corne to be brought to ROME, he sent then his Lieutenants and Friends abroad, and himselfe in person went into CYCLIS. Now being ready to returne againe, there arose such a storme of winde in the Sea, that the Mariners were in doubt to weigh their Anchors. But himselfe first imbarked, and commanded them straight to hoise saile, crying out aloud, It is of necessity I must goe, but not to live. So, through his boldnesse and good spirit, using the good Fortune he had, he filled all the places of Mart, and Markets with Corne, and all the Sea besides with Ships: insomuch, the plenty he brought did not onely furnish the City of ROME, but all their neighbours also about them, and came like a lively Spring that disperfed it selfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great Conquests that Caesar made in GAULE, did set him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in Warres farre from ROME, with the BELGIANS, SVVISSES, and English-men, he by secret practise, was in the midst among the People at ROME, and most against Pompey in the weightiest Affaires of the Common-wealth. For he had the power of an Army about his Person, which he did harden with paines and continuall practise, not with intent to fight onely against the barbarous People: but for the Battels he had with them, were in manner but as a hunting sport, by the which he made himselfe invincible, and dreadful to the World. But furthermore, by the infinite Gold and Silver, and the incredible spoiles and Treasure which he wan upon the Enemies whom he had overcome: and by sending great Presents also to ROME, to the Aediles, Prators, Consuls, and their Wives, he purchased him many Friends. Therefore, after he had passed over the ALPES againe, and was come to winter in the City of LUCIA, a world of People (both men and Women) and of the Senate themselves almost two hundred Persons (and amongst them, Crassus and Pompey by Name) went out of ROME unto him. Furthermore, there were seen at Caesars Gate, sixscore Sergeants carrying Axes before Prators, or Proconsuls. So Caesar sent every one backe againe, either full of Money, or good words: but with Pompey and Crassus, he made a match, that they two together, should sue to be Consuls, and that he himselfe would lend them good aide to ROME, at the day of Election, to give their Voices. And if they were chosen, that they should then practise by Decree of the People, to have the Governments of some new Provinces and Armies assigned them: and withall, that they should adorne the Government of those Provinces he had, for five yeares more. This pack being bewrayed and spread abroad through ROME, the honestest sort misliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open Assembly of the People, did aske them both, if they would sue for the Consullship at the next Election. So, they being urged by the People to make answer, Pompey spake first, and said: Peradventure he would, peradventure not. Crassus answered more gently, that he would do that which should be best for the Common wealth. Then Marcellinus sharply inveying against Pompey, he angrily againe cast him in the teeth, and said, that Marcellinus was the rankest churle, and the unthankfullest beast in the world: for that of a dumb man, he had made him Eloquent, and being in manner starved and famished, many a time he had filled his belly. This notwithstanding, divers that before were determined to sue for the Consullship, went no further in it, saying Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counselled and incouraged not to give it over: for, said he, thou dost not contend for the Consullship, but to defend the common liberty of thy Countrey against two Tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Cato a Faction, lest that having all the Senates good wils, he should draw also the best part of the People after him, thought it not good to suffer Domitius to come into the Market-place. To this end therefore, he sent men armed against him, who at the first onset, slew the Torch-bearer that carried the Torch before him, and made all the rest to flie: amongst whom also Cato was the last man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey and Crassus being become Consuls after this sort, they ordered themselves nothing the more temperately, nor honestly. For first of all, the People being about to chuse Cato Prator, Pompey being at the Assembly of the Election, perceiving that they would chuse him, brake up the Assembly, falsely alledging that he had noted certaine ill signes; and afterwards, the Tribes of the People being bribed and corrupted with Money, they chose Antius and Vatinus Prætors. After that, by Trebonius Tribune of the People, they published Edicts, authorising Cæsar charge for five yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæsar. Unto Crassus also they had appointed SYRIA, and the Warre against the PARTHIANS. Unto Pompey in like case, all AFRICK, and both SPAINES, with four Legions besides: of the which, at Cæsar's desire, he lent him two Legions to helpe him in his Warre in GAULE. These things done, Crassus departed to his Province, at the going out of his Consulship: and Pompey remained at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly Playes to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for Learning and Musicke, and caused wilde Beasts also to be baited and hunted, and killed five hundred Lions. But of all things, there was no such fearfull sight and terrible Fight, as was between the Elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to shew the People pastime and pleasures, made him again to be very much esteemed of, and beloved amongst the People. But on the other side, he wan himselfe as much ill will and envy, in committing the Government of his Provinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whilest he himselfe roamed up and down the pleasant places of ITALY, with his Wife at his pleasure: either because he was far in love with her, or else for that she loved him so dearly, that he could not finde in his heart to leave her company. It was reported of her (being knowne of many) that this young Lady Julia loved her Husband more dearly, not for Pompey's flourishing age, but for his assured continence, knowing no other Woman but her: besides also, he was no solemne man, but pleasant of conversation, which made Women love him marvellously, unless we will reprove the Curtisan Flora's Testimony. It is certaine, that at an Election of the Ædiles, men rising suddenly in hurly burly, drew their Swords, and many were slain about Pompey: inasmuch as his clothes being bloudied, he sent his men home in haste to fetch him other to change him. His young Wife that was great with childe, seeing his clothes bloudy, took such a fright upon it, that she fell down in a swoon before them, that they had much ado to recover her; and yet she fell straight in labour upon it, and was delivered. So that they themselves, which blamed him most for his good will he bare unto Cæsar, could not reprove the love he bare unto his Wife. Another time after that, he was great with childe again, whereof she died, and the Childe lived not many daies after the Mother. As Pompey was about to carry her into the Countrey to be buried, to a House he had there near unto the City of ALBA, the People by force took her Corps, and carried it into the Field of MARS, more for the pity they took of the young Lady, then to pleasure either Cæsar or Pompey: and yet what the People did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæsar's sake being absent, then for Pompey that was present. But straight when his alliance was broken, which rather covered then bridled their ambitious desire to rule, there arose a new stirre in ROME immediatly, and every mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and seditious words. Not long after that also came newes that Crassus was overthrown, and slain in PARTHIA: who was a manifest stay and let to keepe them two from civil Wars, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themselves in a reasonable sort together. But when Fortune had taken away this third Champion, who could have withstood the better of them both that had overcome the other, then might have been said of these two which remained, as the Comickall Poet said:

*See how these Champions purposing each others force to try,
With nointed skin, and dusty hands, stand vanishing valiantly.*

So little can Fortune prevaile against nature, having no power to stop covetousnesse: sith so large and great an Empire, and such a wide Countrey besides could not containe the covetous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read:

*Among the gods themselves all things by Lot divided are,
And none of them intrudes himselfe within his neighbours share.*

Yet they thought that the Empire of ROME was not enough for them, which were but two. But Pompey spake openly in an Oration he made unto the People, that he ever came to Office before he looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would have done: and that he witnessed by discharging his Army so soone. Then thinking that Cæsar would not discharge his Army, he sought to make himselfe strong against him, by procuring Offices of the City, without any other alteration. Neither would he seeme to mistrust him, but he plainly shewed that he did despise and contemne him. But when he saw that he could not obtaine the Offices of the City as he would, because Citizens that made the Elections were bribed with Money, he then left it without a Magistrate, so that there was none either to command, or that the People should obey. Hereupon there ranne a brute straight, that there must needs be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius Tribune of the People, who perswaded them to chuse Pompey. But Cato stucke so stoutly against it, that the Tribune had like to have lost his Office, even in the Market-place. But then many of Pompey's Friends stepped up, and excused him, saying: that he neither fought, nor would have the Dictatorship. Then Cato commended him much, and prayed him to see good order kept in the Common-wealth. Pompey being ashamed to deny so reasonable a request, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Consuls were chosen, Domitius and Messala: but afterwards when the state began to change againe by the death of one of the Consuls, and that divers were more earnestly bent to have a Dictator then before, Cato fearing it would breake out with fury, determined to give Pompey some Office of reasonable Authority, to keepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Inasmuch, as Bibulus himselfe being chiefe of the Senate, and Pompey's Enemy, my, was the first that moved Pompey might be chosen Consul alone: for, said he, by this means, either the Commonwealth shall be rid of the present trouble: or else it shall be in bondage to an honest man. This opinion was marvelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato standing up, it was thought straight that he would have spoken against him: but silence being made him, he plainly told them, that for his own part he would not have been the first man to have propounded that was spoken: but sithence it was spoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meet to be followed. And therefore, said he, it is better to have an Officer to command, whatsoever he be, rather then none: and that he saw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, in so troublesome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen sole Consul, and that if he saw in his discretion he should need the assistance of another companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were past. Thus was Pompey made Consul alone by Sulpicius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made very friendly countenance unto Cato, and thanked him for the honour he had done him, praying him privately to assist him with his counsel in the Consulship. Cato answered him, that there was no cause why he should thank him, for he had spoken nothing for his sake, but for respect of the Commonwealth onely: and for his counsel, if he would aske it, he should privately have it, if not, yet that he would openly say that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the City, married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late widow of Publius Crassus the sonne, that was slaine in PARTHIA, to whom she was married a maiden. This Lady had excellent gifts to be beloved besides her beauty: for she was properly learned, could play well on a Harpe, was skilfull in musick and Geometry, and tooke great pleasure also in Philosophy, and not vainly without some profit. For she was very modest and sober of behaviour, without bawling and foolish curiosity, which commonly young women have that are induced with such singular gifts. Her father also, was a noble man, both in blood and life. Notwithstanding, these unlike marriages did nothing please some: for Cornelia was young enough to have been his sons wife. Now the best Citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the Commonwealth, being in such a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedy to redresse the same: and that he in the mean time gave himselfe over to marrying and feasting, where rather he should have been careful of his Consulship, which was disposed upon him against the law for common calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had been quiet. Furthermore, he sharply proceeded against them which by bribery and unlawful meanes came to office: and having made laws and ordinances for the administration of justice, otherwise he dealt justly and uprightly in all things, giving safety, order silence and gravity, to matters of judgement, with force of Armes, himselfe being present: saying that when his father in law was also accused among other, he sent for three hundred and threescore Judges home to his house, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuser law Scipio accompanied by the Judges themselves, returning into the Market-place, he let fall his suit. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he having made a law, that no man should praise the offenders, whilest their matter was a hearing, came himselfe and openly praised Plancus being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Judges, stopped his ears with both his hands, saying: that he might not hear an offender praised, seeing it was forbidden by law. But therefore he was refused for a Judge, before they gave sentence. Notwithstanding, Plancus was condemned by all the rest of the Judges, to Pompey's great shame and reproach. Shortly after, Hypseus one that had been Consul, being likewise accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bath to go to supper, upon his knees he besought Pompey's favour and helpe: but he flatly passed by him, and gave him no other answer, but told him, he married his supper and said nothing else to him. This inconstancy was much reprovred in Pompey. Howbeit otherwise he fer all things in good order, and chose his father in law Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Consulship, for the five last moneths. After that, he caused the government of his Provinces to be appointed him for foure yeare more, with commission to take yearly out of the treasure a thousand talents to defray the charges of his warre. Cæsar's friends seeing that, stepped up for him, and prayed that there might also be had some consideration of him, that had likewise great warres for the Empire of ROME: saying, that his good service deserved, either that they should make him Consul againe, or else that they should prolong his charge and government, so as he may yet peaceably enjoy the honour to command that which he had conquered, to the end that no other successeur might reape the fruit of his labour. Much stirre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for good will he meant to excuse the envy they might have borne Cæsar, said: that he had received letters from him, by the which he requested a successeur, and to be discharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they should grant him priviledge to demand the second Consulship, although he were absent. Which Cato stoutly withstood, saying, that he must returne home as a private man, leaving his Army, should come in person to crave recompence of his Country. But because Pompey made no reply nor answer to the contrary, men suspected straight that he had no great good liking of Cæsar, and the rather, because he had sent unto him for the two legions which he had lent him, under colour of his war against the PARTHIANS. But Cæsar though he smelt him wherefore he sent for his souldiers, returned them home with liberal reward. About that time, Pompey fell sicke at NAPLES of a dangerous disease, whereof notwithstanding he recovered again. The NEAPOLITANS thereupon, by perswasion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefe men of their City, did sacrifice to the gods for his recovery. The like did

also their neighbours round about : and in fine, it ran so generally through all ITALY, that there was no City or Town (great or small) but made open feasts and rejoycing for many dayes together. Besides, the infinite number of people was such, that went to meet him out of all parts, that there was not place enough for them all, but the high wayes, Cities, Townes, and ports of the sea, were all full of people, feasting and sacrificing to the gods, rejoycing for his recovery. Divers also went to meet him, crowned with Garlands, and so did attend on him, casting Nofegaies and flowers upon him. Thus was his journey the noblest sight that ever was, all the way as he came : howbeit men thought also, that this was the chiefest cause of the beginning of the civill warres. For he fell into such a pride, and glorious conceit of himself, with the exceeding joy he took to see himself thus honoured : that forgetting his orderly government, which made all his former doings to prosper, he grew too bold in despising of Cesar's power, as though he stood in no need of other power to care or withstand him, but that he could overcome him as he would, far more easily, then he could have done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAULE, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent unto Cesar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giving out many foule words against Cesar. For he said, that Pompey knew not his own strength and authority, that would seek to make himselfe strong, by other power against him : considering that he might overcome him with his own legions he should bring with him, so soon as they saw but Pompey in the face, such ill will did Cesar's own souldiers bear him, and were marvellous desirous besides to see himselfe. These flattering tales so puffed up Pompey, and brought him into such a security and trust of himselfe, that he mocked them to scorne which were afraid of warres. And to those also which said, that if Cesar came to ROME, they saw not how they could resist his power, he smilingly answered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that : for as oft, said he, as I do but stampe with my foote upon the ground of ITALY, I shall bring men enough out of every corner, both footemen and horsemen. In the mean time, Cesar gathered force still upon him, and therefore drew nearer unto ITALY, and sent of his souldiers daily to ROME to be present at the election of the Magistrates, and many of them that were in Office, he wanne with money : amongst whom, was Paul, one of the Consuls, whom he wanne of his side, by meanes of a thousand five hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he discharged of an infinite debt he ought : and Marke Antony also, who for Curio's sake, was discharged likewise for part of the debt which Curio ought, being also bound as himselfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Capitaine or Centurion sent from Cesar, being near unto the Senate, understanding that the Councell would not prolong Cesar's government which he required, clapping his hand upon the pommel of his sword : Well said he, this shall give it him. So, to be short, all that was done and said, tended to this end. Notwithstanding, the petitions and requests that Curio made in Cesar's behalfe, seemed somewhat more reasonable for the people : for he requested one of the two, either to make Pompey to put down his Army, or else to licence Cesar to have his Army as well as he. For, either being both made private men, they would fall to agreement of themselves : or else being both of like strength, neither of both would seek any alteration, fearing one another, but would content themselves either of them with their own. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other, should double his power whom he feared. Thereto very shortly replied the Consul Marcellus, calling Cesar theefe, and said that he should be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not disperse his Army. This notwithstanding, in fine, Curio, Antony, and Piso procured that the Senate should decide the matter. For, said he, all those that would have Cesar leave his Army, and Pompey to keepe his, let them stand on the one side. Thereupon the most part of them stood at one hand. Then he bad them againe come away from them that would have them both leave their Armies. Then there remained onely but two and twenty that stood for Pompey : and all the rest went on Curio's side. Then Curio looking aloft for joy of the victory, went into the Market-place, and there was received of his Tribune faction, with shouts of joy and clapping of hands, and infinite Nofegaies and Garlands of flowers thrown upon him. Pompey was not then present to see the Senators goodwill towards him : because by the law, such as have commandement over souldiers, cannot enter into ROME. Notwithstanding Marcellus standing up, and said : that he would not stand trifling, hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that ten legions were already passed over the Alpes, intending to come in Armes against them : and that he would not send a man unto them, that should defend their Country well enough. Straight they changed apparell at ROME, as their manner was in a common calamitie. Marcellus then coming through the Market-place unto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went unto him, and told him openly : Pompey I command thee helpe thy Country with that Army thou hast already, and also to leavy more to aide thee. The like speech did Lentulus use unto him who was appointed one of the Consuls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leavy souldiers in ROME to bill them, some would not obey him, a few others went willingly to him with heavy hearts, and the most part of them cried, Peace, peace. Antony also, against the Senates mind, read a letter unto the people sent from Cesar containing certaine offers and reasonable requests, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his request was that Pompey and he should both of them resigne their governments, and should dismisse their Armies to make all well, referring themselves wholly to the judgement of the people, and to deliver up account unto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Consulship, did not assemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CICELY, practised to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cesar should leave GAULE, and all the rest of his his Army, reserving onely two legions and the government of ILLYRIA, attending his second Consulship. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cesar's friends were contented to grant that he should have but one of his legions. But Lentulus spake against it, and Cato cried out on the other side also, that Pompey was deceived, and they both, So all Treaty of peace was cut off. In the mean time, news came to ROME that Cesar had won ARIMINUM, a fair great City of ITALY, and that he came directly to ROME with a great power. But that was not true : for he came but with three thousand horse, and five thousand footmen, and would not tarry for the rest of his Army that was yet on the other side of the mountains in GAULE, but made haste rather to surpris his enemies upon the sudden, being afraid and in garboile, not looking for him so soon : rather then to give them timeto be provided and to fight with them when they were ready. For when he was come to the River side of Rubicon (which was the utmost confine of the Province he had in charge towards ITALY) he stayed suddenly, weighing with himself the great enterprise he took in hand. At the last, as men that being of a marvellous height from the ground, do headlong throw themselves down, closing up their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of the danger : crying out these words onely unto them that were by, in the Greeke tongue, ἀντιστοχὸν κίβητο : in English, let Die be cast (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our Proverbe, to set all on fix and seven) he passed over with his Army. Now, the news of his coming being carried to ROME, they were in such a marvellous fear, as the like Cesar's laying : Let the die be cast. For all the Senate ran immediately unto Pompey, and all the other Magistrates of the City fled unto him also. Tullius asking Pompey what power he had to resist them, he answered him, faulting somewhat in his speech : that he had two legions ready which Cesar sent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leaved in halte, he should make up the number of thirty thousand fighting men. Then Tullius cried out openly : Ah, thou hast mocked us Pompey : and thereupon gave order they should send Ambassadors unto Cesar. There was one Phaonius in the company, who otherwise was no ill man, saying that he was somewhat too bold, thinking to counterfeit Cato's plain manner of speech : he bad Pompey then stampe his foote upon the ground, and make those souldiers come which he had promised them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him also, what he had prophesied before hand of Cesar, he answered him againe : Indeed thou hast prophesied more truly then I, but I have dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they should make him Lieutenant Generall of ROME with full and absolute power to command all, saying : that the selfe same men which do the greatest mischief, know best also how to remedy the same. So he immediately departed into SICILY, having the charge and government of that Country : and also every one of the other Senators went unto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in Armes, no man knew what was best to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts : and those on the other side that were within ROME, went out as fast, and forsooke the City in his trouble and disorder. That which might serve being willing to obey, was found very weak : and that that on the other side which by disobedience did hurt, was too strong and ill to be governed by the Magistrates, having law to command. For there was no possibility to pacifie their fear, neither would they suffer Pompey to order things as he would : but every man followed his own fancy, even as he found himselfe grieved, afraid, or in doubt, and in one day they were in divers minds. Pompey could hear nothing of certainty of his enemies. For some one while would bring him news one way, and then againe another way : and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he saw the tumult and confusion so great at ROME, as there were was no mean to pacifie it : he commanded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behind, that he would take them for Cesar's friends, and so at night departed out of the City. Then the two Consuls fled also, without doing any sacrifice to the gods, as they were wont to do before they went to make any wars. So Pompey, even in his greatest trouble and most danger, might think himselfe happy to have every mans goodwill as he had. For, though diverse misliked the cause of this war, yet no man hated the Capitaine : but there were moe found that could not forsake Pompey for the love they bare him, then were there that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cesar came to ROME, who possessing the City, spake very gently unto all them he found there, and pacified their fear : saying that he threatened Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, because he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the Common-wealth. Unto that cruell threat, he added a more bitter speech also, saying : that it was not so hard a thing for him to do it, as to speak it. Thus having put down Metellus, and taken that he needed to serve his turn, he took upon him to follow Pompey, thinking to drive him out of ITALY, before that his Army he had in SPAIN should come to him. Pompey in the mean time, having taken the City of BRUNDISIUM, and gotten some ships together : he made the two Consuls presently imbarke with thirty Ensignes of footmen, which he sent beyond the sea before unto DYRRACHIUM. And incontinently after that, he sent his father in law Scipio, and Cniscus Pompey his son, into SYRIA, to provide him ships. Himself on the other side, fortified the rampiers of the City, and placed the lightest souldiers he had upon the walls, and commanded the BRUNDISIANS not to stir out of their houses : and further, he cast trenches within the City, at the end of the streets in divers places, and filled those trenches with sharpe pointed stakes, saving two streets onely, which went into the haven. Then the third day after, having imbarked all the rest of his souldiers at his pleasure, he suddenly lifting up a signe into the aire, to give them warning which he had left to guard the rampiers : they straight ranne to Pompey forthwith speed, and quickly received them into his ships, he weighed Anchor, and hoised saile. Cesar kept Italy.

perceiving the wals naked outward, he straight mistrusted that Pompey was fled: who hasting after him had almost run upon the sharpe stakes, and falln into the trenches, had not the BRUNDISIANS given him warning of them. So he stayed, and ran not overthwart the City, but fetched a compasse about to go to the haven: where he found that all the ships were under sail, two ships only excepted, upon the which were left a few souldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the best stratagemes of warre that ever he used. Notwithstanding, Caesar marvelled much, that he being in a strong City, and looking for his Army to come out of SPAIN, and being master of the sea besides, that he would ever forsake ITALIE. Cicero also reproved him, for that he rather followed Themistocles counsell, then Pericles: considering that the troublesome time was rather to be likened unto Pericles, then Themistocles time. Yea Caesar himself shewed, that he was afraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeys friends, he sent him unto Pompey at BRUNDISIUM, to offer him reasonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, and sailed away with him. By this meanes, Caesar in threecore dayes being Lord of all ITALY without any bloodshed: he was very desirous to follow with speed after Pompey. But because he had no ships ready, he let him go, and halted towards SPAIN, to joyne Pompeys Army there unto his. Now Pompey in the mean space, and gotten a marvellous great power together both by sea and by land. His Army by sea was wonderful. For he had five hundred good ships of warre, and of Gallies, Foists, and Pinnaces, an infinite number. By land, he had all the flower of the horsemen of ROME, and of ITALY, to the number of seven thousand horse, all rich men of great houses, and valiant mindes. But his footmen, they were men of all sorts, and raw souldiers untrained, whom Pompey continually exercised, lying at the City of BEROEA, not sitting idly, but taking paines, as if he had been in the prime of his youth. Which was to great purpose to incourage others seeing Pompey being eight and fifty years old, fight on foot armed at all peeces, and then on horsebacke, quickly to draw out his sword while his horse was in his full career, and easily to put it up againe, and to throw his dart from him, not onely with such agility to hit point blanke, but also with strength to cast it such a way from him, that few young men could do the like. Thither came diverse Kings, Princes, and great Lords of Countries, and yielded themselves unto him: and of ROMANE Captaines that had borne office, he had of them about him, the number of a whole Senate. Amongst them came unto him Labienus also, who before was Caesars friend, and had alwayes been with him in his wars in GAULE. There came unto him also, Brutus the son of that Brutus which was slaine in GAULE, a valiant man, and which had never spoken unto Pompey untill that day, because he took him for a murderer of his father: but then willingly followed him as a defender of the liberty of ROME. Cicero himself also, though he had both written and given counsell to the contrary, thought it a shame to him not to be amongst the number of them that would hazard their lives for defence of their Country. There came unto him also Tadius Sextus even into MACEDON, notwithstanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pompey saw him, he rose and went to meet him, judging it a good token of their good wills unto him, when such old men as he, chose rather to be with him in danger, then at home with safety. Hereupon they sate in counsell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they should put no Citizen of ROME to death but in battell, and should sack no City that was subject to the Empire of ROME, the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the wars, either because they dwelt far off, or else for that they were so poor, as otherwise they were not regarded: did yet both indeed and word favour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemy both to the gods and men, that wished not Pompey victory. Caesar also shewed himself very merciful and courteous, where he overcame. For when he had won all Pompeys Army that was in SPAIN, he suffered the Captaines that were taken to go at liberty, and onely reserved the souldiers. Then coming over the Alpes againe, he passed through all ITALY, and came to the City of BRUNDISIUM in the Winter quarter: and there passing over the sea, he went unto the City of ORICUM, and landed there. Now Caesar having Vibius, one of Pompeys familiar friends with him, whom he had taken prisoner: he sent him unto Pompey, to pray again that they might meet, and both of them disperse their Armies within three dayes, and being reconciled (giving their faith one to another) so to recurre into ITALIE like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that these were new devises to intrap him. Thereupon he suddenly went down to the sea, and tooke all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his Campe in, and all the ports, creekes, and harbours for ships to lie in rode: so that what wind soever blew on the sky, it served his turne, to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Caesar on the other side was so distressed both by sea and by land, that he was driven to procure battell, and to assault Pompey even in his owne Forts; to make him come to fight with him: of whom most times he ever had the better in all skirmishes; saving once, when he was in danger to have lost all his Army. For Pompey had valiantly repulsed his men, and made them flee, and had slaine two thousand of them in the field: but he durst not enter pell mell with them into their Campe, as they fled. Whereupon Caesar said to his friends, that his enemy had won the victory that day, if he had knowne how to overcome. This victory put Pompeys men in such courage, that they would needs hazard battell. And Pompey himselfe also, though he wrote letters unto strange Kings, Captaines, and Cities of his confederacy, as if he had already wonne all: was yet afraid to fight another battell, thinking it better by tract of time, and distress of victuals, to overcome him. For Caesars men being old and expert souldiers, and wont ever to have the victory when they fought together: he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kind of way, to be driven to often removing of their Campe from place to place, and still to

to fortifie and intrench themselves, and therefore that they would rather put it to adventure out of hand, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his friends to be quiet, and not to stirre, perceiving that after this last bickering, Caesar being scantied with victuals raised his Campe, and departed thence to go into THESSALY, through the Country of the ATTICENSIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Caesar is fled: let us follow him. And others, let us return home again into ITALY. And others also sent their friends and servants before to ROME, to hire them houses neare the Market-place: intending when they came thither to sue for Offices in the Common-wealth. Some there were also that in a jollity would needs take ship, and saile into the Isle of LESBOS, unto CORNELIA (whom Pompey had left thither) to carry her that good newes, that the war was ended. Thereupon assembling the Councell, Africanius thought it best to winne ITALY, for that was the chiefeest marke to be shot at in this warre: for whosoever obtained that, had straight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAIN, and GAULE at commandment. Furthermore, that it was a dishonour to Pompey (which in reason should touch him above all things) to suffer their Country to be in such cruell bondage and subjection unto slaves and flatters of Tyrants, offering it self as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honourable for him, once againe to flee from Caesar, and to make him follow him, his fortune had given him opportunity to have Caesar in chafe: nor lawful also before the gods, to forsake his father in law Scipio, and many other also that had been Consuls, dispersed abroad in GREECE and THESSALIE, which should immediately fall into Caesars hands, with all their riches and Armies they had. Furthermore, he said, that they had care enough for the City of ROME, which drew the warres farthest off from them: so as, they remaining safe and quiet at home (neither hearing nor feeling the misery of warres) might in the end peaceably receive and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to followe Caesar, being determined not to give him battell, but to besiege him, and onely to compasse him in still being neare unto him, and so to cut him off from victuals. There was also another reason that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech given out among the ROMANE Knights, that so soon as ever they had overcome Caesar, they must also bring Pompey to be a private man againe. Some say therefore, that Pompey would never afterwards imploy Cato in any great matters of weight in all this warre: for when he followed Caesar, he left him to keep his carriage by the sea side, fearing that so soon as Caesar were once overcome, he would make him straight also resigne his authority. Pompey following Caesar in this manner faire and softly, they cried out upon him, that he made no warre with Caesar, but against his Country and the Senate, because he might be still in authority: and that he would never leave to have them for his servants and guard about him, which should rule and command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Aenobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and King of Kings: made him much to be envied. Phoenius also mocked him as much as the other, that spake most boldst: for he went crying up and down, My masters, I give you warning, you are like to eat no THUSCULAN figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius also, he that had lost the Army which he had in SPAIN, and was also suspected for a traytor, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I marvel, said he, that they which accuse me, do not lustily go to finde him out, whom they call the Marchant and common buyer of Provinces, to fight with him presently? With these and many such other lewd speeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not deny his friends any thing) to follow their vaine hope and desires, and to forsake his own wise determination: the which thing, no good ship-master, and much lesse a chiefe and soveraigne Captaine over so many Nations and so great Armies, should have suffered and consented unto. Now, he that did alwayes commend the Phisitians, that would not follow the fond desire of the sicke patients: was himselfe contented to obey the worst part of his Army, fearing their displeasure, where their life or health stood in hazard. For who would thinke or judge them to be wise men, and in their wits, who walking up and downe their Campe, did already sue to be Consuls and Prætors? considering that Spinther, Domitius, and Scipio, were at strife together, making friends to be high Bishop (which office Caesar had) as if they should have fought with Tigranes King of ARMENIA, or with the King of the NABATHIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Caesar and his Army: who had taken a thousand Townes by assault, had subdued above three hundred severall Nations, and had wonne infinite battells of the GERMANES and GAULES, and was never overcome, he had also taken a Million of men prisoners, and had likewise slaine so many at diverse battells. All this notwithstanding, they of Pompeys side still being importunate of him, and troubling him in this sort in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a counsell. There Labienus, Generall of the horsemen standing up, sware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flee. The like oath all the rest did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honour him, made a marvellous great clapping of their hands: and that he himselfe did set forth the Temple of VENUS the Conquerour with many spoiles. This vision partly put him in good courage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraid, because Caesars family was descended from this goddesse VENUS, that his dreame did signifie, that he should have the honour of the victory, with the spoiles he should winne of him. Besides all this, there were sudden and fearfull noises heard in his Campe, without any apparent cause, that waked all the Campe upon it. there was scene a marvellous great light over Cæsars Campe, and they were all at rest, which flamed like a burning torch, and fell into Pompey's Campe. The which Cæsar himselfe said he saw, when he went to visite the watch. At the breake of the day, Cæsar being determined to raise his Campe, and to go to the City of SCOTUSA, as his souldiers were busie about overthrowing of their Tents, and sending away their baggage and baggage before: there came Scouts unto him, that brought him word they saw a great deale of Armour and weapon carried too, and fro in their enemies Campe, and heard a noise and bustling besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After these came in other Scouts, that brought word also that their Voward was already set in battell ray. Then Cæsar said, that the day was now come they had longed for so fore, and that they should now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gave order presently that they should put out the red Coate of Armes upon his Tent, which was the signe the ROMANES used to shew that they would fight. The souldiers seeing that out, left their carriage and Tents, and with great shouts of joy ranne to Arme themselves. The Captaines of every band also bestowed every man in such place as he should fight, and so they conveyed themselves into battell ray, without any tumult or disorder, as quietly, as if they should have entered into a dance. Pompey himself led the right Wing of his Army against Antony. The middle of the battell he gave unto Scipio his Father in law being right against Domitius Calvinus. The left Wing also was led by Lucius Domitius Enobarbus, the which was guarded with men of Armes, all the horsemen were placed on that side, to distresse Cæsar if they could, that was directly against them: and to overthrow the tenth Legion that was so much accounted of, being the valiantest souldiers the enemy had in all his Army, among the which Cæsar did ever use to fight in person. Cæsar then seeing the left Wing of his enemies so strong with the guard of the horsemen, and being afraid of the brightness of their Armour: brought forward six Ensignes for supply, which he placed hard behind the tenth Legion, commanding them that no man should stirre, least their enemies should discover them. And furthermore, when the horsemen of the enemies should come to give charge upon them, that then they should runne with speed on the one side of the foremost Ranks, and not to throw their darts farre from them, as the valiantest souldiers are wont to do, to come to the sword the sooner: but to throw them upwards in their enemies eyes and faces. For, said he, these brave fellows and fine dancers, will never abide to have their faces marred. And this was Cæsars device at that time. Pompey being on horsebacke, rode up and down to consider the ordinance of both battells: and perceiving that his enemies stood still in their ranks, looking for the signall of battell, and that his own battell on the other side waved up and down disorderly, as men unskillfull in warres: he was afraid they would flie before they were charged. Thereupon he straightly commanded them in the Voward, that they should steadily keep their ranks, and standing close together should so defend themselves, receiving the charge of the enemy. But Cæsar disliked of that device, for thereby, said he, the force of their blowes was lessened, and in withholding them from giving the charge, he not onely tooke away that courage which the assaillant carrieth with him coming with fury: but made them more- over faint-hearted, in receiving the charge of the enemies. In Cæsars Army, there were about two and twenty thousand fighting men: and in Pompey's Army, somewhat above twice as many. Now, when the word of battell was given of either side, and that the Trumpets did sound the alarme: every man began to looke to himselfe. But a few of the chiefe of the ROMANES, and certaine GRECIANS that were there also out of the set battell, perceiving the imminent danger, began to berinke them: to what passe the ambition and wilfull contention between these two men, had brought the State of ROME. For the weapons of kinsmen, the bands of brethren, the Ensignes all alike, the flower of so many valiant men of one City, did serve for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prick forward with covetousnesse, is quite blind and without reason. For if they could have beene contented quietly to have governed that which they had conquered: the greatest and best part of the world, both by sea and by land was subject unto them. Or otherwise, if they could not have quenched their unfeatable desire of victory and triumph, they had occasion of warre enough offered them against the PARTHIANS and GERMANES. Furthermore they had enough to do besides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and wichall, they had had an honest colour to have cloaked their ambitious desires, if it had been but to have brought the barbarous people to a civill life. For what horsemen of SCYTHIA, or ARROWES of PARTHIA, or riches of INDIANS, could have abidden the power of threescore and ten thousand ROMANE souldiers, and specially being led by two famous Captaines, as Pompey, and Cæsar? whose names, these strange and farre Nations under stood long before the name of the ROMANES: so great were their victories, having conquered so many wild and barbarous people. They both being then in Armes the one against the other, not regarding their honour which made them so ambitious: did not spare their owne Country, who had untill that time remained invincible, both in fame and prowess. For, the alliance that was made between them, the love of Julia, and marrying with her, was suspected from the beginning to be but a deceit, and a pledge as it were of a conspiracy made between them, for a private benefit, more then for any true friendship. Now when the fields of PHARSALIA were covered over with men, with horse and armour, and that the signall of battell was given on either side: the first man of Cæsars Army that advanced forward to give charge, was Caius Crassinius, Captain of sixscore and five men, to perform a great promise which he had made unto Cæsar. For Cæsar, when he came out of his Tent in the morning, seeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the successe of this battell? Crassinius holding out his right hand unto him, coura-courageously cried: Oh Cæsar, thine is the victory, and this day thou shalt commend me either alive or dead. Then remembering these words, he brake out of the ranks, and many following after him ran amongst the midst of his enemies. Straight they came to the sword and made great slaughter. But he pressing forward still, one with a thrust ran him through the mouth, that the words point came through at his necke. Thereupon Crassinius being slaine, the battell was equal: Pompey did not make his left Wing march over suddenly, but stayed, and cast his eyes abroad to see what his horsemen would do, the which had already divided their companies, meaning to compass in Cæsar, and to make the small number of horsemen which he had before him, to give backe upon the squadron of his footmen. On the other side, as soon as Cæsar had given the signall of battell, his horsemen retired backe a little, and the six Ensignes which he had placed secretly behind them, being three thousand fighting men, ran suddenly to assaile the enemy upon the flanke, and when they came neare unto the horsemen, they threw the points of their darts upwards according to Cæsars commandment, and hit the young gentlemen full in their faces. They being utterly unskillfull to fight, and least of all looking for such manner of fight: had not the hearts to defend themselves, not to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, and clapping their hands on their faces, shamefully fled. They being overthrown, Cæsars men made no account to follow them, but went and gave charge upon the battell of footmen in that place specially where they had no guard of horsemen, whereby they might easilier be compassed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flanke, and in the Voward also by the tenth Legion, perceiving themselves (contrary to their expectation) compassed about by their enemies, where they thought to have environed them: they could make no longer resistance. They also being likewise driven to flie, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, and conjectured the flying of his horsemen: what mind he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went straight into his Campe, and spake never a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verses to this effect:

But mighty Jove who sits aloft in Ivory Chariot high, Strake Ajax with so great a fear, that Ajax by and by Let fall his Leatherne Target, made of tough Oxe hide seven fold, And ran away, not looking backe, for all he was so bold.

In this estate Pompey entred into his Tent, and fate down there a great while, and spake never a word: untill such time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his Campe. And then, he said no more, but, What, even into our Campe? and so rising up, he put a Gowne on his backe even fit for his misfortune, and secretly stole out of the Campe. The other Legions also fled: and great slaughter was made of the Tent keepers, and their servants that guarded the Campe. For Asinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæsars side) that there were slaine onely but six thousand souldiers. Howbeit at the taking of this Campe, Cæsars souldiers then found plainly the madnesse and vanity of Pompey's men. For, all their Tents and pavilions were full of Nosesgays and Garlands of Mirtle, and their Couches all covered with Flowers: their tables full of bowles of Wine, and men prepared ready to do sacrifice for joy, rather then to arme themselves to fight. Thus went they to battell, carried away with this vaine and foolish hope. When Pompey was gone a little way from his Campe, he forsook his horse, having a very few with him: and perceiving that no man pursued him, he went on foot fair and softly, his headfull of such thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might have, who for foure and thirty years space together, was wont continually to carry victory away, and began then even in his last caite, to prove what it was to flie, and to be overcome: and who thought then with himself, how in one hours space he had lost the honour and riches which he had gotten in so many foughten fields and battels, horsemen, and of such a great Fleet of Ships on the sea, and then to go as he did in such poor estate, and with so small a train, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the City of LARISSA, and coming to the valley of Tempe: there being a thirst, he fell down on his belly and dranke of the River. Then rising up again, he went his way thence and came to the sea side, and took a fishers cottage where he lay all night. The next morning by break of the day, he went into a little boat upon the River, and took the free men with him that were about him: and as for the slaves, he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to go to Cæsar, and not to be afraid. Thus rowing up and down the shore side, in this little boat, he spied a great ship of burden in the maine sea, riding at Anchor, which was ready to weigh Anchor, and to saile away. The master of the ship was a ROMANE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he saw Pompey speak unto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in poverty and in misery. So, he had told this dream unto the Mariners which sailed with him (as men commonly use to do, specially when they dreame of such weighty matters, and being at leisure wichall) and at the very instant, there was one of the Mariners that told him, he saw a little boate on the River rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shooke their cloakes at them, and held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing up, knew Pompey straight, even in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commanded his Mariners to let downe his boate, and gave his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he received him into his ship, and all those he would have with him, and then hoisted saile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceived King Deiotarus coming from the River to them, that beckened and made signes to receive him: which they did. At supper time, the master of the ship, made ready such meate as he had aboard. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of himselfe: ran unto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwards continued still to waite upon him, and to do such service about him, as servants do to their masters, even to washing of his feet, and making ready of his supper. When a simple man saw him, that could no skill of service, he said:

Pompey passing then by the City of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Isle of LESBOS, to go fetch his wife Cornelia and his son being then in the City of MITYLENE. There having cast out his Anchor, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shoar, and sent him unto the City to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was still in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought unto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the City of DYRRACHIUM. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the heart so much as to salute her, but letting her understand rather by his teares then words, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, the must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one ship onely, and none of his own but borrowed. The young Ladie hearing these newes, fell down in a fount before him, and neither spake nor stirred of long time: but after she was come to her selfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, the went with speed through the City unto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, took her in his armes, and embraced her. But she sinking under him, fell down and said: Out alas, wo worth my hard fortune, not thine (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poor ship, who before thou marriedst thy unfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to sail these seas with five hundred ships. Alas, why art thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leave me to cursed fate and my wicked destiny: fith "my selfe is cause of all this thy evil? Alas, how happy a woman had I been, if I had been dead before I "heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS "slew? And how wise a woman had I been, if (according to my determination) I had killed my "selfe immediately after him: where now I live to bring yet this misfortune unto Pompey the Great? It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this manner.

Pompeys great error, and *Cae-

"Peradventure, Cornelia mine, thou hast known a better fortune, which hath also deceived thee, be"cause the hath continued longer with me then her manner is. But since we are born men, we must "patiently bare these troubles, and prove fortune againe. For it is no impossible matter for us again "to come into prosperity out of this present misery, as to fall out of late prosperity into present calamity. When Cornelia heard him say so, she sent back into the City for her stuffe and family. The MITYLENIANS also came openly to salute Pompey, and prayed him to come into the City, and not to refresh himself: but Pompey would not, and gave them counsel to obey the Conqueror, and not to fear any thing, for Cesar was a just man, and of a courteous nature. Then Pompey turning Cratippus the Philosopher, who came among the Citizens also to see him: made his complaint unto unto him, and reasoning a little with him about divine providence. Cratippus courteously yielded unto him, putting him still in better hope, fearing lest he would have growne too hote and troublesome, if he should have holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might have asked him, what providence of the gods there had been in his doings? And Cratippus might have answered him, that for the ill government of the Commonwealth at ROME, it was of necessity that it should fall into the hands of a soveraigne Prince. Peradventure Cratippus might then have asked him: how and whereby Pompey wouldst thou make us believe, if thou hadst overcome Cesar, that thou wouldst have used thy good fortune better then he? But for divine matters, refer them to the gods as it pleaseth them.
Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoisted saile, and landed no where, but compelled to take fresh acates and water. The first City he came unto, was ATTALIA in the Country of PAMPHY-LIA. Thither came to him certaine Gallies out of CILICIA, and many souldiers also, inso much he had threecore Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then understanding that his Army by sea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his souldiers after the overthrow, whom he had transported with him into AFRICKA: he lamented, and complained unto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, and not suffered him to helpe himselfe with his other force wherein he was the stronger: and that he kept not still neare unto his Army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet presently have repaired to his power ready by sea, to have resisted his enemy. To confesse a truth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all his war, neither did Cesar put forth a better device, then to make his enemy fight farre from his Army by sea.
Thus Pompey being driven to attempt somewhat according to his small ability, he sent Ambassadors unto the Cities. To others, he went himselfe in person also to require money, wherewith he manned and armed some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the suddaine approach of his enemy, left he should prevent him before he could put any reasonable force in readines for to resist him: he bethought himself what place he might best retire unto for his most safety. When he had considered of it, he thought that there was never a Province of the ROMANS that could save and defend them.
And for other strange Realmes, he thought PARTHA above all other, was the best place to receive them into at that present (having so small power as they had) and that it was best able to helpe and aide them. Other of his counsell were of minde to go into AFRICKA, unto King Juba. But Theophanes

Theophanes LESEIAN said, he thought it a great folly, to leave EGYPT which was but three daies sailing from thence, and King Ptolemy (being but lately come to mans state, and bound unto Pompey for the late friendship and favour his father found of him) and to go put himself into the hands of the PARTHIANS, the vilest and unfaithfullest Nation in the word, and not to prove modesty of a RO-MANE, that had been his father in law, whose prosperity if he could have endured, he would have been the chieftest man: and now to put himself to Arfaces good will, who could not away with Crassus when he lived. Further, he thought it an ill part also, for him to go carry his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for them to use what villany and insolency they list to any. For, admit she have not the villany offered her by them: yet is it an unadecent thing, to think she might have been dishonoured they having her in their power, to do it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this onely that turned Pompey unto Euphrates. For it seemeth that Pompey: counsell, and not his fortune made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into EGYPT, he departed out of CYPRUS in a Gally of SELEUCIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his train imbarked also, some into Gallies, and others into Merchants ships of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without danger. When Pompey heard news that King Ptolemy was in the City of PELUSIUM with his Army, making war against his sister: he went thither, and sent a messenger before unto the King, to advertise him of his arrivall, and to intreat him to receive him. King Ptolemy was then but a young man, inso much as one Porcinus governed all, the whole Realm under him.
He assembled a Councell of the chieftest and wisest men of his Court, who had such credit and authority as it pleased him to give them. They being assembled, he commanded every man in the Kings name to say his mind touching the receiving of Pompey, whether the King should receive him or not. It was a miserable thing to see Porcinus an Eunuch of the Kings, and Theodorus of CHIO, and hired schoolmaster to teach the young King Rhetoricke, and Achillas EGYPTIAN to consult among themselves what they should do with Pompey the Great. These were the chieftest counsellors of all his Eunuchs, and of those that had brought him up. Now did Pompey ride at Anchor upon the shore side, expecting the resolution of his councell: in the which the opinions of other were divers, for some would not have received him: other would that he should be received. But the Rhetorician Theodorus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, said he, if we receive him, we shall have Cesar our enemy, and Pompey our Lord: and if we do deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame us for refusing of him, and Cesar for not keeping of him. Therefore this should be the resolution, to fend to kill him: for thereby we should win the good will of the one, and not fear the displeasure of the other: and some say moreover, that he added this mocke withall: A dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselves, gave Achillas commission to do it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge aforetime under Pompey) and Salvius another Centurion also, with three or four souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys Gally, about whom were at that time the chieftest of his train, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in Princely shew and manner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing so few men come to them in a fither boate: they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, and counseled Pompey to returne backe, and to lanch againe into the sea, being out of the danger of the hurling of a dart. In the mean time, the fither boat drew near, and Septimius rose and saluted Pompey in the ROMAN tongue, by the name of Imperator, as much as soveraigne Captaine: and Achillas also spake to him in the Greek tongue, and bade him come into his boate, because that by the shore side, there was a great deal of mud and sand bankes, so that his Gally should have no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a far off divers of the Kings Gallies, which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shoare besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company would have altered their mindes, they could not have told how to have escaped: and furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had given the murthrer occasion to have executed his cruelty. So taking his leave of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end: he commanded two Centurions to go down before him in the EGYPTIANS boate, and Philip one of his slaves enfranchised, with another slave called Scynus. When Achillas reached out his hand to receive him into his boat, he turned him to his wife and son, and said these verses of Sophocles unto them:

The man that into Court comes free, Must there in state of bondage be.

These were the last words he spake unto his people, when he left his owne Gally and went into the EGYPTIANS boate. The land being a great way off from his Gally, when he saw never a man in the boate speake friendly unto him, beholding Septimius, he said unto him: Methinkes my friend I should know thee, for that thou hast served with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gave him no answer, nor shewed him any courtesie. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, tooke a little booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he meant to make unto King Ptolemy, and began to reade it. When they came neare the shoar, Cornelia with her servants and friends about her, stood up in her ship in great feare, to see what should become of Pompey. So she hoped well, when she saw many of the Kings people on the shoare, coming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receive and honour him. But even as Pompey tooke Philip his hand more easily, Septimius came first behind him and thrust him through with his sword. Next unto him also, Salvius and Achillas drew out their swords in like manner, Pompey then did no more but took up his Gowne with his hands and hid his face, and manly abid the wounds they gave him, onely sighing a little. Thus being nine and fifty years old, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at Anchor in their ships, when they saw him murdered, gave such a fearful cry, that it was heard to the shoar: then weighing up their Anchors with speed, they hoisted saile, and departed their way, having wind at will that blew a lusty gale, as soon as they had gotten to the main sea. The ÆGYPTIANS which prepared to row after them, when they saw they were past their reach, and unpossibile to be overtaken, they let them go. Then having striken off Pompeys head, they threw his body overboard, for a miserable spectacle to all those that were desirous to see him. Philip his enfranchised bondman remained ever by it, untill such time as the ÆGYPTIANS had seen it their bellies full. Then having washed his body with salt water, and wrapped it up in an old shirt of his, because he had no other shift to lay it in: he sought upon the sands, and found at length a peece of an old fisher boate, enough to serve to burne his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was busie gathering the broken peeces of this boate together, thither came unto him an old ROMAN, who in his youth had served under Pompey, and said unto him: O friend, what art thou that preparest the funerals of Pompey the Great? Philip answered, that he was a bondman of his enfranchised. Well, said he, thou shalt not have all this honour alone, I pray thee let me accompany thee in so devout a deed, that I may not altogether repent me to have dwelt so long in a strange Country, where I have abidden such misery and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may have this good hap, with mine hands to touch Pompeys body, and to helpe to bury the onely and most famous Captaine of the ROMANES. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had passed, coming out of CYPRUS, sailed by the shoar side, and perceived a fire made for funerals, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But straight fetching a great sigh, alas, said he, perhaps it is Pompey the Great. Then he landed a little, and was straight taken and slain. This was the end of Pompey the Great. Not long after, Caesar also came into ÆGYPT that was in great wars, where Pompeys head was presented unto him: but he turned his head aside and would not see it, and abhorred him that brought it as a detestable murder. Then taking his ring wherewith he sealed his letters, whereupon was graven a Lion holding a sword: he burst out a weeping. Achilles and Potinus he put to death. King Ptolemy himselfe also, being overthrown in battell by the River of Nilus, vanished away, and was never heard of after. Theodorus the Rhetorician escaped Caesars hands, and wandered up and down ÆGYPT in great misery, despised of every man. Afterwards Marcus Brutus (who slew Caesar) conquering ASIA, met with him by chance, and putting him to all the torments he could possibly devise, at the length slew him. The ashes of Pompeys body were afterwards brought unto his Wife Cornelia, who buried them in a Towne of hers by the City of ALBA.

TH

THE COMPARISON OF POMPEY with AGESILAUS.

Now that we have declared unto you the lives of Agesilaus and Pompey, let us compare their manners and conditions together, which are these. First, Pompey came to his honour and greatnesse by his integrity, and so advanced himself, and was a great aide unto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid those tyrants out of ITALY, who held it in bondage. But Agesilaus usurped the Kingdome of LACEDÆMON, against the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a bastard, whom his brother avowed to be his lawful son, and contemned besides the Oracle of the gods, which gave warning of a lame King. Furthermore, Pompey did honour Sylla while he lived, and when he was dead, gave his body honourable buriall in despite of Lepidus: and married his daughter unto Faustus the son of Sylla. Agesilaus contrarily did dishonour Lyfander upon light occasion: but Pompey had done no lesse for Sylla, then Sylla had done for him. Lyfander on the other side, had made Agesilaus King of LACEDÆMON, and Lieutenant Generall of all GREECE. Thirdly, the injuries that Pompey did unto the Commonwealth, were done of necessity to please Caesar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Agesilaus also, to satisfy his sons love, saved Sphodrias life that had deserved death, for the mischief he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly also took part with Phœbidas, not secretly, but openly, because he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did unto the ROMANES, either through ignorance, or to pleasure his friends: the same did Agesilaus unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, though anger and selfe-will, in renewing warre with the BOEOTIANS, upon a full peace concluded. If we shall reckon of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed: Pompeys fortune unto the ROMANES was unlooked for. But Agesilaus would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to avoide the lame Kingdome, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had been proved a bastard ten thousand times, yet had not the race of the Eurytomides failed, but they could have found another lawful King among them, that should have gone upright: had not Lyfander, favouring Agesilaus kept the true meaning of the Oracle from the LACEDÆMONIANS. On the other side againe for matters of government, there was never such an excellent device found out, as was done by Agesilaus, to help the fear and danger the LACEDÆMONIANS were in, for those that fled at the battell of LECTRES, when he counselled them to let the law sleep for that day. Neither can any man match Pompeys with the like, who, to shew his friends what power he was of, did break the laws which himselfe had made. For Agesilaus being driven of necessity to abolish the law, to save the life of his Citizens, found such a device that the Law was not hurtful to the Commonwealth, neither yet was put down for fear it should do hurt. I must needs commend this for a great vertue and civility in Agesilaus, who so soon as he received the Scytala (or scrowle of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his Country, and left the war of ASIA. He did not as Pompey, who made himselfe great to the benefit of the Commonwealth, and for the Commonwealths sake, did forsake such honour and so great authority, as never Captain before him, but Alexander the Great, had the like in those parts. But now to other matter. Touching their battells and exploits in wars, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great Armies that he led: Xenophon himselfe if he were alive, could not compare Agesilaus victories unto his: although for the singular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had liberty granted him, to write and speak of Agesilaus what he thought good. Methinks also, there was great difference betwixt Pompey and Agesilaus, in their equity and clemency towards their enemies. For, whilest Agesilaus went about to conquer the THEBES, and utterly to race and destroy the City of MESSINA, the one being an ancient City of his Country, and the other the capital City of BOEOTIA.

Pompeys fault to forsake
Rome.

A speial point of a skilfull Captain.

TIA: he had almost lost his own City of SPARTA, for at the least he lost the commandement and rule he had over the rest of GREECE. The other contrarily gave Cities unto pyrates to dwell in, which were willing to change their trade and manner of life: and when it was in his choice to leade Tigranes King of ARMENIA, in triumph at ROME, he chose rather to make him a confederate of the ROMANES, saying, that the preferred perpetuall honour before one dayes glory. But since it is reason we should give the first place and honour of the discipline of wars, unto a Captain of the greatest skill and experience in wars: the LACEDAMONIAN then leaveth the ROMANES far behind. For first of all Agesslaus never forsooke his City, though it was besieged with threecore and ten thousand men, and that there were very few within the same to defend it, the which also a little before had been overthrowen at the battell of LEUCTRES. And Pompey on the other side, hearing that Caesar with five thousand footmen only had taken a Town in ITALIE, fled from ROME in very great fear. And therein he cannot be excused of one of these two: either that he fled cowardly for so few men, or else that he had a false imagination of more. For he conveyed his wife and children away, but he left all the rest without defence and fled: where indeed he should either have overcome, valiantly fighting for defence of his Country, or else have received the conditions of peace which the conquerors should have offered him. For he was a Citizen and allied unto him. And he that thought it an untolerable thing, to prolong the tearm of his government, or to grant him a second Consulship: did now give him opportunity, suffering him to take the City of ROME, to say unto Metellus the Tribune and the rest, that they were all his prisoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefeft point of an excellent Captain, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth himself the stronger, and also to keep himself from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker: Agesslaus excelling in that, did ever keep himself invincible. Caesar also had great skill therein, to keep himself from danger being the weaker, and again could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his utter destruction by land, where he was the weaker: and by this means he made himself Lord of the treasure, victuals, and allo of the sea, which his enemies had in their hands without fighting. That which they alledge in his excuse, is that which most doth condemne him, specially for so great and skillful a Captain. For as it is likely enough, that a young Generall of an Army may easily be brought from his wife and safe counsel, with rumor and tumult of a few fearful men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonour for him if he did otherwise: yet were this no strange matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the Great, whose Campe the ROMANES called their Country, and his tent the Senate, and called all the Prators and Consuls that governed at ROME, rebels and traitors to the Common-wealth of ROME; who could excuse him (who was never seen commanded by other then himself, but had been alwayes chief Captain and General in any war he made, and ever had the upper hand) but that he was drawn on by the scoffes of Faonius and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endanger the whole Empire and liberty of ROME, only for fear they should call him King Agamemnon? Who, if he had so much regarded present infamy, he should have fought from the beginning for the defence of the City of ROME, and not to have taken example of Themistocles policy by flying, and afterwards to think it a shame as he did, to lye in THESSALIE a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharsalia for a Theater, or close Campe, of necessity to fight which of them should have the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to summon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must answer to his name, and come and fight, or else to loose the honour of the Crown unto another. But there were infinite other fields and Towns (and as a man would say the whole earth) which the commodity of his Army by sea gave him choice to conquer, if he would rather have followed the steps of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Agesslaus himself: who did patiently abide no lesse tumults within the City self of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to summon him to come out to fight for all the rest of his Country. And in EGYPT also, he did abide many false accusations against him, wherewith the King himself did burthen him, praying him alwayes to have a little patience. In fine, having followed the best counsell which he had determined with himself from the beginning, he saved the EGYPTIANS against their wills: and furthermore, he did not onely keep the City of SPARTA from so great a danger, but did also set up tokens of triumph in the same against the THEBANS, whereby he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the slaughter, and besides that, gave his Citizens occasion to obtain victory afterwards. Hereupon Agesslaus was highly praised of them, whose lives he had saved against their wills. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themselves through whom he had offended: yet some say, that he was deceived by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keep the most part of the money to himself which he had brought out of ASIA, did hasten and perswade Pompey to give battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had been, a worthy Capitaine should not so lightly have been brought into error, upon a false account to hazard himself to loose all. Thus may we see what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore, for their journeys into EGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with small honour, for moneys sake to serve the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make war with the GREEKES. Lastly, in that which we accuse the EGYPTIANS for Pompeys sake: for the like matter do they again accuse Agesslaus. For the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he trusted: and Agesslaus. For the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he trusted: and Agesslaus forsook them which trusted him, and went to his enemies, having brought aide to fight against them.

THE LIFE OF ALEXANDER the Great.

HAVING determined in this volume to write the Life of King Alexander, and of Julius Caesar, that overcame Pompey; and being to speake of many things, I will use none other Preface, but onely desire the Readers not to blame me though I do not declare all things at large, but briefly touch divers, chiefly in those, their noblest acts and most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intent is not to write Histories, but onely Lives. For the noblest deeds do not alwaies shew mens vertues and vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport, makes mens naturall dispositions and manners appeare more plaine, then the famous Battels wonne, wherein are slaine ten thousand men; or the great Armies, or Cities won by sieg, or assault. For like as Painters or drawers of Pictures, which make no account of other parts of the body, do take the resemblances of the face and favour of the countenance, in the which consisteth the judgement of their manners and disposition: even so they must give us leave to seeke out the signes and tokens of the minde onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you unto others to write the Wars, Battels, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was descended from Hercules by Cavanus, and that by his Mothers side, he came of the blood of the AEsacides by Neoptolemius. They say also, that King Philip his Father when he was a young man, fell in fancy with his Mother Olympias, which at that time also was a young Maiden, and an Orphan without Father or Mother, in the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both received into the mistery and fraternity of the Houle of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in marriage of her Brother Arrymbas, with whose consent they were married together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the Bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about in divers flames. King Philip her Husband also, shortly after he was married dreamed that he did seale his wives belly, and that the seale wherewith he sealed, left behind the print of a Lion. Certaine Wisards and Soothsayers told Philip, that this Dreame gave him warning to looke straight to his wife. But Aristander the LEMESIAN answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceived with childe; for that they do not seale a vessell that hath nothing in it: and that she was with childe with a boy, which should have a Lions heart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay asleep in her bed, there was seene a Serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefeft cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips love and kindnesse from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared some charme or enchantment, or else for that he thought himself unmeet for her company, supposing her to be beloved of some god. Some do also report this after another sort: as in this manner. That the women in those parts of long time, have beene commonly posselt with the spirit of Orpheus, and the divine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Cleodones, and Mimallones (as much, as war-like and fierce) and do many things like unto the women of EDONIA and THRACIA, dwelling about the Mountaine Emus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Treskevin signifieth in the Greeke Tongue, too superstitiously given to the Ceremonies would exercise practice also, and helpe his friends when they were sick: and made besides certaine remedies, and rules to live by: as appeareth by his Letters he wrote, that of his owne nature he was much given to his Booke, and desired to read much. He learned also the liads of Homer, of Aristotiles correction, which they call, the Iliads, the corrected, as having passed under the rule: and laid in every night under his beds head with his Dagger, calling it (as Ovidius writeth) the institution of Martiall Discipline. And when he was in the high Countreys of Asia, where he could not readily come by other Books, he wrote unto Harpalus to send them to him. Harpalus sent him the Histories of Philistus, with divers Tragedies of Eurypides, Sophocles, and Aeschylus: and certaine Hymnes of Telephus and Philostratus. Alexander did reverence Aristotle at the first, as his Father, and so he tearmed him: because from his naturall Father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to live. But afterwards he suspected him somewhat; yet he did him no hurt, neither was he so friendly to him as he had been: whereby men perceived that he did not beare him the good will he was wont to do. This notwithstanding, he left not that zeale and desire he had to the study of Philosophy, which he had learned from his youth, and still continued with him. For he shewed divers testimonies thereof. As the honour he did unto Anaxarchus the Philosophier: The fifty talents which he sent unto Demetrius, Dandamis, and Calanias of whom he made great account. When King Philip made Warre with the BRYZANTINES, Alexander being but sixteen years old, was left his Lieutenant in MACEDON, with the custody and charge of his great Scale: at what time also he subdued the MACEDONIANS which had rebelled against him; and having wonne their City by assault, he drave out the barbarous People, and made a Colony of it, of sundry Nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to say, the City of Alexander. He was with his Father at the Battell of CHERONEA against the GREECIANS, where it was reported, that it was he that gave charge first of all upon the holy Band of the THEBANS. Furthermore, there was an old Oke scene in my time, which the Countrey men commonly call Alexanders Oke, because his Tent or Pavilion was fastned to it: and not far from thence is the Charnell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were slaine at the Battell. For these causes, his Father Philip loved him very dearly, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander King, and himselfe their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fell out in his Court afterwards, by reason of Philips new marriages and loves, bred great quarrell and strife amongst the women: for the mischief of diffention and jealousie of women, doth separate the hearts of Kings one from another, whereof was chiefest cause, the sharpnesse of Olympias, who being a jealous woman, fretting and of a revenging minde, did incense Alexander against his Father: But the chiefest cause that provoked Alexander, was Attalus, at the Marriage of Cleopatra, whom Philip married a Maiden, falling in fancy with her when himselfe was past marriage. This was the matter, Attalus being Uncle unto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the Marriage, and being in his cups, he perswaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the Feast, to pray to the gods, that they might have a lawfull Heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to succede him in the Kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith, threw a Cup at his head, and said unto him: Why, Traytor, what art thou takinge for a Bastard? Philip seeing that, rose from the boord, and drew out his Sword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and Wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, said he to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to goe out of MACEDON into Asia, and stepping onely from one bed to another, ye see him laid along on the ground. After this great insolency, he tooke his Mother Olympias away with him, and carrying her into his Countrey of EPIROS, he left her there, and himselfe afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demetrius CORINTHIAN, a friend of King Philip, and very familiar with him, came to see him. Philip when he had courteously welcomed him; asked him how the GREECIANS did agree together. Truly, O King, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GREECIANS, when your owne Court is so full of quarrell and contention. These words nipped Philip in such sort, and caused him to know his fault, that through Demetrius means, whom he sent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come backe againe. Now when Pezodorus, a friend of CARIA (desiring for necessities sake, to enter in League and friendship with Philip) offered his eldest Daughter in marriage unto Aridaus King Philip Sonne, and had sent Aristocritus Ambassador into MACEDON for that purpose: the friends of Alexander and his Mother, began to inveigle him with new reports and suspitions, how Philip by his great Marriage would add to his uter undoing, and leave him his Heire in the Kingdome. Alexander being nettled therewith, sent one Thessalus a Player of Tragedies into CARIA to Pezodorus to perswade him to leave Aridaus, that was a Bastard and a Foole, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleased Pezodorus far better, to have Alexander his Son-in-law, then Aridaus. Philip understanding this, went himselfe into Alexanders chamber, taking Philotas with him (the Sonne of Pammeno) one of his familiars, and bitterly rooke up Alexander, telling him that he had a base minde, and was unworthy to be left his Heire after his death, if he would cast himselfe away, marrying the Daughter of a CARIAN, that was a Slave and Subject of a barbarous King. Thereupon he wrote Letters unto CORINTH, that they should send Thessalus bound unto him. And furthermore he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius and Ptolemy, his Sons companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, and placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, Pausanias sustaining villany by the counsell and commandement of Aridaus and Cleopatra, craying justice of Philip, and finding no amends he converted all his anger against him, and for his spite slew him himself. Of this murder most men accused Queene Olympias, who (as it is reported) alluring this young man, having just cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspicion of this murder. For some say that Pausanias after this villany was done him, complained unto Alexander, and told him how he had beene abused: who recited these Verses of Euripides to him, in the Tragedie of Medea, where she said in anger, that she would be revenged:

Both of the Bridegroome, and the Bride, And of the Father-in-law.

Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent search to be made, and all them to be severely punished that were of the conspiracy: and was angry also that his Mother Olympias had cruelly slaine Cleopatra. So he came to be King of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and found his Realme greatly envied and hated of dangerous Enemies, and every way full of danger. For the barbarous Nations that were neare Neighbours unto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of strangers, but desired to have their naturall Kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GREECE, which he had conquered by force of Armes: but having a little altered the Governments, had through his insolency left them all in great trouble, and ready to rebell, for that they had not long beene acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders Councell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should utterly forsake the affaires of GREECE, and not to follow them with extremity, but that he should seeke to winne the barbarous People by gentle means, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedie these new stirs. But he far otherwise determined to stablish his safety by courage and magnanimity: perswading himselfe, that if they saw him toope and yeeld at the beginning, how little soever it were, every one would be upon him. Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous People, invading them suddenly with his Army, by the River of DANUBY, where in a great Battell he overthrew Syrms King of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, having intelligence that the THEBANS were revolted, and that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his Army towards the Straight of Thermopolis, saying, that he would make Demosthenes the Oratour see (who in his Orations, whilst he was in ILLYRIA, and in the Countrey of the TRIBALLIANS, called him childe) that he was growne a stripling passing through THESSALY, and should finde him a man before the Walls of ATHENS. When he came with his Army unto the Gates of THEBES, he was willing to give them of the City occasion to repent them: and therefore onely demanded Phanias and Prothytes, authours of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by Trumpet, pardon and safety unto all them that would yeeld unto him. The THEBANS on the other side, demanded of him Philotas and Antipater, two of his chiefest servants, and made the Crier proclaime in the City, that all such as would defend the liberty of GREECE, should joyne with them. Then did Alexander leave the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make Warre with all cruelty. The THEBANS also fought with greater courage and desire then they were able, considering that their Enemies were many against one. And on the other side also, when the Garisof of the MACEDONIANS which were within the Castle of CADMEA, made a Salley upon them, and gave them Charge in the Reer-ward: then they being environed of all sides, were slaine in manner every one of them, their City taken, destroyed and razed even to the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the People of GREECE afraid by example of this great calamity and misery of the THEBANS, to the end none of them should dare from thenceforth once to rise against him. He would cloake this cruelty of his under the complaints of his Confederates, the PHOCIANS and PLATEIANS: who complaining to him of the injuries the THEBANS had offered, could not deny them justice. Notwithstanding, excepting the Priests, and the religious, and all such as were friends unto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the friends and kinred of the Poet Pindarus, and all those that had dissuaded them which were the Rebels, he sold all the rest of the City of THEBES for Slaves, which amounted to the number of thirty thousand persons, besides them that were slaine at the Battell, which were six thousand more. Now amongst the other miseries and calamities of the poore City of THEBES, there were certaine THRACIAN Souldiers, who having Spoiled and defaced the house of Timoclea, a vertuous Lady, and of noble parentage, they divided her Goods among them: and the Capitaine having ravished her by force, asked her, whether she had any where hidden any Gold or Silver. The Lady told him she had. Then leading him into her Garden, she brought him unto a Well, where she said she had cast all her Jewels and precious things, when she heard the City was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN stooped to looke into the Well: the standing behinde him, thrust hie in, and then threw stones enough on him, and so killed him. The Souldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and so carried her unto Alexander. When Alexander saw her countenance, and marked her gate, he supposed her at the first to be some great Lady, she followed the Souldiers with such a majesty and boldnesse. Alexander then asking her what she was: she answered, that she was the Sister of Theagenes, who fought a Battell with King Philip before the City of CHERONEA, where being Generall, he was slaine valiantly fighting for the defence of the liberty of GREECE. Alexander wondering at her noble answer and courageous deed, commanded no man should touch her nor her children, and so freely let her go whither she would. He made League also with the ATHENIANS, though they were very sory for their miserable fortune. For the day of the solemne Feasts of their Misteries being come, they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteously entertaining all those, that flying from THEBES came to them for succour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him, following therein the nature of Lions: or because that after so great an example of cruelty, he would shew a singular clemency againe: he did not onely pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to looke wisely to their doings, for their City one day should command all GREECE, if he chanced to die. Men report, that certainly he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt so cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke upon it, was cause that he afterwards shewed himselfe more mercifull unto divers others. Afterwards also he did blame the fury of Bacchus, who to be revenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the Table being drunke, and the MACE-DONIANS also to refuse him to go any further to conquer the INDIANS, which was an imperfection of his Enterprize, and a diminishing also of his Honour. Besides, there was never THEBAN afterwards, that had escaped the fury of his Victory, and did make any Petition to him, but he had his suite. Thus was the estate of THEBES as you have heard. Then the GRECIANS having afsembled a generall Councell of all the States of GREECE within the Straights of PELOPONNEsus, there it was determined that they would make Warre with the PERSIANS. Whereupon they chose Alexander General of all GREECE. Then divers men coming to visit Alexander, as well Philosophers, as Governours of States, to congratulate with him for his election, he looked that Diogenes Sinapien (who dwelt at CORINTH) would likewise come againe ere the rest had done: but when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the Suburbs of CORINTH, at a place called CRANUM, he went himselfe unto him, and found him laid all along in the Sun. When Diogenes saw so many coming towards him, he sat up a little, and looked full upon Alexander. Alexander courteously spake unto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea said he, that I do: that thou stand out of my Sunne a little. Alexander was so well pleased with this answer, and mar-velled so much at that great boldnesse of this man, to see how small account he made of him: that he came thither in the daies which they call unfortunate, on which daies no man used to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first unto the Nunne which pronounced the Oracles, to pray her to come unto him. But she refused to come, alleading the custome which forbade her to go. Thereupon Alexander went thither himselfe in person, and brought her out by force into the Temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs have his will, told him: My Sonne, for that I see, thou art invincible. Alexander hearing that, said, he desired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was even ready to go on with his Voyage, he had divers signes and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an Image of the Poet Orpheus made of Cyprus, in the City of LEBETHRES, in those daies did sweate marvellously. Many men fearing that signe, Aristander the Soothsayer bade Alexander be of good cheare, and hope well; for he should obtaine noble Victories that should never be forgotten, the which should make the Poets and Musicians sweate to write and sing them. Then, for his Army which he led with him, they told that do set downe the least number, say, that they were thirty thousand Footmen, and five thousand Horsemen: and they that say more, do write, foure and thirty thousand Footmen, and foure thousand Horsemen. Aristobolus writeth, that Alexander had no more but three score, and ten Talents to pay his Souldiers with: and Darius writeth, that he had no more Provision of Victuals, then for thirty daies onely. And Onesicritus saith moreover, that he did owe two hundred Talents. Now, notwithstanding that he began this Warre with so small ability to maintaine it, he would never take Ship before he understood the state of his friends, to know what ability they had to go with him, and before he had given unto some, Lands; and unto others, a Towne; and to others againe, the Custome of some Haven. Thus by his bounty, having in manner spent almost the Revenues of the Crowne of MACE-DON, Perdiccas asked him: My Lord, what will you keepe for your selfe? Hope, said he.

Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will also have some part, since we go with you: and so refused the Revenue which the King had given him for his Pension. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberality, or would aske him any thing, he gave them very frankly, and such liberality spent all the Revenue he had. With this desire and determination, he went on to the Straight of HELLES-PONT, and going to the City of ILIUM he did Sacrifice unto Diana, and made funerall effusions unto the demy-gods (to wit, unto the Princes which died in the Warre of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially unto Achilles, whose grave he anointed with oile, and ranne naked round about it with his familiars, according to the ancient custome of Funerals. Then he covered it with Nofegayes and Flowers, saying, that Achilles was happy, who while he lived had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent Herauld to sing his praise. When he had done, and went up and downe the City to see all the Monuments and notable things there, one asked him, if he would see Paris Harpe. He answered againe, he would very faine see Achilles Harpe, who played and sung upon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius King of PERSIA, having leaved a great Army, sent his Captaines and Lieutenants to barry Alexander at the River of GRANICUS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely barre to stop his entry into ASIA. Moreover, the Captaines of the Councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this River, and of the height of the banke on the other side, which was very high and steepe, and could not be wonne without fighting. And some said also that he should have speciall care of the ancient regard of the Moneth: because the Kings of MACE-DON did never use to put the Army into the Field in the Moneth of Dason, which is June. For that, said Alexander, we will remedy soone: let them call it the second Moneth, Artemisium, which is May. Furthermore,

thermore, Parmenio was of opinion, that he should not meddle the first day, because it was very late.
Alexander made answer againe, that HELES-PONT would blush for shame, if he were now afraid to passe over the River, since he had already come over an arme of the Sea. Thereupon he himselfe first entred the River with thirteene Guidons of Horsemen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of Arrows which the Enemies shot at him, as he was coming up the other banke, which was very high and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and Horse-men of the Enemies: which stayed to receive him in Battell-ray, thrusting his men downe into the River, which was very deepe, and ran so swift, that it almost carried them downe the streame: inso much that men thought him more rash then wise, to leade his men with such danger. This notwithstanding, he was so willfully bent, that he would needs over, and in the end with great ado recovered the other side, specially because the Earth slid away, by reason of the mud. So when he was over, he was driven to fight pell mell man to man, because his Enemies did set upon the first that were passed over, before they could put themselves into Battell-ray, with great cries, keeping their Horses very close together, and fought first with their Darts, and afterwards came to the Sword when their Darts were broken. Then man-ny of them set upon him alone, for he was easily to be knowne above the rest by his Shield, and the lunder part of his Helmet, about the which there hung from the one side to the other, a marvellous faire white Plume. Alexander had a blow with a Dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Rofaces and Spithridates, both two chiefe Captaines of the PERSIANS, setting upon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Rofaces, who was excellently armed, he gave him such a blow with his Lance, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his Sword. But so soone as they two had closed together, Spithridates coming at the one side of him, raised himselfe upon his stirrups, and gave Alexander with all his might such a blow on his head with a Battell-axe, that he cut the crest of his Helmet, and one of the sides of his Plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his Battell-axe touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting up his hand to strike Alexander againe, great Clitus preventing him, thrust him through with a Partisan; and at the very same instant, Rofaces fell dead from his Horse with a wound which Alexander gave him with his Sword. Now whilst the Horsemen fought with such fury, the Squadron of the Battell of the MACE-DONIANS Footmen had passed the River, and both the Battells began to march one against the other. The PERSIANS stucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight turned their backs and fled, saving the GRECIANS which tooke pay of King Darius: they drew together upon a Hill, and craved mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting upon them, more of will then discretion, had his Horse killed under him, being thrust through the flanke with a Sword. This was not Bucephalus, but another Horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurt at this Battell, were hurt amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were slaine at this first Battell, twenty thousand Footmen of these barbarous People, and two thousand five hundred Horsemen. On Alexanders side, Aristobolus writeth, that there were slaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelve of them were Footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantnesse, caused every one of their Images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRE-CIANS partakers of this Victory, he sent unto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their Targers, which he had wonne at the Battell; and generally upon all the other Spoiles he put this honourable Inscription, Alexander the Sonne of Philip, and the Grecians, excepting the Lacedemonians, have wonne this spoyle upon the barbarous Asians. As for Plate of Gold or Silver, also Purple Silkes, or other such precious things which he got among the PERSIANS, he sent them all unto his Mother, a few except. This first Victory of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous People in Alexanders behalfe, that the City selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe City of the Empire of the barbarous People, or at the least through all the Low-countries and Coasts upon the Sea, yeelded straight unto him, and the rest also, saving HALICARNASSUS and MILETUM, which did still resist him: howbeit at length he tooke them by force. When he had so conquered all thereabout, he stood in doubt afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometimes he had a marvellous desire, hotly to follow Darius wheresoever he were, and to venture all at a Battell. Another time again, he thought it better first to occupie himselfe in conquering these Low-countries, and to make himselfe strong with the Money and Riches he should finde among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the Countrey of LYDIA, neare unto the City XANTHUS, they say, there is a Spring that brake of it selfe, and overflowing the bankes about it, cast out a little Table of Copper from the bottome, upon the which were graven certaine Characters in old Letters, which said: that the Kingdome of the PERSIANS should be destroyed by the GRECIANS. This did farther so encourage Alexander, that he made haste to cleare all the Sea-coast, even as farre as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good successe he had, running along all the Coast of PAMPHILIA, gave divers Historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying: that it was one of the wonders of the World, that the fury of the Sea, which unto all other was extreme rough, and many times would swell over the tops of the high rocks upon the cliffes, fell calme unto him. And it appeareth, that Menander himselfe in a Comedy of his, doth witnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merrily he saith:

O great Alexander, how great is thy State?
For thou with thy selfe mayest thus justly debate:
If any man living I list for to call,
He cometh, and humbly before me doth fall.

And

The waves give me way, and the Sea becomes dry.*

Yet Alexander himselfe simply writeth in his Epistles (without any great wonder) that by Sea he passed a place called the Ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke Ship in the City of PHASELIDES. There he remained many daies: and when he saw the Image of Thodestes PHASELITAN, standing in the Market-place, he went in a Dance thither one evening after Supper, and cast Flowers and Garlands upon his Image, honouring the memory of the dead, though it seemed but in sport; for that he was his companion when he lived, by meanes of Aristotle and his Philosophy. After that he overcame also the PISIDIANS, who thought to have resisted him; and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the City of GORDIUS, which is said to be the ancient seat of King Midus, he saw the Chariot that is so much spoken of, which is bound with the barke of a Cornell-tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous People, that they believed it was a Prophecy: That whosoever could undo the band of that barke, was certainly ordained to be King of all the World. It is commonly reported, that Alexander proving to undo the band, and finding no ends to undo it by, they were so many-fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his Sword, and cut the knot in the midst: so that then many ends appeared. But Aristobolus writeth, that he had quickly undone the knot, by taking the bolt out of the Axe-tree, which holdeth the beame and body of the Chariot, and so severed them asunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS and CAPPADOCIANS; and understood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius Generall of his Army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination, to leade his Army into the high Countreys of ASIA. Then did King Darius himselfe come against Alexander, having leaved a great Power at SUS A, of six hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his Wifards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he saw all the Army of the MACEDONIANS on a fire, and Alexander serving of him in the self-same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the Chamber unto the late King his Predecessor: and that when he came into the Temple of Belus, he suddenly vanished from him. By this Dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did signifie unto him, that the MACEDONIANS should have noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all ASIA, even as King Darius had done, when he was but Aigandes unto the King: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, supposing it had beene for that he was afraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sicknesse he had, the which some say he got by extreme paines and travell, and others also, because he washed himselfe in the River Cydnus, which was cold as ice. Howsoever it came, there was none of the other Physicians that durst undertake to cure him, thinking his disease incurable, and no Medicines to prevaile that they could give him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIANS would lay it to their charge, if Alexander miscarried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, considering his Master was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his love and good will towards him, thought he should not do that became him, if he did not prove (seeing him in extremity and danger of life) the utmost remedies of Physick, what danger soever he put himselfe into: and therefore tooke upon him to minister unto Alexander, and perswaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the Warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a Letter from the Campe, advertising him, that he should beware of Philip his Physician, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches that he would give him with his Daughter in marriage, to kill his Master. Alexander when he had read this Letter, laid it under his beds head, and made none of his nearest familiars acquainted therewith. When the houre came that he should take his Medicine, Philip came into his Chamber with other of the Kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the Potion he should drinke. Alexander then gave him the Letter, and withall, cheerfully tooke the cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing, and worth the fight, how one reading the Letter, and the other drinking the Medicine both at one instant, they looked one upon another, howbeit not both with like cheerful countenance. For Alexander looked merrily upon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his Physician Philip and how much he loved him: and the Physician also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be so easily accused; and straight lift up his hands to Heaven, calling the gods to witness that he was innocent; and then came to Alexander's beds side, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to do as he would advise him. The Medicine beginning to worke, overcame the Disease, and drave for the time, all his naturall strength and powers to the lowest parts of his body: insomuch as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weaknesse, and almost swooning, that his pulse did scant beate, and his senses were well-near taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few daies recovered him againe. Now when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himselfe openly unto the MACEDONIANS: for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health, untill they had seene him. In King Darius Campe, there was one Amyntus a MACEDONIAN, and banisht out of his Countrey, who knew Alexander's disposition very well. He finding that Darius meant to meete with Alexander within the Straights and Valleys of the Mountaines, besought him to tarry rather where he was, being a plaine open Countrey round about him, considering that he had a great Host of men to fight with a few Enemies, and that it was most for his advantage to meete with him in the open Field. Darius answered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntus replied:

replied: For that O King, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you upon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way coming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntus could not turne Darius from making his Campe to march towards CILICIA. At the self-same time also, Alexander went towards SUS A to meete with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them missed the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this hap, and making haste to meete with his Enemy within the Straights. Darius also seeking to win Alexander, lodging from whence he came, and to bring his Army out of the Straights, began to finde the fault and error committed: for that he had shut himselfe up in the Straights (holden in on the one side with the Mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the River of Pindarus that ran between both) and that he was driven to disperse his Army into divers Companies, in a stony and ill-favoured Countrey, fit for horsetmen to travell, being on the contrary side a great advantage for his Enemies, which were excellent good Footmen; and but few in number. But now, as Fortune gave Alexander the Field as he would wish, to fight for his advantage, so could he tell excellently well how to let his men in Battell ray to win the Victory. For albeit that Alexander had the less number by many then his Enemy, yet he had such policy and cast with him, that he foresaw all, and would not be environed. For he did put out the right Wing of his Battell a great deale farther then he did his left Wing, and fighting himselfe in the left Wing in the foremost ranks, he made all the barbarous People flie that stood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a Sword. Chares writeth, that Darius flie did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding, Alexander himselfe writing of this Battell unto Antipater, saith, that indeed he was hurt on the thigh with a Sword: howbeit it put him to no danger: but he writeth not that Darius hurt him. Thus having wonne a famous Victory, and slaine above a hundred and ten thousand of his Enemies, he could not yet take Darius, because he fled, having still foure or five furlongs vantage before him: howbeit he took his Chariot of Battell wherein he fought, and his Bowe also. Then he returned from the chase, and found the MACEDONIANS sacking and spoiling all the rest of the Campe of the barbarous People, where there was infinite Riches (although they had left the most part of their Carriage behinde them in the City of DAMAS, to come lighter to the Battell) but yet reserved for himselfe all King Darius Tent, which was full of great number of Officers, of rich Moveables, and of Gold and Silver. So, when he was come to the Campe, putting off his Armour, he entred into the Bath and said: Come on, let us go and wash of the sweat of the Battell in Darius owne Bath. Nay, replied one of his familiars, in Darius Bath: for the Goods of the vanquished are rightly the Vanquishers. When he came into the Bath, and saw the Basins and Eures, the Boxes, and Vials for Perfumes, all of cleare gold, excellently wrought, all the Chambers perfumed passing sweetly, that it was like a Paradise, when going out of his Bath, and coming into his Tent, seeing it so stately and large, his heart was full of mirth, and he lay in such sumptuous sort, that it was wonderfull. The curbed him into his familiars, and said: This was a King indeed, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to go to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing unto him amongst other Ladies taken prisoner, King Darius Mother and his Wife, and two of his Daughters unmarried: who having lost their Chariot and Bowe, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themselves, thinking Darius had beene slaine. Alexander pawed a good while, and gave no answer, pitying more their misfortune, then rejoicing at his owne good hap. Then he presently sent one Leontius unto them, to let them understand that Darius was alive, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his Kingdome onely: and as for them, that they should have at his hands all that they had of Darius before. When he had his whole Kingdome in his hands. As these words pleased the captive Ladies, so the deedes that followed, made them still his clemency to be no lesse. For first, he suffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they would, even of them that had beene slaine in the Battell, and so take as much Silkes of the Spoiles, Jewels, and Ornaments, as they thought good to honour their funerals with: and also did lesse no part of their honour, nor of the number of their Officers and Servants, nor of any joy of their Estate which they had before, but did allow them also greater Pensions then they had before. But above all, the Princeliest grace, and most noble favour that Alexander shewed unto these captive Princesses, which had alwaies lived in honourable fame and civility, was this: That they never heard word, or so much as any suspicion that should make them to be dishonoured, or dishonoured: but were privately amongst themselves, unvisited or repaid unto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had beene in a Campe of their Enemies. But as if they had beene kept in some close Monastery: although Darius Wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly Prince, and that his Daughters likewise did resemble their Father and Mother. Alexander thinking it more Princely for a King, as I suppose, to conquer himselfe, then to overcome his Enemies, did neither touch them, nor any other Maide of Wife, before he married them, Darius onely excepted; who being left Memnon's Widow (Generall of King Darius by Sea) was taken by the City of DAMAS. She being excellently well-learned in the Greeke Tongue, and of good entertainment (being the Daughter of Artabazus, who came of a Kings Daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenio's procurement (as Aristobolus writeth) who invited him to embrace the company of so excellent a Woman, and passing faire besides. Furthermore, beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies beside which were Prisoners, what goodly faire Women they were, he spake it pleasantly, that the Ladies of PERSIA made mens eyes sore to behold them. Notwithstanding, preferring the beauty of his continency before their their sweet faire faces, he passed by without any sparke of affection towards them, more then if they had been Images of stone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his Lieutenant in the Low-countries upon the Sea-coast, wrote unto him on a time, that one Theodorus a Merchant of TARENTUM, had to sell two goodly young boyes, marvellous faire, and therefore that he sent unto him to know his pleasure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O my friends, what villany hath ever Philoxenus scene in me, that he should devise (having nothing to do there) to purchase me such infamy? whereupon he wrote unto him from the Campe, with reproachfull words, that he should send that vile TARENTINE Merchant Theodorus and his Merchandize to the Devill. He sharply punished also one Agus, that wrote unto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beauty bare the onely name in CORINTH) and bring him to him. Another time also, when he heard that Damon and Timosthen MACEDONIANS, under Parmenio's charge, had deflowered two of the Souldiers wives that were strangers, and waged of him, he wrote unto Parmenio to looke unto it, and to examine the matter: and if he found them guilty of the rape, that then he should put them both to death, as brute beasts borne to destroy mankind. And in that Letter he wrote thus of himselfe: For my selfe, said he, I have neither scene, nor desire to see Darius wife: neither have I suffered any speech of her beauty before me. Moreover he said, that he did understand that he was mortall by these two things: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weaknesse of our nature proceedeth sleepe, and sensuality. He was also no greedy-gut, but temperate in eating, as he shewed by many proofs: but chiefly in that he said unto the Princesse Ada, whom he adopted for his Mother, and made her Queen of CARIA. For when (for the love she bare him) she daily sent him sundry delicate dishes of Meats, Tarts, and Marchpaines, and besides the meate it selfe, the Pastlers and Cookes to make them, which were excellent workmen: he answered that he could not tell what to do with them, for he had better Cooks then those, appointed him by his Governour Leosidas, to wit: for his dinner, to rise before day, and to march by night: and for his supper, to eatte little at dinner. And my Governour, said he, would oftentimes open the chests where lay bedding and apparell lay, to see if my mother had put any fine knacks or conceits among them. Furthermore, he was lesse given to Wine, then men would have judged. For he was thought to be a greater lubber then he was, because he sate long at the boord, rather to talke then drinke. For ever when he drank he would propound some tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leisure. For having matters to do, there was neither Feast, Banquet, Play, Marriage, nor any pastime that could stay him: as they had done other Captaines. The which appeareth plainly by the shortnesse of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deeds he did in that little time he lived. When he had leisure, after he was up in the morning, first of all he would do Sacrifice to the gods, and then would go to dinner, pulling away all the rest of the day, in hunting, writing something, taking up some small matters, or else in studying. If he went any Journey of no halty business, he would exercise himselfe by the way as he went, shooting in his Bowe, or learning to get up or out of his Chair without any assistance. Oftentimes also for his pastime, he would hunt the Foxe, or catch Beasts, as appeareth in his Booke of Remembrances of every day. Then when he came to his Lodging, he would enter into his Bath, and rub and anoint himselfe: and would aske his Pantelers and Carvers, if his Supper were ready. He would ever suppe late, and was very curious to see, that every man at his boord were like served, and would sit long at the Table, because he ever loved to talke, as we have told you before. Otherwise he was as noble a Prince and gracious to waite upon, and as pleasant, as any King that ever was. For he lacked no grace nor comelinesse to adorne a Prince, from that he would be something over-busie in glorying of his owne deeds, much like unto a bragging Souldier: neither was he contented himselfe to please his owne humour that way, but would also make his familiars to scold him even to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would never praise him in his presence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durst say lesse of the praises which they gave him. For of the first they were affamed, and by the second they fell in danger. After Supper, he would wash himselfe againe, and sleepe untill noone the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For himselfe, he was nothing curious of dainty Dishes: for when any did send him rare Fruits, or Fish, from the Countreys neare the Sea side, he would send them abroad unto his friends, and seldom keepe any thing for himselfe. His Table notwithstanding was alwaies very honourably served, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his Conquests, till it came to the summe of ten thousand Drachmas a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceed that summe: and moreover commanded all men that would feast him, that they should not spend above that summe. After this Battell of Issus, he sent unto the City of DAMAS, to take all the Gold and Silver, the Carriage, and all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of Armes of the THESSALIANS sped them full well: for therefore did he send them thither, because he saw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the Battell: and so were the rest of his Army also well stored with Money. There the MACEDONIANS having tasted first of the Gold, Silver, Women, and barbarous life: as Dogs by scent do follow the track of Beasts, even so were they greedy to follow after the Goods of the PERSIANS. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the Sea-coast. Thither came the Kings of CYPRUS and PHOENICIA, and delivered up to him the whole Island, and all PHOENICIA, saving onely the City of TYRE. That City he besieged seven Moneths together by Land, with great Bulwarks and divers Engines of Battary, and by Sea, with two hundred Gallies. During this Siege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand unto him over the Walls of the City, and called him by his name: and there were divers TYRIANS

RIANS also that dreamed in like sort, that Apollo told them that he would go unto Alexander, because he was not pleased with their doings in the City. Thereupon they bound his Image (which was of a wonderfull bignesse) with great chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the bafe, as if he had been a Traytor that would have yielded himselfe unto their Enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as favouring Alexander. Alexander had there also another Dreame: for he dreamed he saw a Satyr as far off sporting with him, and when he thought to have come neare to have taken him, he still escaped from him: untill at the length, after he had run a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his hands. The Soothsayers being asked what this Dreame should signifie, answered probably, by dividing Satyrs into two, and then it is ad viciu, which signifieth, the City of TYRE shall be thine. And they do yet shew unto this day, the Fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the Satyr. Continuing this Siege, he went to make Warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell upon the Mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being cast away, onely because he heard his Tutor Lyfimachus that followed him, lay boastingly, that he was not inferiour, nor older then the Phoenix. For when they came at the foote of the Mountaine, they left their Horses, and went up on foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leave his Tutor Lyfimachus behinde him (who was so weary that he could go no farther) but because it was darke night, and for that the Enemies were not far from them, he came behinde to encourage his Tutor, and in manner to carry him. By this meanes unawares, he was far from his Army with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreover, it was very cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiving divers fires which the Enemies had made, some in one place, and some in another, trusting to his valiantnesse, having alwaies provided remedy in extremity, when the MACEDONIANS were distressed, himselfe ever putting to his owne hand, he ran unto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous People that lay by the fire side, he snatched away a fire-brand, and ran with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous People were so afraid, that they ran their way as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and set upon him, he slew them every man, and so lay there that night, himselfe and his men without danger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the Siege of TYRE, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most part of his Army to take rest, being over-harried and wearied with so many Battels as they had fought: and sent a few of his men onely to give assault unto the City, to keepe the TYRIANS occupied, that they should take no rest. One day the Soothsayer Aristander sacrificing unto the gods, having considered of the signes of the intrails of the Beasts, did assure them that were present, that the City should be taken by the latter end of the Moneth. Every body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very last day of the Moneth. Alexander seeing him amazed, as one that could not tell what to say to it, seeking ever to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothsayers did prognosticate, commanded them that they should not reckon that day the thirtieth day, but the seven and twentieth: and immediately upon it made the Trumpet sound the Alarum, and gave a hotter assault to the wall, then he had thought to have done before. They fought valiantly on both sides, inasmuch, as they that were left in the Campe, could not keepe in, but must needs run to the aid to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS seeing the assault so fore on every side, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes was the City taken the self-same day. Another time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe City of SYRIA, there fell a clod of Earth upon his shoulder, out of the which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Bird lighting upon one of the Engines of his Battary, was caught with the Nets made of sinews which covered over the ropes of the Engines, Aristander did prognosticate, that it signified he should be hurt in his shoulder, notwithstanding, that he should yet take the Towne. And indeede it came so to passe. When he sent great Presents of Spoyles which he wanne at the sacke of this City, unto his Mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and divers others of his friends: among other things he sent unto Leosidas his Governour, five hundred Talents weight of Frankincense, and a hundred Talents weight of Myrrhe: remembering the hope he put him into when he was a Childe. For, as Alexander was upon a day sacrificing unto the gods, he tooke both his hands full of Frankincense to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his Governour Leosidas saw him, he said thus unto him: When thou hast conquered the Countrey where these sweete things grow, then be liberall of thy Perfume: but now, spare that little thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote unto him in this sort: We do send thee plenty of Frankincense and Myrrhe, because thou shouldst no more be a niggard unto the gods. There was brought unto him a little Coffe also, which was thought to be the preciouslest thing, and the richest that was gotten of all the Spoyles and Riches, taken at the overthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some said one thing, some said another thing: but he said, he would put the Iliads of Homer into it, as the worthiest thing. This is confirmed by the best Historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report upon Heraclides words, be true, then it appeareth that he did profit himselfe much by Homer in this Journey. For it is reported, that when he had conquered EGYPT, he determined to build a great City, and to replenish it with a number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certaine ground, which he had chosen by the advice of his Engineers and Worke-masters, the night before he had a marvellous Dreame, that he saw an old man standing before him, full of white haire, with an honourable presence, and coming towards him, said these Verses:

Within

Within the foming Sea there lies a certaine Island, right Against the shore of Egypt, which of ancient Pharo's height.

I have.

As soone as he arose the next morning, he went to see this Isle of PHAROS, the which at that time was a little above the mouth of the River of Nilus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now joynd unto firme Land, being forced by mans hand. This he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the City which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great bar of earth, broad enough, that separateth a great Lake on the one side, and the Sea on the other, the which doth joyne hard to a great Haven. Then he said that Homer was wonderfull in all his things, but that amongst others, he was an excellent Architector: and commanded that straight they should cast the Platforme of the City, according to the situation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driven to take meale, and with that did marke out upon the earth being blacke the compasse of the Towne that was round and circular, and being divided into two equall parts, either of them resembled the skirts and fashion of the MACEDONIAN cloake. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there arose upon the sudden out of the River or Lake, such an infinite multitude of great Fowle of all sorts, that they covered the element as it had beene a cloud, and lightning within this circuit, did eat up all the meale, and left not a crum. Alexander liked not these signes. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayer bade him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should build a City there, so plentifull of all things, that he should maintaine all sorts of People. Then he commanded them, unto whom he had given the charge of the building, that they should go forward with their worke, and he himselfe in the meane time, tooke his journey to go visite the Temple of Jupiter Hammon. The journey was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two dangers above all the rest most speciall: the first, lacke of water, because they had to travell many daies journey through a great Desart: the second was, the danger of the rising of the South winde by the way, to blow the sand abroad, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there rose such a tempest in that Desart, that blew up whole hills of sand, which slew fifty thousand men of Cambyfes Army. Every man in Alexanders Traine did know these dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to dissuade Alexander from any thing which he had a desire unto. For, fortune favouring him in all his attempts, made him constant and resolute in his determinations: and his noble courage besides, made him invincible in all things he tooke in hand; inso much as he did not onely compell his Enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that Voyage, in stead of these former dangers spoken of, he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the gods, by the Oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certaine sort they have believed the Oracles that were written of him. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that fell from the Element, did keepe him from feare of the first danger, and did quench their thirst, and moistned the drynesse of the sand in such sort, that there came a sweete fresh aire from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the Guides to shew them the way: and that they wandred up and downe they could not tell where: there came Crows unto them that did guide them flying before them: flying fast when they were behind them follow them, and stayed for them when they were behinde. But Calisthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the Crows, they brought them againe into the right way, which had lost their way. Thus Alexander in the end, having passed through this Wildernesse, he came unto the Temple he sought for: where the Prophet or chiefe Priest saluted him from the god Hammon, as from his Father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murderers that had killed his Father, were left alive. The Priest answered him, and bade him take heede he did not blaspheme, for his Father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearsing that he had spoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conspired the death of Philip his Father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his Kingdome, if he would grant him to be King over all the World. The god answered him by the mouth of his Prophet, he should: and that the death of Philip was fully revenged. Then did Alexander offer great Presents unto the god, and gave Money large to the Priests, and Ministers of the Temple. This is that the most part of Writers do declare touching Alexanders demand, and the Oracles given him: Yet did Alexander himselfe write unto his Mother, that he had secret Oracles from the god, which he would onely impart unto her, at his returne into MACEDON. Others say also, that the Prophet meaning to flatter him in the Greeke Tongue to welcome him the better, would have said unto him, O Paidion, as much as deare Sonne: but that he tripped a little in his tongue, because the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter end, saying, O Paidios, to wit, O Sonne of Jupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumour straight among his men, that Jupiter had called him his Sonne. It is said also, that he heard Pfsammon the Philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when he said that god was King of all mortall men. For (quoth he) he that commandeth all things, must needs be god. But Alexanders selfe spake better, and like a Philosopher, when he saith that god generally was Father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the best sort for himselfe. To conclude, he shewed himselfe more arrogant unto the barbarous People, and made as though he certainly believed that he had beene begotten of some god: but unto the GREECIANS he spake more modestly of divine generation. For in a Letter he wrote unto the ATHENIANS touching the City of SAMOS, he said: I gave ye not that noble free City, but it was given you at that time by him whom they called my Lord and Father: meaning Philip. Afterwards also being stricken with an Arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My friends, said he, this blood which is spilt is mans blood, and not as Homer said,

And one day also in a marvellous great thunder, when every man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetorician being present, said unto him: O thou Sonne of Jupiter, wilt thou do as much? No, said he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldst have me: disdaining the service of Fish to my Board, because thou seest not Princes heads served in. And the report goeth also that Alexander upon a time sending a little Fish unto Hephestion, Anaxarchus should say as it were in mockery, that they which above others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, have either small pleasure in the world, or else as little as others have. By these proofs and reasons alleadged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of himselfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policy to keepe other men under obedience, by the opinion conceived of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into EGYPT, he made many Sacrifices, Feasts, and Processions in honour of the gods, sundry Dances, Tragedies, and such like pastimes goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the Setters forth of them, which strived every one to exceed the other. For the Kings of the CYPRIANS were the Setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they drew by Lot a Citizen of every Tribe of the People, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These Kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, King of SALAMINA, in CYPRUS: and Pasocrates, Lord of the City of SOLES. For it fell out to their Lot to furnish two of the excellentest Players, Pasocrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus: whom Alexander loved singularly well though he made no shew of it, untill that Athenodorus was declared Victour, by the Judges deputed to give sentence. For when he went from the Playes, he told them he did like the Judges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would have beene contented to have given the one halfe of his Realme, not to have seen Thessalus overcome. Athenodorus being condemned upon a time by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the Feasts of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were played, and a fine set on his head for his absence: he besought Alexander to write unto them in his behalfe, that they would release his Penalty. Alexander would not so do, but sent thither his Money whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his own Purse. Also when Lycos SCARPHIAN, an excellent Stage-player had pleased Alexander well, and did soitt in a Verse in his Comedy, containing a Petition of ten Talents: Alexander laughing at it, gave it him. Darius at that time wrote unto Alexander, and unto certaine of his friends also, to pray him to take ten thousand Talents for the ranfome of all those Prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the Countries, Lands and Signiories on this side the River of Euphrates, and one of his Daughters also in marriage, that from thenceforth he might be his Kinsfeman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his Councell. Amongst them Parmenio said unto him: If I were Alexander, quoth he, surely I would accept this offer. So would I indeed, quoth Alexander again, If I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote again unto Darius, that if he would submit himselfe, he would use him courteously: if not, that then he would presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when King Darius Wife was dead with child: for without dissimulation it grieved him much, that he had lost so noble an occasion to shew his courtesie and clemency. This notwithstanding, he gave her body honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongst the Eunuchs of the Queenes Chamber, there was one Tiresus taken prisoner, among the Women: who stealing out of Alexanders Camp, taking his horse back, rode unto Darius to bring him news of the death of his Wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O gods, what wretched hap have the PERSIANS! that have not onely had the Wife and Sister of their King taken prisoners even in his life time, but now that theis dead in travell of Child, she hath been deprived of princely buriall. Then spake the Eunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious King, and for all due honour that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queen Statira your Wife whilest she lived prisoner, nor your Mother, nor Daughters, want any part or jot of their honour they were wont to have before, saving only to see the light of your honour, the which, god Oromasdes grant to restore again (if it be his will) unto your Majesty: neither was there any honour wanting at her death (to set forth her stately Funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your Enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in Victory, as he is valiant in Battell. Darius hearing the Eunuchs words, being vexed in mind for very grief: took the Eunuch aside into the secretest place of his Tent, and said unto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, become a MACEDONIAN, but doest in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy soveraigne Lord and Master: I pray thee, and do also conjure thee, by the reverence thou bearest unto this bright light of the Sunne, and to the right hand of the King, that thou do tell me truly. Are these the least evils which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death? And did she not in her life make us more miserable by her dishonour, then if we had dishonourably fallen into the hands of a cruell Enemy? For, what honest communication I pray thee, can a young Victorious Prince have with his Enemies Wife a prisoner: having done her so much honour as he hath done? Darius going on with these speeches, Tiresus the Eunuch fell down on his knees, and besought him not to say so, neither to blemish the Vertue of Alexander in that sort, nor yet so to dishonour his Sister and Wife, deceased, and thereby also to deprive himselfe of the greatest comfort he could wish to have in his calamity, which was to be overcome by an Enemy that had greater Vertues then a man could possibly have: but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders Vertue, who had shewed himselfe chaster to the Ladies, then valiant against the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the

third Battell with Darius.

Eunuch confirmed the great honesty, chastity, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe Oathes. Then Darius coming out among his friends againe, holding up his hands unto the heavens, made his prayer unto the gods: "O heavenly gods, Creatours of men, and Protectors of Kings and Realmes: first, I beseech you grant me, that restoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good state, I may leave the Realme unto my Successors, with that glory and fame I received of my Predecessors: that obtaining Victory, I may use Alexander with that great Honour and courtesie, which he hath in my misery shewed unto those I loved best in the world. Or otherwise if the time appointed be come, that the Kingdome of PERSIA must needs have end, either through divine revenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: then good gods yet grant, that none but Alexander after me, may sit in Cyrus Throne. Divers Writers doe agree, that these things came even thus to passe. Now Alexander having conquered all ASIA on this side of the River of Euphrates, he went to meet with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thousand fighting men. It was told him by some of his friends to make him laugh, that the Slaves of his Army had divided themselves in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the first, they began to skirmish onely with clods of Earth, and afterwards with fistes, but at the last, they grew so hot, that they came to plaine Stones and Staves, so that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needs have the two Generalls fight hand to hand one with the other: and Alexander selfe did arme him that was called Alexander, and Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the Army thereupon was gathered together to see this combat between them, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was sharpe between them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander overcame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gave him twelve Villages, with privilege to go after the PERSIAN manner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great Battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many Writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gaufameles, which signifieth in the PERSIAN Tongue, the House of the Cammell. For some one of the ancient Kings of PERSIA that had escaped from the hands of his Enemies, flying upon a Dromedary, Cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the revenues of certaine Villages to keepe the Cammell there. There fell out at that time an Eclipse of the Moone, in the Moneth called Badromion (now August) about the time that the Feasts of the Mysteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleventh night after that, both the Armies being in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in Battell-ray, and went himselfe by Torch-light viewing his Bands and Companies. Alexander on the other side whilst his MACEDONIAN Souldiers slept, was before his Tent with Aristander the Soothsayer, and made certaine secret Ceremonies and Sacrifices unto Apollo. The ancient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the Valley betwixt the River of Niphates, and the Mountaines of the GORDIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous People, and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of People that filled their Campe with the sound thereof: they were amazed, and consulted, that in one day it was in manner impossible to fight a Battell with such an incredible multitude of People. Thereupon they went unto Alexander after he had ended his Ceremonies, and did counsell him to give Battell by night, because the darknesse thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the sight of their Enemies would bring them into. But then he gave them this notable answer: I will not steale Victory, quoth he. This answer seemed very fond and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasant, being neare so great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present noble courage, and a deepe consideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby to give Darius no manner of occasion (if he were overcome) to take heart againe, and to prove another Battell, accusing the darknesse of the night as cause of his Overthrow: as he had done at the first Conflict, imputing his overthrow to the Mountaines, the Straights, and the Sea. For, said he, Darius will never leave to make Warres with us for lacke of men, nor Munition, having so large a Realm as he hath, and such a world of People besides: but then he will no more hazard Battell, when his heart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he seeth his Army at noon daies overthrowne by plaine Battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his Tent, and laied him down to sleepe, and slept all that night more soundly then he was wont to doe before: inasmuch as the Lords and Princes of his Campe coming to waite upon him at his uprising, marvelled when they found him so fast asleepe, and therefore of themselves they commanded the Souldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiving that time came fast upon them, Parmenio went into Alexander's Chamber, and coming to his beds-side called him twice or thrice by Name, till at the last he awaked him, and asked him how it chanced that he slept so long, like one that had already overcome, and that did not thinke he should fight as great and dangerous a Battell as ever he did in his life. Why, said Alexander, laughing on him: dost thou not thinke we have already overcome, being troubled no more with running after Darius up and down a Countrey utterly destroyed, as we should otherwise have been compelled to have done, if he would not have come to Battell, and destroyed the Countrey before us? Now Alexander did not onely shew himselfe before the Battell, but even at the very instant of the Battell, a noble man of courage, and of great judgement. For Parmenio leading the left Wing of his Battell, the men of Armes of the BACTRIANS gave such a fierce onset upon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them give backe: and Maceus also, King Darius Lieutenant, sent certaine Troops of Horsemen out of their Battell, to give charge upon them that were left in the Camp to guard the Carriage. Parmenio being amazed with either either of both attempts, sent immediately to advertise Alexander, that all their Campe and Carriage would be lost, if he did not send presently to aide the rereward. When these Newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already given the Signall of Battell unto his men for to give Charge. Whereupon he answered the Messenger that brought him these Newes, that he should tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembering that if they wan the Battell, they should not onely save their owne Carriage, but also win the Carriage of their Enemies: and if it were their chance to lose it, then that they should not need to care for their Carriage, nor for their Slaves, but onely to thinke to die honourably, valiantly fighting for his life. Having sent this Message unto Parmenio, he put on his Helmet. The rest of his Armour for his Body, he had put it on before in his Tent, which was, a CIRCULIAN Cassocke, and upon that a Brigandine made of many folds of Canvas with Oylet-holes, which was gotten among the spoiles at the Battell of ISSUS. His Head-piece was as bright as Silver, made by Theophilus the Armourer: his Coller suite-like to the fame, all set full of precious-Stones, and he had a Sword by his side marvellous light, and of excellent temper, which the King of the CITTILIANS had given him, using commonly to fight with his Sword at any set Battell. His Coate-armour was marvellous rich, and of sumptuous workmanship far above all the rest he wore. It was of the workmanship of Helicon, the which the RHODIANS gave him for a Present, and this he commonly wore when he went to Battell. Now when he did set his men in Battell-ray, or made any Oration unto them, or did ride alongst the Bands to take view of them: he alwaies used to ride upon another Horse to spare Pucephal, because he was then somewhat old: notwithstanding, when he meant indeed to fight, then Bucephal was brought unto him, and as soone as he was gotten up on his back, the Trumpet sounded, and he gave Charge. Then after he had made long Exhortations to encourage the men of Armes of the THESSALIANS and the other GRECIANS also, and when they had all promised him they would stick to him like men, and prayed him to leade them, and gave charge upon the Enemies: he tooke his Launce in his left hand, and holding up his right hand unto Heaven, besought the gods (as Calisthenes writeth) that if it were true he was begotten of Jupiter, that it would please them that day to helpe him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Soothsayer Aristander was then on horse-back hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, and a Crowne of Glod on his Head, who shewed Alexander when he made his prayre, an Eagle flying over his head, and pointing directly towards his Enemies. This marvellously encouraged all the Army that saw it, and with this joy, the men of Armes of Alexander's side, encouraging one another, did set spurres to their Horse to charge upon the Enemies. The Battell of the Footmen of the PERSIANS, began a little to give way, and before the foremost could fight with Darius, come to give them charge, the barbarous People turned their backes, and fled. The chase was great: Alexander driving them that fled upon the midst of their owne Battell, where Darius selfe was in person, he spied him a farr off over the foremost Ranks in the midst of his Battell, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a Chariot of Warre, compassed in round with great Troops of Horsemen, all set in goodly ordinance to receive the Enemy. But when they saw Alexander at hand with so grimme a looke, chafing them that fled, through those that yet kept their Ranks: there fell such a feare among them, that the most part dispersed themselves. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiant men sought it out to the death before their King, and falling dead one upon another, they did lett them that the Enemies could not so well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and Horses by the leggs to hinder them. Darius then seeing nothing but terrour and destruction before his eyes, and that the Bands which he had set before him for safeguard, came back upon him, so as he could not devise how to turne his Chariot forward nor bakeward, the Wheelles were so hindred and stayed with the heapes of dead Bodies, and that the Horse also being set upon and hid in manner in this Conflict, fell to leaping and plunging for feare, so that the Chariottiers could no longer guide nor drive them: he got up upon a Mare that lately had a Foale, and so saved himselfe flying upon her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent unto Alexander to praye Darius to come and aide him: because there was yet a great Squadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to have dealt but slackly and cowardly, either because his age had taken his courage from him; or else for that he envied Alexander's greatnesse and prosperity, who against his will became over great, as Calisthenes said. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second Message, and yet told not his men truly the cause why, but faining that he would have them leave killing, and because alfo night came on: he caused the Trumpet sound retraite, and so went towards his Army, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, Newes came to him by the way, that in that place alfo, they had given the Enemies the Overthrow, and that they fled every way for life. The Battell having this successe, every man thought that the Kingdome of the PERSIANS was utterly overthrowne, and that Alexander likewise was become onely King of all ASIA: whereupon he made sumptuous Sacrifices unto the gods, and gave great riches, Houses, Lands, and Possessions unto his Friends and Familiars. Furthermore, to shew his liberality also unto the GRECIANS, he wrote unto them, that he would have all Tyrannies suppressed throughout all GRECE, and that all the GRECIANS should live at liberty under their own Lawes. Particularly alfo he wrote unto the PLATAIANS, that he would reedifie their City againe, because their men Predecessors in time past, had given their Countrey unto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous People for the defence of the common Liberty of all GRECE. He sent also into FRATY unto the GROTONIANS, part of the spoile, to honour the memory of the valiantnesse, and good will of Phaylus their Citizen, who in the time of the Warres with the MEDERS (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALY had forsaken their naturall Countrey men of GREECE it self, because they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a Ship of his unto SALAMINA, which he armed and set forth at his own charges, because he would be at the Battell, and partake also of the common danger with the GRECIANS: such honour did Alexander beare unto Prowesse, that he loved to reward and remember the worthy deeds of men. Then Alexander marching with his Army into the Countrey of BABYLON, they all yielded straight unto him. When he came into the Countrey of the ECRATANIANS, he marvelled when he saw an opening of the Earth, out of the which there came continuall sparkes of fire as out of a Well: and that hard by also the Earth spued out continually a kinde of * Maund or Chalkie Clay somewhat liquid, of such abundance, as it seemed like a Lake. This Maund or Chalke is like unto a kinde of Lime or Clay, but it is so easie to be set a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnesse onely of the light that cometh out of the fire, it is set a fire, and doth also set the Ayre a fire which is between both. The barbarous People of that Countrey, being desirous to shew Alexander the nature of that Naptha, scattered the Street that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being shut in, they fired it at one of the ends, and the first drops taking fire, in the twinkling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the Street to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in Bathe at that time, and waited upon by a Page called Steven: (a hard favoured Boy, but yet that had an excellent sweet Voice to Sing) one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwaies nointed and bathed the King, and much delighted him with his pleasant conceits, asked him if he would see the trial of this Naptha upon Steven: for if the fire took and went not out, then he would say it had a wonderfull force, and was unquenchable. The Page was contented to have it proved upon him. But so soon as they had laiid on him, and did but touch it onely, it took straight of such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander himselfe was in a marvellous perplexity withall. And sure had it not been by good hap, that there were many by, ready with Vessels full of Water to put into the Bath, it had been unpossible to have saved the Boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet so he scaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha unto the fable of Medea, saying, that therewith she rubbed the Crown and Lawne she gave unto the Daughter of Creon at her marriage, so much spoken of in the Tragedies. For neither the Crowne nor the Lawne could cast fire of themselves, neither did the fire light by chance. But by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnesse to receive more forcibly the Operation of the fire, which was in place where the Bride sate. For the beames which the fire casteth out, have over some bodies no other force, but to heat and lighten them. But such as have an oily drie humour, and thereby a simpathy and proportionable conformity with the nature of the fire: it easly enflameth and setteth a fire, by the forcible impresson of his beames. Howbeit they make a great question of the cause of this naturall force of Naptha, * or whether this liquid substance and moist humour that taketh fire so easly, doth come of the Earth that is fatty and apt to conceive fire. For the Countrey about BABYLON is very hot, inso much as oftentimes Barley being put into the Ground, it bloweth it up again, as if the Earth by vehement inflammation had a strong blast to cast it out: and men in the extreamest heat of the Summer, do sleepe there, upon great Leather budgets filled full of fresh Water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenant and Governour of that Countrey, desiring to set forth and beautifie the Gardens of the Kings Pallace and Walkes of the same, with all manner of Plants of GREECE: he brought all the rest to good passe, saving Ivie onely, which the earth could never abide, but it ever died, because the heat and temper of the Earth killed it, and the Ivy of it selfe liketh fresh ayre and a cold Ground. This digression is somewhat from the matter, but peradventure the Reader will not think it troublesome, how hard soever he finde it, so it be not over tedious. Alexander having won the City of SUSAN, he found within the Castle foure thousand Talents in ready coine, Gold and Silver, besides other infinite Treasure and inestimable, amongst the which (it is said) he found to the value of five thousand Talents of * Purple HARMIONA Silke, which they had safe locked up and kept the space of two hundred yeares fawten, and yet the colour kept as fresh as if it had been newly made. Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it with Honey, in Silkes, which before had been died red, and with white Oyle in white Silkes. For, there are Silkes seen of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dion writeth furthermore, that the Kings of PERSIA made water to be brought from the Rivers of Nylus and Iffer (otherwise called Danubius) which they did lock up with their other Treasure for a confirmation of the greatness of their Empire, and to shew that they were Lords of the World. The waies to enter into PERSIA being very hard of passage, and in manner unpassable, (both for the inesse of the waies, as also for the guard that kept them, which were the choicest men of PERSIA) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greek and PERSIAN Tongue (whose father was born in the Countrey of EGYPT, and his Mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by some compassie set out about not very long, according to the Oracles answer of Alexander given by the mouth of the Nun Pythia, when he was a Child: that a LYCIAN should guide and lead him against the PERSIANS. There was then great slaughter made in PERSIA of the Prisoners, that were taken. For Alexander himselfe writeth, that he commanded the men should be put to the sword, thinking that the best way to serve his turne. It is said also, that there he found a marvellous Treasure of Gold and Silver in ready Money, as he had done before in the City of SUSAN, the

which he carried away with all the rest of the Kings rich Ward-robe, and with it loaded ten thousand Moyles, and five thousand Camels. Alexander entering into the Castle of the chiefe City of PERSIA, saw by chance a great Image of Xerxes lie on the ground, the which unawares was throwne downe by the multitude of the Souldiers that came in thronging one upon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spake unto it as if it had been alive, saying: I cannot tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lie, for the Warre thou madest sometime against the GRECIANS: or whether I should lift thee up, respecting the noble minde and Vertues thou haddest. In the end, when he had stood mute a long time, considering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refresh his weary Army, because it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure Moneths together. The report goeth that the first time that Alexander late under the Cloath of State of King Darius, all of rich Gold: Demaratus CORINTHIAN (who first began to love him, even in his Father Philips time) burst out in teares for joy (good old man) saying, that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were deprived of this blessed hap, to see Alexander sit in King Xerxes princely Chair. After that, preparing againe to go against Darius, he would needs make merry one day, and refresh himself with some banquet. It chanced so, that he with his Companions was bidden to a private Feast privately, where was assembled some fine Curtizans of his Familiars, who with their Friends tarried at the Banquet. Amongst them was that famous Thais, borne in the Countrey of ATTICA, and then Concubine to Ptolomy, King of EGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praised Alexander, and partly in sporting wise, began to utter matter in affection of her Countrey, but yet of greater importance then became her mouth: saying, that that day she found her selfe fully recompensed to her great good liking, for all the paines she had taken, travelling through all the Countries of ASIA, following of his Army, now that she had this favour and good hap to be merry and pleasant, in the proud and Stately Pallace of the great Kings of PERSIA. But yet it would do her more good for a recreation to burn Xerxes Houle with the fire of joy, who had burnt the City of ATHENS: and her selfe to give the fire to it, before so noble a Prince as Alexander. Because ever after it might be said, that the Woman following his Camp had taken more noble revenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and injuries they had done unto GREECE: then all the Capitaines of GREECE that ever were had done, either by Land or Sea. When she had said, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands and made great noise for joy, saying: that it were as good a deed as could be possible, and perfwaded Alexander unto it. Alexander yielding to their perswasions, rose up, and putting a Garland of Flowers upon his head, went foremost himselfe: and all his Familiars followed after him, crying and dancing all about the Castle. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it also, came thither immediately with Torches light and great joy, hoping that this was a good signe that Alexander meant to returne againe into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the Countrey of the barbarous People, sith he did burne and destroy the Kings Castle. Thus, and in this sort it was thought to be burnt. Some Writers thinke otherwise: that it was not burnt with such sport, but by determination of the Councell. But howsoever it was, all they grant, that Alexander did presently repent him, and commanded the fire to be quenched straight. For his liberality, that good will and readinesse to give, increased with his Conquests: and when he did bestow Gifts of any, he would besides his Gift, ever give them good countenance, on whom he bestowed his grace and favour. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Aristo being Colonell of the PÆONIANS, having slain one of his Enemies, he brought him his Head, and said: such a Present, O King, by us, is ever rewarded with a Cup of Gold. Yea, quoth Alexander, smiling upon him with an empty Cup. But I drinke to thee this Cup full of good Wine, and do give thee Cup and all. Another time, he met with a poor MACEDONIAN that led a Moyle laden with Gold of the Kings: and when the poor Moyle was so weary that she could no longer carry her burden, the Moylester put it upon his own back, and loaded himself withall carrying it so a good pritty way: howbeit in the end being over-loaden, was about to throw it down on the ground. Alexander perceiving it, asked him what burden he carried. When it was told him: well, quoth he to the Moylester, be not wearie yet but carry it into the Tent, for I give it thee. To be short, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would aske him somewhat. He wrote also unto Phocius, that he would take him no more for his Friend, if he would refuse his Gifts. It seemed that he had given nothing unto a young Boy called Serapion (who ever did serve them the Ball that plaid at Tennis) because he asked him nothing. Wherefore the King playing on a time, this young Boy, threw the Ball to others that played with him, and not to himselfe. The King marvelling at it, at the length said unto: Why, my Boy, dost thou not give me the Ball? Because your Majesty doth not aske it me, quoth he. Alexander then understanding his meaning, laughed at the Boy, and did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him also one Proteus, a pleasant conceited man, and that could jest finely. It chanced upon some occasion that Alexander fell out with him: whereupon some of his friends were intercessors unto the King for him, and besought him to pardon him: and Proteus himselfe also being present, craved pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgave him. Then presently replied Proteus, I desire it may please your Grace, that I may receive some Testimony to assure me I am in your favour. Thereupon the King straight commanded one to give him five Talents. The goods and riches he gave unto his Familiars and Guard about him, were very great, as it appeared plainly by a Letter which his Mother Olympias wrote unto him, to this effect: I know thou sparest not to give thy Friends large Gifts, and that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them Kings fellowes, they get many Friends, and leave thee post alone without any. His Mother did many times write such like matters unto him the which Alexander kept very secret, saving one day when he opened one of them, Hephestion being present drew near, and read the Letter with him, as he was wont to doe. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he plucked the Seale of Armes from his finger, wherewith he did use to Seale his Letters, and put it to Hephestions mouth. He gave also unto the Son of Maxus (that was the chiefeft man about Darius) a second Government, besides that which he had before, and greater then the first. This young Noble man refused it, saying: why, and it please your Grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gave unto Parmenio also, Bagoas Houfe, where (as it is reported) he found a thousand Talents worth of the spoiles and goods of the Susians. He wrote also unto Antipater, that he should keepe a Guard about his person, for he had many Enemies that lay in waite for him. He did send also many goodly Presents unto his Mother, but withall he wrote unto her, that she would meddle no more with his Matters or Gifts, taking upon her the Office of a Captain. She storming at it, he patiently did brooke her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long Letter unto him against his Mother Olympias: when he had read it over, Loc, said he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the Mothers eye will wipe out ten thousand such Letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiving on a time, that his friends became very diffolute and licentious in Diet and Life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked Shooes nailed with Silver Nails, that Leomatus also caused divers Camels to be laden amongst his carriage with Powder of EGYPT to put upon him when he wrestled or used any other exercise of body, and that also they carried after Philotas, Toiles for chase and hunting, of a hundred furlong long, and that there were also that used precious Perfumes and sweet Savors when they bathed themselves, more: then there were that rubbed themselves with plaine Oyle, and that they had fine Chamberlaines to rub them in the Bath, and to make their Beds soft and delicate: he wisely and courteously rebuked them and said: I marvel, said he, that you which have fought in so often and great Battels, do not remember that they which travell, do sleep more sweet and soundly, then they that take their ease and do nothing: and that you do not mark, that comparing your Life, with the manner of the Life of the PERSIANS, to live at pleasure is a vile thing and to travell is princely. And how I pray you, can a man take paines to dresse his own Horse, or to make cleane his Lance or Helmet, that for slothfull curiosities sake, disdaineth to rub his own Body with his fingers? Are you ignorant that the tipe of Honour in all our Victory consisteth, in scorning to do that which we see them do, whom we have vanquished and overcome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themselves with hardnesse: he tooke more paines in Warres and in hunting, and did hazard himselfe more dangerously, then ever he had done before. Whereupon an Ambassadour of LACEDÆMON being present to see him fight with a Lion, and to kill him, said unto him: truly your Grace hath fought well with this Lion, and tried which of you two should be King. Craterus after that, caused this hunting to be set up in the Temple of Apollo in DELPHOS: where are the Images of the Lion, of the dogges, and of the King fighting with the Lion, and of himselfe also that came to helpe him, all those Images being of Copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himselfe unto all jeopardies, as well to exercise his strength and courage, as also to allure his men to do the like. This notwithstanding his friends and familiars having Wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needs live delicately and at ease, and would take no more paines, milking utterly to go up and down the Countries to make Warre here and there, and thereupon began a little to finde fault with Alexander and to speake evill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly, saying, that it was Honour for a King to suffer himselfe to be slandered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turnes he did unto his friends, did shew his hearty love and honour he bare them, as shall appeare unto you by some examples that follow. Pencestas being bitten by a Beare, did let his friends understand by Letters, but he wrote nothing thereof unto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote unto him thus: Send me word at the least yet how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellowes did forsake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be punished. Hephestion being absent about certaine businesse he had, Alexander wrote unto him, that as they were hunting a Beast called Ichnewmon, Craterus, unfortunately crossing Perdiccas Dart, was stricken through both his thighs. Pencestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote unto Alexippus, his Phisitian that had cured him, and gave him thanks. Craterus also being sicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine Sacrifices for the recovery of his health, and sent unto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phisitian Panfanus meant to give him a drinke of Eleborus, he wrote Letters unto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be careful how he received that Medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Cissus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus flying, because they did wrongfully accuse and slander him. When he had commanded there should be a Bill made of all the Old mens Names, and diseased persons that were in his Campe, to send them home againe into their Countrey: there was owne Eurylochus EGEIAN, that made his Name be billed amongst the sicke persons, and it was found afterwards that he was not sicke; and confessed that he did it onely to follow a young Woman called Telephippa, with home he was in love, who was returning home towards the Sea side. Alexander asked him, whether this Woman were free or bond: he answered him, that she was a Curtizan free borne. Then said Alexander unto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy love, yet I cannot force her to tarry: but seeke to winne her by Gifts and faire words to be contented to tarry, sithence she is a free Woman. It is a wonderfull thing to see what paines he would take, to write for his Friends, even in such trifles as he did. As when he wrote wrote into CILICIA for a Servant of Seleucus that was fled from his Master, sending straight Commandement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by another Letter he commendeth Pencestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a Slave of Craterus. And by one other Letter also unto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken Sanctuary in a Temple, he commanded him also to seeke to entice him out of the Sanctuary to lay hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to meddle with him in any case. It is said also, that at the first when he used to sit in judgement to hear criminall Causes, whilst the accuser went on with his complaint and accusation, he alwaies used to lay his hand upon one of his eares, to keepe that cleane from the matter of accusation, thereby refering it to hear the Purgation and Justification of the Person condemned. But afterwards, the number of accusations that were brought before him, did so provoke and alter him, that he did beleve the false accusations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he understood they had spoken ill of him: and then he was so fierce, as no pardon would be granted, for that he loved his Honour more then his Kingdome or Life. Then at that time he went against Darius, thinking that he meant to fight againe: but understanding that Bessus had taken him, then he gave the THESSALIANS leave to depart home into their Countrey, and gave them two thousand Talents over and above their ordinary Pay. Alexander had then a marvellous long, hard, and painfull Journey in following of Darius: for in eleven daies, he rode three thousand and three hundred furlongs, inso much as the most part of his men were even weary, and done for lacke of Water. It chanced him one day to meet with certaine MACEDONIANS that carried (upon Moyles) Goats Skins full of Water, which they had fetched from a River. They seeing Alexander in manner dead for thirst, being about noon, ran quickly to him, and in a Head-piece brought him Water. Alexander asked them to whom they carried this Water. They answered him againe, that they carried it to their Children, but yet would have your Grace to live: for though we lose them, we may get more Children. When they had said so, Alexander tooke the Helmet with Water, and perceiving that the men of Armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thrust out their neckes to looke upon this Water, he gave the Water backe againe unto them that had given it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it: for said he, if I drinke alone, all these men here will faint. Then they seeing the noble courage and courtesie of Alexander, cried out that he should lead them, and therewithall began to spurre their Horses, saying, that they were not weary nor athirst, nor did thinke themselves mortall, so long as they had such a King. Every man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threecore onely that entred with him into the Enemies Campe. There, passing over much Gold and Silver, which was scattered abroad in the place, and going also by many Chariots full of Women and Children, which they found in the Fields, flying away at all adventure: they ranne upon the spurre untill they had overtaken the foremost that fled, thinking to have found Darius amongst them. But at the length with much ado, they found him layed along in a Coach, having many wounds upon his body, some of Darts and some of Spears. So he being almost at the last cast, called for some Drinke, and dranke cold Water, which Polystratus gave him. To whom when he had drunk, he said: this is my last mishap my Friend, that having received this pleasure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the gods Alexander, for the liberality and courtesie which he hath shewed unto my Wife and Children, whom I pray thee embrace for my sake. At these last words, he tooke Polystratus by the hand, and so gave up the ghost. Alexander cam immediately after, and plainly shewed that he was sorry for his death and misfortune: and undoing his own Cloake, he cast it upon the Body of Darius. After that, having by good hap gotten Bessus into his hands, he tore him in pieces with two high straight Trees which he bowed downwards, and tied his legges to each of them: so that when the Trees were let goe, they gave a suddaine cruell jerke up, and carried either Tree a piece of his body with it. Then Alexander having given Darius Corpse princely buriall, and embled him, he sent it unto his Mother, and received his Brother Exathres for one of his Friends. From thence he went into the Countrey of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his Army, where he saw the gulf of the Sea Caspium, which he thought of no lesse greatnesse, then the Sea of PONTUS, howbeit calmer then the other Seas be. He could not then certainly finde out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelihood he thought it was some breaking out of the Lake or Marish of Alestin. Yet some ancient naturall Philosophers seemed to know truly what it was. For many years before Alexanders Voyage and Conquest, they wrote, that of the foure chiefeft gulfs of the Sea, which come from the Ocean, and do enter within maine Land, that which is more Northerly, is the Sea Caspium, which they call also Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the Countrey, certaine barbarous People suddainly set upon them that led Bucephalus his Horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, that he sent a Herald into their Countries to proclaime open Warres upon them, and that he would put Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword, if they brought him not his Horse againe. Whereupon, when his Horse was returned home, and that they yielded up their Cities and Forts into his hands, he did use them all very courteously, and moreover did give them Money for the ranfome of his Horse, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the Countrey of PARTHIA. There having leasure enough, he began to apparell himself after the fashion of the barbarous People, because he thought thereby the better to win the hearts of the Countrey men, framing himselfe unto their own fashions: or else to try the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, to see how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he meant to bring them unto) in reverencing of him as they did their King, Perfians.

by little and little acquainting them to allow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithstanding, he would not at the first take up the Apparell of the Mædes, which was very strange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without Breeches, nor did weare a long Gowne trailing on the Ground, nor a high copstant Hat, but tooke a meane Apparell, betwixt the Mædes and the PERSIANS, more modest then the one, and more costly then the other, and yet at the first he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous People, or else priuately amongst his Friends and Familiars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed himselfe openly to the People in that Apparell, when he gave them Audience. This sight grieved the MACEDONIANS much: but they had his Vertues in such admiration, that they thought it meet in some things he should take his owne pleasure, fithence he had been often hurt in the Warres, and not long before had his legges broken with an Arrow; and another time, had such a blow with a stone full in his neck, that it made him purr-blind a great while after, and yet nevertheless he never elchewed any bodily danger: for he passed over the River of Oreaxartes, which he tooke to be Tanaïs, and having in Battell overthrowne the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase about an hundred Furlongs, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosnesse of body. Thither came unto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONS, as many Writers do testifie among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onciscritus, Antigeneis, and Hister. But Chares, Ptolomie, Arriellides and Philon THEBAN, Philip the Historiographer, Hecateus ERETIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these do write, that it was not true: and it seemeth also that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly unto Antipater as they happened unto him, he wrote unto him that the King of SCYTHIA offered him his Daughter in marriage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is also said, that Onciscritus long time after that did read unto King Lysimachus, the fourth Booke of his History, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus smiling, said unto him: Why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit it, or not to credit it, Alexander's estimation thereby is neither impaired nor advanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being weary with this long Warre, would go no further, he left all the rest of his Army behind, and tooke onely twenty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horsemen of the choicest men of his Army, and with them invaded the Countrey of HYRCANIA. There he made an Oration unto them, and told them, that the barbarous People of ASIA had but seen them as it were in a Dreame; and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, having but onely stirred them, and not altogether subdued ASIA, the People offended with them, would set upon them as they went home: as if they were no better then Women. Nevertheless, he gave any man leave to returne that would, protesting therewith against them that would go, how they did forsake him, his friends, and those who had so good hearts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a Journey, to conquer the whole earth unto the MACEDONIANS. This selfe matter is reported thus in a Letter which Alexander wrote unto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that having made this Oration unto them, they all cryed out, and bade him leade them into what part of the World he would. When they had granted their good wils, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the rest of the common fort, who followed the example of the chieft. Thereupon he did frame himselfe the more to live after the fashion of the Countrey there, and interchangeably also to bring the men of that Countrey unto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being perswaded that by this mixture and entchange of manners one with another, he should by friendship more then force, make them agree lovingly together, when that he should be so farr from the Countrey of PERSIA. For this purpose therefore, he chose thirty thousand of their Children of that Countrey, and set them to learn the Greek Tongue, and to be brought up in the Discipline of Wars after the MACEDONIANS manner: and gave them Schoole-masters and Captaines to traine them in each faculty. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, seeing her at a Feast where he was: which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better advice and counsell loved her. For the barbarous People were very proud of this match, when as they saw him make alliance with them in this sort, inasmuch as they loved him better then they did before, because they saw in those things he was alwaies so chaste and continent, that notwithstanding he was marvellously in love with her, yet he would not dishonourably touch this young Lady, before he was married unto her. Furthermore, Alexander considering that of the two men which he loved best, Hephestion liked well of this match, and went appparelled as himselfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did still use the MACEDONIAN manner, he dealt in all Affaires with the barbarous People, by Hephestion; and with the GRECIANS and MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be short he loved the one, and honoured the other: saying that Hephestion, loved Alexander, and Craterus loved the King. Hereupon these two persons did beare one another grudge in their hearts, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inasmuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drew their Swords, and fought together, and divers of their friends ran to take part with either side. Thither came Alexander's selfe also, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke up Hephestion, and called him foole and bedlam, saying, dost thou not know, that whosoever he be that should take Alexander from me, he should never live? Privately also, he sharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them friends together, swearing by Jupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loved them two of all men living; nevertheless if ever he found that they fell out together againe, they should both die for it, or he at the least that first began to quarrell. So ever after that, they say, there was never foule word nor deed between them, not so much as in sport onely. There was also one Philotas, the Sonne of Permenio, a man of great Authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next unto Alexander was the most valiant man, the patientst to abide paine, the liberallist, and one that loved his men and friends better then any Noble-man in the Campe whatsoever. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borrow Money: and he commanded straight his Master, dost thou tell me so? Haft thou not Plate, and Apparell to sell or gage to helpe him to some? Howbeit otherwise, he had such pride and glory to shew his riches, to Apparell himselfe so sumptuously, and to be more fine and prinked then became a private man, that this made him to be hated: because he tooke upon him to be a great man, and to looke bigge on the matter, which became him so ill favouredly, and therefore every man through his own folly, fell in mistaking and lowly. This Philotas had long before been complained upon unto Alexander because that when the Carnage of King Darius Army (which was in the City of DAMAS) was taken after the Battell of CILICIA, among many Prisoners that were taken and brought unto Alexander's Campe, there was one Antigona, a passing faire young Curtizan, borne in the City of PIDNA. Philotas found meanes to get her, and like a young man that was in love with her, making merry with her at the Table, fondly let fall brave words and boasts of a Souldier, saying, that what notable things were done, they were done by himselfe and his Father: and called Alexander at every word, young man, and said, that by their meanes he held his Name and Kingdome. This Curtizan told one of her ly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus ears. He tooke the Curtizan, and brought her unto Alexander, unto whom she told as much as she had said before. Alexander bad her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him every word what he said of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumvented, did ever frequent her company, and would be bold commonly to speake many foolish and undiscreeit words against the King, sometime in anger, and sometime againe in a barvery. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest prooffe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he diddembled it for that time, and would not be knowne of it: either for that he knew Permenio loved him, or else for that he was afraid of their great Power and Authority. About that time there was one Limnus Chalefrian a MACEDONIAN, that laid great and secret wait to kill Alexander: and being in love with a young man called Nicomachus, inticed him to helpe him to do this deed. The young man, wisely denied it, and told the same to his Brother called Balinus. He went unto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importance to impart unto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the King (but why no man could tell) telling them, that the King had greater matters in hand, and was not at leisure. Then they went unto another, and he brought them unto Alexander, unto whom they first opened the Treason of Limnus conspired against him: and by the way they told also, how they had been twice before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with him: That angered Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slaine by him, whom he sent to apprehend him, resisting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death, he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this Treason and conspiracy. Then Alexander frowning upon Philotas, brought all his Enemies upon his back, that of long time had hated him. For they began to speake boldly, that it was time for the King to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalefrian of himselfe durst have entred into that Treason, but rather that he was a Minister, and a chiefe Instrument, set on by a greater Personage then he: and therefore that it stood Alexander upon to examine them straightly which had cause to keepe this Treason secret. After a thousand Accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of divers Lords and Familiars of the King put to the torture. Alexander's selfe hanging behind, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he heard how faintly and pitifully he besought Hephestion to take pity upon him, he said unto himselfe: Alas, poore Philotas, thou that hadst so faint a heart, how durst thou take upon thee so great matters? In fine Philotas was put to death, and immediately after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speed unto the Realme of MEDIA to kill Permenio, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had served King Philip his Father, in his greatest Affaires; and he onely of all other the old Servants of his Father had procured Alexander to take in hand the Conquest of ASIA: and who also of three Sons himselfe with the third. This cruelty of Alexander made his friends afraid of him, and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadors unto the ETOLIANS to make League with them, Antipater was because they themselves also were afraid of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades afraid of Alexander to death. Alexander hearing that said, that he himselfe, and not the Sonnes of the Oeniades, would be revenged on the ETOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murder of Clitus, the which to heare it simply told, would seem much more cruell then the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chanced, it will be found that it was not of set purpose, but by chance and unfortunately, that Alexander being overcome with Wine, did unluckily wreake his anger upon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this: There came certaine men of the low Countries from the Sea side, that brought Apples of Why Alexander Philotas was suspected and envied of Alexander. Limnus traiterously seeketh to kill Alexander. Philotas and his Father Permenio put to death. Antipater was afraid of Alexander. Why Alexander Philotas shew shew him them, and to give him some of them. Clitus by chance did Sacrifice at that time unto the gods, and left his Sacrifice to go unto Alexander: howbeit, there were three Weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprinklings had been done already to have sacrificed them. Alexander understanding that, told it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN; both did answer him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander there upon gave order straight, that they should do Sacrifice for the health of Clitus, and specially for that three daies before he dreamed one night that he saw Clitus in a mourning Gown, sitting amongst the Sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an end of his Sacrifice, but came straight to Supper to the King, who had that day sacrificed unto Cassor and Pollux. At this Feast there was old drinking, and all the Supper time there were certaine Verses sung and made by a Poet, called Pranichus (or as others say, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before been overcome by the barbarous People; and onely to shame them, and to make the company laugh. With these Verses, ancient men that were at this Feast, became much offended, and grew angry with the Poet that made them, and the Minstrell that sung them. Alexander on the other side, and his familiars, liked them very well and commanded the Minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being overtaken with Wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, fell into greater choler, and said: that it was neither well nor honestly done in that sort to speake ill of thole poor MACEDONIAN Captaines (and specially amongst the barbarous People their Enemies) which were far better men then they that laughed them to scorne, although their Fortune were worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and said, that saying so, he pleaded for himselfe, calling cowardinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing up, said again: But yet this my cowardinesse saved thy life, that callest thy selfe the Sonne of the gods, when thou turnest thy backe from Spithridates Sword: and the blood which these poor MACEDONIANS did shed for thee, and they wounds which then received on their bodies fighting for thee, have made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to have King Philip for thy Father, and wilt needs make thy selfe the Sonne of Jupiter Hammon. Alexander being moved with these words, straight replied: O, Villain, thinkest thou to scape unpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou usest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS to rebell against me? Clitus answered againe, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and service to receive such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with Rods of the MEDES, and compelled to curry favour with the PERSIANS, to have access unto their King. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander again answering and reviling him, the gravest men sought to pacifie this stirr and tumult. Alexander then turning himselfe unto Xenodochus CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: Do you not thinke (said he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as deny gods that walke among brute Beasts? Clitus for all this would not give over his impudency and malapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openly what he had to say, or else not to bid Free-men to come to sup with him that were wont to speake frankly: if not, to keep with the barbarous Slaves that honoured his PERSIAN Girdle, and long white Garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but tooke an Apple that was upon his Table, and threw it at Clitus, and looked for his Sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his Guard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when every man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented, he immediately rose from the Board, and called his Guard unto him in the MACEDONIAN Tongue (which was a signe of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a Trumpeter to sound the Allarme. But he drawing backe, would not sound: wheresupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the Trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the Campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, wheresupon his friends with much ado thrust him out of the Hall: but he came in againe at another door, and arrogantly and unreverently rehearsed this Verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches Tragedy:

Are into Greece crept now adayes.*

Alexander slew Clitus, and grievously repentted him.

Then Alexander taking a Partisan from one of his Guard, as Clitus was coming towards him, and had lift up the hanging before the door, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one groane, died presently. Alexanders choler had left him straight, and he became marvellous sorrowfull: and when he saw his friends round about him say never a word, he plucked the Partisan out of his Pody, and would have thrust it into his own throate. Howbeit his Guard about him caught him by the hands, and carried him perforce into his Chamber: and there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, and the next day following, untill such time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, onely lay sighing. His friends hearing his Voice no more, were afraid, and came into his Chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would hear none of them, saving Aristander the Soothsayer, who remembered him of his Dreame he had of Clitus before, which was a Prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destiny, before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander: Afterwards they brought in Callisthenes the Philosopher, a Kinsman of Aristotle, and Anaxarchus borne in ABDERA. Of these two Callisthenes fought by gentle talke, not moving any matter offensive, to comfort Alexanders sorrow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by himselfe in the study of Philosophy, being being accounted a brain-sicke man, and one that despised his Companions, he coming into Alexanders Chamber also with him, cried out at the door as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the Great whom all the World looks upon, and is afraid of: see where he lies, weeping like a Slave on the ground, that is afraid of the Law, and of the reproach of men: as if he himselfe should not give them Law, and stablish the bounds of justice or injustice, sithence he hath overcome to be Lord and Master, and no to be subject and slave to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Jupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and justice placed on either hand of him? what signifieth that, but all that the Prince doth, is holy, right and just? These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorrowfull heart of King Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did marvellously grow in favour with the King, even so did he make the company of Callisthenes (who of his life was not very pleasant, because of his gravity and sowernesse) much more hatefull and disliked then before. It is written also that there was certain talke one night at King Alexanders Board touching the seasons of the year, and temperatnesse of the Ayr, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the Countrey they were in at that time was much colder, and the Winter also sharper then in GREECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and flisy maintained it, inso much as Callisthenes said unto him: And yet must thou grant, that it is colder here then there. For there all the Winter time thou couldest go with a single Cloake on thy backe onely, and here thou must have three or foure Garments upon thee when thou art at thy Board. This galled Anaxarchus to the quick, and made him more angry then before: and for the other Rhetoricians and Flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of young men for his Eloquence, and beloved also of old men for his honest life, the which was very grave, modest, and contented with his own, desiring no mans else. Whereby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in his Voyage, was true: for he said, that he came to be an humble suiter to the King to restore his banished Citizens into their Countrey againe, and to replenish their City with Inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be envied, yet did he himselfe give his Enemies occasion to accuse him. For oftentimes being invited by the King to Supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, shewing by his gravity and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe said on a time unto him:

I cannot thinke that person wise, That in his owne cause hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at Supper on a time with the King, divers requesting him to make an Oration on the sudden in commendation of the MACEDONIANS, he made such an Eloquent Oration upon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the Board, and clapping their hands for joy, cast Nofegayes and Flowers upon him. But yet Alexander at that time said unto him that which the Poet Euripides said:

It is no mastery to be Eloquent, In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but utter then thy Eloquence in reproving of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faults, they may learne to amend. Then Callisthenes changing Copy, spake boldly many things against the MACEDONIANS, declaring, that the dissention amongst the GRECIANS did increase Kings Philips power, alledging these Verses

Where discord reignes in Realme or Town, Even wicked folke doe winne renowne.

But by this occasion, he purchased himselfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: inso much, as Alexander selfe said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his Eloquence, as the malice he bare unto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the Historiographer writeth, that one Strabus a Clerk of Callisthenes, did afterwards tell it unto Aristotle in this sort: and that Callisthenes seeing King Alexander offended with him, did recite these Verses of Homers three or foure times as he went:

Was laime, as thou art like to be.*

And therefore very wisely said Aristotle, that Callisthenes was Eloquent, but not wise. For like a Philosopher, he stoutly stood against kneeling to the King, and said that openly, which the Nobler and the ancientest men among the MACEDONIANS durst but whisper one in anothers eare, as Eloquent, though they did all utterly dislike it: whereby he did yet deliver GREECE from a great shame, and but not wise.

Alexander

The cause why Callisthe-nes was envied.

Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that manner of adoration of his person. This notwithstanding, he undid himself, because he would seeme rather by presumption to bring him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Charles MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander having drunke at a certaine Feast where he hapned to be, reaching his Cup unto one of his Friends, who after he had taken it of him, rose up first on his feet, and dranke also, turning him towards the gods; and first making solemne reverence, he went and kissed Alexander, and then fate him downe againe. All the rest that were at the Feast, did the like one after another, and Callisthenes also who tooke the Cup when it came to his turne (the King not looking on him, but talking with Hephestion) after he had drunke, came unto the King to kisse him, as others had done. Howbeit, one Demetrius called Phidon, said unto the King: kisse him not, I pray your Grace, for he of all men hath done you no reverence. Alexander turned his head aside, and would not kisse him. Then cried Callisthenes out aloud: Well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with lesse then others, by a kisse. And thus began Alexanders grudge first against Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephestion was credited the better, when he said that Callisthenes had promised him to reverence Alexander, although that he had broken promise. After him also Lyfimachus, Agnon, and divers others began to play their parts against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging up and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole Tyranny; and that all the young men followed him to honour him, as if among so many thousand Souldiers, never a man of them had so noble a heart as he. And therefore, when the Treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discovered, they found the accusation probable, the which some false detractors had informed against Callisthenes: who had answered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be so famous above all men, thus: In killing the famousst person. And to animate him to go forward with this Treason, he had told him further, that he should not be afraid of a Golden Bed, but remember he had to doe with a man, which was sometimes sicke and hurt as other men were. This notwithstanding, there was never a one of Hermolaus Confederates, that would once name Callisthenes, what torments so ever they abide, to bewray who were their Companions. And Alexander selfe also writing of this Treason immediatly after, unto Craterus, Artalus, and Alcetas, said, that their Servants which had been racked and put to the torture, did constantly affirme, that they onely had conspired his death, and no man else was privy unto it. But afterwards, he sent another Letter unto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and said, that his Servants had already been stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS: howbeit that he himselfe would afterwards also punish the Master, and those that had sent unto him; and that had received the murderers into their Cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainly shewed the ill will he bare unto Aristotle, for that Callisthenes had been brought up with him, being his Kinsman, and the Sonne of Hero, Aristotles Neece. Some say that Alexander trusted Callisthenes up. Others againe report, that he died of sicknesse in prison. Nevertheless Charles writeth, that Callisthenes was kept Prisoner seven Moneths together, because he should have had his judgement in open Councell even in the presence of Aristotle himselfe: howbeit, being very fat, he was eaten in the end by Lice, and so died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MAILLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the Conquest of INDIA; but these things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great desire to go see Alexander: and when he had seene him, he said, that the GREECIANS which were dead long before, were deprived of that blisse and happinesse, that they could not see Alexander sit in the Royall Seate of King Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enjoy the Kings good will unto him; for he died of a sicknesse soon after he came unto his Campe, and Alexander did honour his Funerals: for all the Army in their Armour did cast up a Mount of Earth fashioned like a Tombe, which was a great compasse about, and fourescore Cubits high. His ashes afterwards were brought with honourable convoy, unto the Sea side, in a Charriot with foure Horses richly set out. Alexander being ready to take his Journey to go conquer INDIA, perceiving that his Army was very heavy and unweildsome to remove, he first burnt his own Carriage and next his friends, and then commanded that they should also fet the Carriage of the MACEDONIANS on fire; which counsell seemed more dangerous to be resolved of, then the proof of the execution fell out difficult. For there were very few of them that were angry therewith, and the most part of them (as if they had been secretly moved by some god) with loud cries of joy, one of them gave unto another such necessary things as they had need of, and afterwards of themselves did burne and spoile all the rest. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, who besides that he was already become cruell enough, and without mercy or pardon, did sharply punish every man that offended. For having commanded Nandander one of his friends, to keepe him a strong hold, he put him to death because he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himselfe slew Orsodares (a Captaine of the barbarous People) with a Dart, for that he rebelled against him. About that time, there was an Ewe that had eaned a Lamb which had upon her head the forme and Purple colour of the Kings Hat, after the PERSIAN manner called Tiara, having two stones hanging on each side of it. Alexander abhorred this monstrous signe, inso much as he purged himselfe by certaine BABYLONIAN Priests, which he alwaies carried about with him for that purpose, and said unto his Friends: that this Monster did not so much move him for respect of himselfe, as it did for them, fearing that the gods after his death had predestined the force and power of his Kingdome to fall into the hands of some base cowardly person. This notwithstanding, another signe and token which chanced in the necke of that, did take away his feare and discouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the Kings carriage, as he digged in a certaine place by the River of Oxus, to set up the Kings Tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oily veine, which after they had drawne out the first, there came out also another clearer, which differed nothing, neither, in smell, taste, nor favour from natural oile, havin the gloss and fatnesse so like, as there could be discerned no difference between them: the which was so much more to be wondered at, because that in all that Countrey there was no Olives. They say say also, That the water of the River self of Oxus is very soft, and maketh their skins fat, which wash or bath themselves therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander self wrote unto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongst the greatest signes which the gods had sent unto him. The Soothsayers did interpret this wonder, that it was a signe, that he should have a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the gods, said they, have given oile unto men to refresh their wearinesse. And truly so he did sustaine many dangers in those warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greatest losse he had of his men, was for lacke of victuals, and by the infection of the aire. For he striving to overcome fortune by valiantnesse, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impossible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withstand a noble heart. It is reported, that when he went to besiege a strong hold which Sisymbres kept, being thought unassailable, and that his souldiers were in despair of it, he asked one Oxyathres, what heart Sisymbres had. Oxyathres answered him, that he was the veriest coward in the world. O, that is well quoth Alexander: then it is to be won, if that be true thou sayest, since the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it on a sudden, by putting Sisymbres in a great fear. After that also he did besiege another peece of as great strength and difficulty to assault as the other. And making the young souldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the assault, he called one of them unto him, whose name also was Alexander, unto whom he said thus: Alexander, this day thou must fight like a man, and it be but for thy names sake. The young man did not forget his words, for he fought valiantly, that he was slain, for whom Alexander was very sorry. Another time when his men were afraid, and durst not come neare unto the City of Nysa: to assault it, because there ran a very deep River hard by the Walls, he came to the Rivers side, and said: O what a coward am I, that never learned to swim? and so prepared himself to swim over upon his shield. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came Ambassadors unto him, from the Cities besieged, to crave pardon of him. They wondered at him at the first, when they saw him armed without any Pompe or other Ceremony about him: but much more when a Chaire was brought him to sit downe on, that he commanded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and sit downe. Acuphis marvelling at Alexanders great courtesie, asked him what they should do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, said Alexander, that they from whom thou comest as Ambassadors unto us, do make thee their King: and withall, that they do send me a hundred of their best men for Hostages. Acuphis smiling answered him againe: but I will rule thee better, O King, if I send you the worst and not the best. There was a King called Taxiles a very wise man, who had a great Country in INDIA, no lesse in bignesse and circuit, than all EGYPT, and as full of good pasture and fruits as any Country in the world could be: who came one time to salute Alexander, and said unto him: What should we need, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with another, if thou comest not to take away our water, and our necessary commodities to live by: for which things, men of judgement must needs fight? As for our goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readier to give thee of mine: and if I have lesse, I will not thinke scorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt give me some of thine. Alexander being pleased to heare him speak thus wisely, imbraced him, and said unto him: Thinkest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these goodly faire words? No, no, thou hast won nothing by that: for I will fight and contend with thee in honesty and courtesie, because thou shalt not exceed me in bounty and liberality. So Alexander taking divers gifts of him, but giving more unto Taxiles, he dranke to him one night at supper, and said: I drinke to thee a thousand talents in gold. This gift misliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of these barbarous Lords and Princes of that Countrey. There was a certaine number of souldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikest men of all that Countrey, who being mercenary souldiers, were ever entertained in service of the great free Cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt unto Alexander in divers places. Alexander having made peace with them in a City where they were kept in, when they came abroad upon surety of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sword. There was but this onely fault, to blemish the Honour of his Noble deeds in all his warres: for in all things else he shewed mercy and equity. Furthermore the grave Philosophers and wise men of INDIA did greatly trouble him also. For they reproved the Kings and Princes of the INDIANS, for that they yielded unto Alexander, and procured the free Cities to take Armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke divers of their Cities. For King Porus, Alexander self writeth in his Epistles, all his Acts at large which he did against him. For he faith, that both their Campes lying on either side of the River Hydaspes, King Porus set his Elephants upon the banke of against King the River with their heades towards their enemies, to keepe him from passing over: and that he Porus himselfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his Campe to acquaint his men not to be afraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no Moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, and the choice of this horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get over into a little Island. When he was come into the Island, there fell a wonderful shower of raine, great winds, lightnings and thunders upon his Campe, infomuch as he saw many of his men burnt by lightning in this little Island. This notwithstanding, he did not leave to get over to the other side of the River. The River being swollen with the great flood of raine that fell the night before, overflowing the banks, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: so that Alexander when he had passed over the River, and was come to the other side, found himself in very ill case, for that he could hardly keep his feet, because the earth was very slippery under him, and the rage of the water, had eaten into it, and broke it down on every side. It is written of him, that then he said unto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could you think that I could take such paines, and put my self into so many dangers, onely to be praised of you? Thus Onesicritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their Rafteres or great peeces of timber pinned together, whereupon they had passed over the streame of the maine River: and that they waded through the other Arme or Gut of the water which had broken the earth, up to their breasts, with their harnesse on their backs. Furthermore, when he had passed over both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footmen, thinking that if his enemies came to give him charge with their men at Armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also advance their footmen forward, that his footmen also should come time enough. One of the twaine fell out as he had guessed: for a thousand horsemen and threecore Charretts armed with his enemies, gave him charge before their great company; whom he overthrew, and tooke all their Charretts, and slew four hundred of the men at Armes in the field. King Porsus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed over the River, he marched towards him with all his Army in battle ray, saving a few which he left behind to resist the MACEDONIANS, if they should force to passe over the River. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not give charge upon the middest of the battell, but being himself in the left Wing, gave charge upon the corner of the enemies left Wing, and also commanding them that were in the right Wing to do the like. So both the ends of the enemies Army were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne unto the Elephants, and gathered themselves together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, infomuch as the enemies were scantily all overthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Most writers agree, that Porsus was four cubits and a shaft-length high, and that being upon an Elephants backe, he wanted nothing in height and bignesse to be proportionable for his mounture, albeit it were a very great Elephant; and besides, that the Elephant did shew great wit and care to save the King his master. For whilst he perceived his master was strong enough, he lustily repulld those which came to assaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, having many wounds upon his body, and Arrows sticking in it, then being afraid lest his master should fall downe from his backe, he softly fell on his knees, and gently taking his Darts and Arrows with his Trunk, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after another. Porsus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he should handle him. Princely, answered Porsus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would say any thing else. I comprehend all, said he, in this word Princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leave him his Provinces and Realmes, whereof before he was King, by the name of his Lieutenant, but gave him many other Countries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteen severall Nations, five thousand of no small Cities, besides an infinite number of villages and thrice as many other Countries, he made Philip one of his friends, his Lieutenant of all those Countries. His horse Bucephalus died at this battell, not in the field but afterwards whilst he was in cure for the wounds he had on his body: but as Onesicritus saith he died even worn for very age. Alexander was as sorry for his death, as if he had lost any of his familiar friends: and for proof thereof, he built a great City in the place where his horse was buried, upon the River Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, BUCEPHALIA. It is reported also, that having lost a Dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought up of a whelp, and loved very dearly, he built also a City, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Ptolemy the SYRIAN. This last battell against King Porsus, killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no desire to go any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had such ado to overcome them, though they were but twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horse, they spake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe over the River of Ganges, understanding by the Countreimen that it was two and thirty furlongs over, and a hundred fadome deepe: and how that the banke of the River was full of souldiers, horsemen and Elephants. For it was reported that the Kings of the GANGARIDES, and the PRASIANS were on the other side with fourscore thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand footmen, eight thousand Charretts or Carts of warre well armed, and six thousand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor frivolous tale: for a King called Androcottus (who reigned not long after) gave unto Seleucus, five hundred Elephants at one time, and conquered all INDIA with six hundred thousand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refusal, kept close in his Tent for certain dayes, and lay upon the ground, saying, that he did not thanke them for all that they had done thitherto, unless they passe over the River of Ganges also; and that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confesse, that he had been overcome. At the length, when he saw and considered that there was great reason in his friends perswasions which laboured to comfort him, and that his souldiers came to the doore of his Tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beseeching him to leade them backe againe; in the end he tooke pittie of them, and was contented to returne.

returne. This notwithstanding, before he departed from those parts, he put forth many vaine and false devices to make his name immortal among that people. He made Armourers of greater proportion than his owne, and mangers for horses, higher then the common sort: moreover, he made bits also farre heavier then the common sort, and made them to be throwne and scattered abroad in every place. He built great altars also in honour of the gods; the which the Kings of the PRASIANS have in great veneration at this day, and passing over the River, do make sacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very young man, and saw that Alexander himself, and said afterwards, that Alexander had well-neare taken and won all the Countrey, the King which then reigned, was so hated of all his subjects for his wicked life, and base parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to see the great sea Oceanum, and made diverse boates with Oares, in the which he easily went downe the Rivers at his pleasure. Howbeit, this his pleasure going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and did assaile Cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in assailing the City of the MALLIANS (which they say are the warlikest men of all the INDIANS) he was almost slaine there. For having with Darts repulld the enemies from the wall, he himself was the first man that set foot on a ladder to get up, the which brake asleepe as ever he was gotten upon the Ramper. Then the barbarous people coming together against the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted upon him. Alexander having few of his men about him, made no more ado, but leaped down from the Wall in the middest of his enemies, and by good happe lighted on his feet. His Harnesse making a great noise with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had seen some light or spirit go before them: so that at the first they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne scattering here and there. But after that, when they came again to themselves, and saw that he had but two Gentlemen only about him, they came and set upon him of all hands, and fought with him at the sword or push of the Pike, and so hurt him very sore through his Armour: but one amongst the rest, being somewhat farther off, gave him such a terrible blow with an Arrow, that he strake him through his Curaces, and shot him in at the side under his breast. The blow entred so into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had stricken him with his Arrow, ranne suddainly to him with a Cimicer drawn in his hand: howbeit as Pancestus and Limnaeus stepped before him, and were both hurt, Limnaeus was slaine presently, and Pancestus fought it out, till at the length Alexander his self slew the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many grievous wounds upon his body. At the length he had a blow with a Dart on his necke, that so astonished him, that he leaned against the Wall looking upon his enemies. In the meane time the MACEDONIANS compassing him round about, tooke him, and carried him into his Tent halfe in a swoond, and was past knowledge: whereupon there ranne a rumour straight in the Campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much ado to cut the Arrow asunder that was of wood: so his Curaces being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the Arrow head out of his body, which stucke in one of his bones: the which (as it is reported) was four fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he swooned so off, that he was almost dead. This notwithstanding, he overcame the danger, and escaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recover himselfe, and never came out of his Tent: untill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and make great noise about his Tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night-gowne, and came out amongst them all: and after he had done sacrifice unto the gods for recovery of his health, he went on his journey againe, and in the same did conquer many great Countries, and took divers goodly Cities. He did also take ten of the wise men of the Countrey, which men do all go naked, and therefore are called GYMNOPISTAE (to wit, Philosophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, and had done great hurt unto the MACEDONIANS. And because they were taken to be the sharpest and readiest of answer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard questions, and told them he would put the first man to death, that answered worst, and so the rest in order: and made the eldest among them Judge of their answers. The question he asked the first man, was this:

1. Whether the dead or the living were the greater number? He answered, The living: for the dead said he, are no more men.
2. The second man he asked: Whether the earth or the sea brought forth most creatures? He answered, The earth. For the sea, said he, is but a part of the earth.
3. To the third man: Which of all beasts was the subtillest? That (said he) which man hitherto never knew.
4. To the fourth: why he did make Sabbas rebell? Because, said he, he should live honourably, or die vilely.
5. To the fifth, Which he thought was first, the day or the night? He answered, the day, by a day. The King finding his answer strange, added too this speech: Strange questions must needs have strange answers.
6. Coming to the sixth man, he asked him: How a man should come to be beloved? If he be a good man, said he, not terrible.
7. To the seventh, How a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man.
8. To the eighth: Which was the stronger, life, or death? Life, said he, that suffereth so many troubles.
9. And unto the ninth and last man: how long a man should live? Untill, said he, he think it better to die then to live.

When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned unto the Judge, and bade him give his judgement upon them. The Judge said, they had all answered one worse then another. Then shalt thou die first, said Alexander, because thou hast given such sentence: Not so O King, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer: because thou saidst, that thou wouldst kill him first, that had answered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He sent Onesicritus also unto the other wife men of the INDIANS, which were of greatest fame among them, and that led a solitary and quiet life, to pray them to come unto him. This Onesicritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cyniks scholar. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wife men, very sharply and proudly bade him put off his clothes to hear his words naked: or otherwise that he would not speak to him, though he came from Jupiter himself. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he having learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, said: that they seemed to have been wife men, and well borne, notwithstanding that they had revered the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithstanding, that Dandamis said nothing, but asked why Alexander had taken so painful a journey in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus (whose right name otherwise was Sphines) King Taxiles perswaded him to go unto Alexander: who because he saluted those he met in the INDIAN tongue, saying, Cale, as much as to say, as God save ye, the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexander a figure and similitude of his Kingdome, which was this. He threw down before him a dry seare peece of leather, and then put his foot upon one of the ends of it. The leather being troden down on that side, rose up in all parts else, and going up and down withall, still treading upon the sides of the leather, he made Alexander see, that the leather being troden down, on the one side did rise up of all sides else, untill such time as he put his foot in the midst of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plaine alike, his meaning thereby, was to let Alexander understand, that the most part of his time he should keep in the midst of his Country, and not to go faare from it. Alexander continued seven moneths travelling upon the Rivers, to go see the great sea Oceanum. Then he took ship and sailed into a little Island called SCYRUSTIS. howbeit others call it PSITULICIS. There he landed, made sacrifices unto the gods, and viewed the greatnesse and nature of the Oceanum, and all the situation of the coasts upon that sea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers unto the gods, that no conqueror living after him should go beyond the bounds of his journey and conquest, and so returned homeward. He commanded his ships should fetch a compass about, and leave INDIA on the right hand: and made Nearchus Admirall of all his Fleet, and Onesicritus chiefe Pilote. He himself in the mean time went by land through the Country of the ORITES, and there he found great scarcity of victuals, and lost many of his men: so that he carried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all fixe seore thousand footmen, and fifteen thousand horsemen. Some of them died of grievous diseases: others by ill diet: others by extreame heate and drought, and the most part of them by hunger, travelling through this barren Country, where the poor men lived hardly, and had onely a few sheep which they fed with sea fish, that made their flesh savour ill favourably. At the length, when in threescore dayes journey he had painfully travelled through his Country, he then entred into the Country called GEDROSIA, where he found great plenty of all kind of victuals, which the Governors, Kings and Princes, neighbors unto the same, did send unto him. After he that had refreshed his Army there a little, he went through the Country of CARMANIA, where he continued seven dayes together banquetting, going still through the Country. For night and day he was feasting continually with his friends upon a scaffold, longer then broad, rising up of height and drawn with eight goodly horses. After that scaffold followed divers other Charrers covered over with some goodly rich Arras, and purple silke; others with trim fresh boughs, which they renewed at every fields end: and in those were Alexanders other friends and Captaines with Garlands of flowers upon their heads, which dranke and made merry together. In all his Army, there was neither Helmet, Pike, Dart, nor Target seen: but gold and silver bowles, cups, and flagons in the souldiers hands, all the way as they went, drawing Wine out of great pipes and vessels, which they carried with them, one drinking to another, some marching in the fields going forward, and others also set at the table. About them were the minstrels playing and piping on their Flutes and Shalmes, and women singing and dancing, and fooling by the way as they went. In all this dissolute marching through the Country, and in the midst of their drunkenesse, they mingled with it sport, that every man did strive to counterfeite all the insolencies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus himself had been there in person, and had led the mumery. When he came unto the Kings Cattle of GEDROSIA, he said there also certain dayes to refresh his Army with feasting and banquetting. It is said, that one day when he drank hard, he went to see the games for dancing, and amongst them, the games which a young man called Bagoas had set forth (with whom Alexander fell in liking) and bare the best. This Bagoas being in his dancing garments, came through the Theater, and face him down by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were so glad of it, that they shouted and clapped their hands for joy, crying out aloud to kisse him: so that in fine he took him in his armes and kissed him before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall unto him, who made report what he had seen and done in his navigation. Alexander was so glad of that, as he was desirous to saile by sea himself: and so entering into the Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great Fleet of ships, to compass in all the coasts of ARABIA and AFRICKE, and thence into Mare Mediterraneum, by the straights of Hercules. To this intent he built a great number of ships in the City of TYRUS, and sent for Mariners, ship-masters and Pilots of all parts. But now the difficulty of the journey which he took upon him for the conquest conquest of INDIA, the danger he was in when he fought with the MALLIANS and the number of his men which he lost besides, which was very great: all these things considered together making men believe that he should never returne with safety, they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to rise against him, and gave his Governours and Lieutenants of Provinces occasion to commit great insolencies, robberies and exactions of people. To be short, it put all his Kingdome into broile and sedition. Infomuch as Olympias and Cleopatra rising against Antipater, they divided his Government between them: Olympias chusing for her the Kingdome of EPIRUS: and Cleopatra the Kingdome of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard, he said, his mother was the wisest for the Realme of MACEDON would never have suffered a woman to reign over them. Thereupon he sent Nearchus backe again to the sea, determining to fill all the sea coasts with war. As he travelled through the Countries far from the sea, he put his Captaines and Governours that had revolted against him: and of those he slew Oxiathres, one of Abulites sons, by his own hand running him through with a Pike. And when Abulites self also had brought Alexander three thousand talents only, without any other provision made for victuals for his Army, he made him put the money before his horse, which would not once touch it. Then said he unto him, I pray thee to what purpose serveth this provision? and therewithall immediately committed him to prison. As he came through the Country of PERSIA, he first renewed the old custome there, which was: that as oftentimes as the Kings did returne home from any far journey, they gave unto every woman a crown a peece. It is said therefore that for this cause, some of their natural Kings many times did not return again into their Country: and that Ochus amongst others did not so much as once returne backe againe, willingly banishing himself out of his Country, of niggardlinesse, because he would not be at this charge. After that Cyrus tombe (King of PERSIA) being found and broken up, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the City of PELLA (and none of the meanest) called Polymachus. When he read the inscription written upon it in the PERSIAN tongue, he would needs have it written in the Greek tongue: and this it was: O man what so thou art, and whence soever thou comest; for I know thou shalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia: I pray thee envie me not, for this little earth that covereth my body. These words pierced Alexanders heart, when he considered the uncertainty of worldly things. There also Calanus the INDIAN Philosopher, having had a flux a little while, prayed that they would make him a sticke of wood, such as they use to burn dead bodies on, and then rode thither on horse-backe: and after he had made his prayer unto the gods, he cast those sprinklings upon him which were used to be sprinkled at the funerals of the dead: then cutting off a lock of his haire before he went upon the woodstake, he had all the MACEDONIANS that were there farewell, and shoke them by the hands, praying them that day to be merry, and drinke freely with the King, whom he would see shortly after in the City of BABYLON. When he had said these words, he laid him downe upon the woodstake, covered his face, nor never stirred hand nor foot, nor quitted when the fire took him, but did sacrifice himself in this sort, as the manner of his Country was, that the wife men should so sacrifice themselves. Another INDIAN also, who followed Julius Cesar, did the like many yeares after in the City of ATHENS: and there is his tombe yet to be seen, commonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came from seeing this sacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diverse of his friends and Captaines to supper to him, and there did bring forth a Crowne for a reward unto him that dranke best. He that dranke most of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure Gallons of Wine, and won the Crown worth a talent: but he lived not above three dayes after. And of other also that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drinke most, there died of them (as Chares writeth) one and forty persons, of an extreme cold that tooke them in their drunkenesse and Wine. When they were in the City of SUSA, he married certain of his friends, and himselfe also married Statira, one of King Darius Daughters, disposing also of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their estate and birth) unto his best friends. He made also a solemne feast of common marriages amongst the MACEDONIANS, of them that had been married before. At which feast it is written, that nine thousand persons sitting at the boards, he gave unto every one of them a cup of gold to offer Wine in honour of the gods. And there also amongst other wonderful gifts, he did pay all the debts the MACEDONIANS ought unto their creditours, the which amounted unto the summe of ten thousand talents, saving a hundred and thirty lesse. Whereupon Antigonus with one eye, fallily putting in his name amongst the number of the debtours, and bringing in one that said he had lent him money, Alexander caused him to be payed: but afterwards when it was proved to his face, that there was no such matter, Alexander then was so offended, that he banished him his Court, and deprived him of his Captaineship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed himselfe a valiant man in the warres. For when he was but a young man he was shot into the eye, before the City of PERINTE, which King Philip did besiege, and at that present time they would have plucked the Arrow out of his eye, but he never fainter for it, neither would suffer them to pull it out, before he had first driven his enemies within the walls of their City. He took this injury very inwardly and he was so fovy for it, that every man might see he was like to die for sorrow. Then Alexander, fearing he should die, did pardon him, and bade him besides keep the money which was given him. Now the thirty thousand young Boyes which Alexander had left to the government of Captaines, to traine and exercise them in the discipline of warre, they being grown strong men, and lusty youths, excellently well trained and ready in Armes, Alexander rejoyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS and made them greatly afraid because they thought that from thenceforth the King would make lesse account of them. For when Alexander would have sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low Country to the sea side, they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to send these poore men from him in that sort. (after they had done him all the service they could) home to their Country and friends, in worse case then he took them from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men unserviceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly young dancers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was marvellously offended with their proud words, inso much that in his anger he reviled them all, put away his ordinary guard, and took other PERSIANS in their place, making some the guard about his own person; others, his Ushers, Heralds, and Ministers to execute his will and commandement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, and themselves so shamefully rejected, they let fall their stoutnesse, and after they had communed of the matter together, they were ready to teare themselves for spite and malice. In fine, when they had laid their heads together, they consented to go unto his Tent, and without weapons, naked in their shirts, to yeeld themselves unto him weeping and howling, beseeching him to do with them what pleased him, and to use them like wretched unthankful creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somewhat pacified, did not receive them the first time, neither did they also go their wayes, but remained there two dayes and nights together in this grievous and pittifull state, before the doore of his Tent, lamenting unto him, and calling him their Sovereigne, and King; untill that he came himselfe out of his Tent the third day, and seeing the poore wretches in this pittifull state, he himselfe fell a weeping a long time. So, after he had a little rebuked them, he called them courteously, and gave the impotent and sicke persons leave to depart home, rewarding them very honourably. Furthermore he wrote unto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should give them awayes the highest place in all common sports and assemblies, and that they should be crowned with Garlands of Flowers. Moreover, he commanded that the Orphans whose parents were slaine in the wars, should receive the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come unto the City of ECBATAN, in the Kingdom of MEDIA, and that he had dispatched his weightiest causes, he gave himselfe again unto publicke sports, feasts and pastimes; for that there were newly come unto him out of GREECE, three thousand excellent masters and devisers of such sports. About that time it chanced, that Hephestion fell sicke of an Ague. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should have done, but having spied opportunity that his Physician Glaucus was gone unto the Theater, to see the sports and pastimes, he went to dinner, and eat a roasted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of Wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereupon his Feaver took him so sorely, that he lived not long after. Alexander unwisely tooke the chance of his death, and commanded all the haire of his Horse and Mules to be presently shorne, in token of mourning; and that all the battlements of the Wall of Cities also should be overthrown, and hung up poor Glaucus his Physician upon a crosse, and commanded that no minitrell should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his Campe: untill that there was brought him an Oracle from Jupiter Hammon, commanding that Hephestion should be worshipped and sacrificed unto, as a demy-god. In the end, to passe over this mourning and sorrow, he went unto the warres, as unto an hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the COSSAIIANS, whom he pluckt up by the rootes, and slew man, woman, and child. And this was called the sacrifice of Hephestions Funerals. Alexander furthermore being desirous to bestow tenne thousand talents cost upon his obsequies and Funerals, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenesse and excellency of workmanship, amongst all other excellent Worke-masters, he desired one Stasicles: for he had ever passing invention, and his worke was alwayes statly and sumptuous in any new thing he took in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, told him, that of all mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to resemble the Statue or Image of a man, then was mount Atbo in THRACIA: and that if it were his pleasure, he would make the noblest and most durable Image, that should be in the world, which in the left hand should hold a City to containe ten thousand persons, and out of the right hand, there should runne a great River into the Sea. Yet Alexander would not hearken to him, but then was talking with other Workemen of more strange inventions, and farre greater cost. Now as he was ready to take his journey to go unto BABYLON, Nearchus his Admirall came againe unto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the River of Euphrates: and told him, how certaine CHALDEAN Soothsayers came unto him, who did warne him that he should not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the Walls of BABYLON, he saw a great number of Crows fighting and killing one of another, and some of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwards being told him that Apollodorus the Governor of the City of BABYLON, having sacrificed unto the gods, to know what should happen to him, he sent for the Soothsayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The Soothsayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what signes he had in the Sacrifice. He answered that the liver of the beast had no head. O gods, said Alexander then, this is an ill signe: notwithstanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not believe Nearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the Country from BABYLON, and did take his pleasure rowing up and down the River of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill signes and tokens one upon another, that made him afraid. For there was a tame Ass that killed one of the greatest and goodliest Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feet. Another time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be anointed to

to play at Tennis, when he should put on his Apparell againe, the young Gentlemen that played with him, found a man set in his Chaire of estate, having the Kings Diademe on his head; and his Gowne on his backe, and said never a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them answer, but at the length coming to himselfe, he said, his name was Dionysius, borne in MESSINA: and being accused for certaine crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had been a long time prisoner: and also that the god Serapis had appeared unto him, and undone his Irons, and that he commanded him to take the Kings Gowne, and his Diademe, and to sit him down in his Chaire of estate, and say never a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counsell of his Soothsayers: but then his mind was troubled, and feared that the gods had forsaken him, and also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexander feared Antipater and his sons above all other. For one of them called Iolus, was his first Cup-bearer: and his brother called Cassander, was newly come out of GREECE unto him. The first time that Cassander saw some of the barbarous people reverencing Alexander, he having been brought up with the liberty of GREECE, and had never seen the like before, fell into a loud laughing very irreverently. Therewith King Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, and knocked his head and the wall together. Another time also when Cassander did answer some that accused his father Antipater, King Alexander tooke him up sharply, and said unto him: What sayest thou, said he? Doeest thou thinke that these men would have gone so long a journey as this, fallily to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Cassander againe replied unto Alexander and said, that that was a manifest proofe of their false accusation, for that they did now accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not suddainly be disproved. Alexander thereat felt a laughing a good, and said, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & contra: but this will not save you from punishment, if I finde that you have done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Cassander tooke such an inward feare and conceit upon it, that long time after when he was King of MACEDON, and had all GREECE at his commandement, going up and down in the City of DELPHE, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander; which put him into such a suddaine feare, that the haire of his head stood up right, and his body quaked in such sort, that it was a great time before he could come to himselfe againe. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the gods, his mind was so troubled and afraid, that no strange thing happened unto him (how little soever it was) but he tooke it straight for a signe and prediction from the gods: so that his Tent was alwayes full of Priests, and Soothsayers, that did nothing but sacrifice and purific, and tend upon divinements. So horrible a thing is the mistrust and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men; and superstition also so dreadful, that it filled the guilty consciences and fearefull hearts, like water distilling from above: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after he had received some answers touching Hephestion from the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon, he left his sorrow, and returned againe to his banquets and feastings. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his Bath according to his manner, being ready to go to bed, Medius one of his Captaines besought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, so that he got an Ague by it. But that came not (as some write) by drinking up Hercules cup all at a draught; neither for the suddaine paine he felt betweene his shoulders, as if he had beene thrust into the backe with a speare: for all these were thought to be written by some for lies and fables, because they would have made the end of this great Tragedy lamentable and pittifull. But Aristobolus writeth, that he had such an extreame Feaver and thirst withall, that he dranke Wine, and after that fell a raving; and at the length died the thirtieth day of the month of June. In his household booke of things passed daily, it is written, that his Feaver being upon him, he slept in his hot-house on the eighteenth day of June. The next morning after he was come out of his house, he went into his Chamber, and passed away all that with Medius, playing at Dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed himselfe and sacrificed unto the gods, he fell to meate, and had his Feaver that night. And the twentieth day also, bathing himselfe againe, and making his ordinary sacrifice to the gods, he did sit downe to eate within his stove, hearkening unto Nearchus that told him strange things he had sene in the great Sea Oceanum. The one and twentieth day also having done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt himselfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great Feaver: and on that day he made his bed to be removed, and to be set up by the Fish-ponds, where he commanded his Captaines touching certaine roomes that were voide in his Army, and commanded them not to place any man that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day having an extreame Feaver upon him, he was caried unto the sacrifices, and commanded that his chiefe Captaines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner sort, as Centurions and Lieutenants of Bands, that they should watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was carried unto the other pallace of the Kings, which is on the other side of the Lake, where he slept a little, but the Feaver never left him, and when his Captaines and Noblemen came to do him humble reverence, and to see him, he lay speechlesse. So did he the five and twentieth day also: inso much as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out unto his friends and familiars, miliars, and threatned them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, and they coming in their Gownes, went unto his bed-side to see him. That selfe day Pytho and Seleucus were appointed by the Kings friends to go to the Temple of the god Serapis, to know if they should bring King Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they should not remove him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the household booke of remembrance. At that present time, there was no suspicion that he was poisoned. Yet they say, that six years after, there appeared some prooffe that he was poisoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for it was said he gave him poison in his drinke. They thinke it was Aristotle that counfelled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poison was brought, they say that Agnothemis reported it, having heard it of King Antigonus own mouth. The poison (as some say) was cold as ice, and falleth from a rocke in the territory of the City of NO N A C R I S, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horne of the foot of an Asse, for there is no other kind of thing that will keep it, it is so extreame cold and piercing. Others maintaine, and say, that the report of his poisoning is untrue: and for prooffe thereof they alledge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefeft Captaines fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a hot dry Country, and yet there never appeared any signe or token upon his body, that he was poisoned, but was still a clean and fair corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour, but she did malice Statira extreame, and did finely deceive her by a counterfeit letter she sent, as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come unto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her sister, and then threw their bodies into a well, and filled it up with earth, by Perdiccas help and consent. Perdiccas came to be King immediately after Alexanders death by meanes of Aridam, whom he kept above him for his guard and safety: This Aridam, being borne of a strumpet and common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunaticke, not by nature nor by chance, but as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young rowardy boy, by drinckes which Olympias caused to be given him, and thereby continued franticke.

THE LIFE OF JULIUS CÆSAR.

Ann. Mund.

47.

At what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would have had Cæsar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he saw he could neither with any promise nor threat bring him to it, he took her joynter away from him. The cause of Cæsars ill will unto Sylla, was by meanes of marriage: for Marius the elder, married his fathers owne sister, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Cæsar and he were Cousin germanes. Sylla being troubled in weighty matters putting to death so many of his enemies, when he came to be conqueror, he made no reckoning of Cæsar: and he was not contented to be hidden in safety, but came and made suit unto the people for the Priesthoodship that was voide, when he had scant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulsed by Syllas meanes, that secretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to have killed him, some of his friends told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them again, that they did not consider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Cæsar understanding that, stole out of ROME, and hid himself a long time in the Country of the SABINES, wandring still from place to place. But one day being carried from house to house, he fell into the hands of Syllas souldiers, who searched all those places, and took them whom they found hidden. Cæsar bribed the Captain, whose name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gave him. After he had escaped them thus, he went unto the sea side, and took ship, and sailed into BYTHYNIA to go unto King Nicomedes. When he had been with him a while, he took sea again, and was taken by pyrates about the Isle of PHARMACUSA: for those pyrates kept all upon the sea coast, with a great Fleet of ships and boates. They asking him at the first twenty talents for his ransom, Cæsar laughed them to scorn, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, and of himself promised them fifty talents. Then he sent his men up and down to get him this money, so that he was left in a manner alone among these thieves of the CILICIANS (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his friends and two of his slaves onely: and yet he made so little reckoning of them, that when he was desirous to sleep, he sent unto them to command them to make no noise. Thus was he thirty eight dayes among them, not kept prisoner, but rather waited upon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise himself in any sport or pastime they would go to. And otherwhile also he would write verses, and make orations, and call them together to say them before them: and if any of them seemed as though they had not understood him, or passed not for them, he called them block heads and brute beasts, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them up. with the matter as could be, and took all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransom was come from the City of MILETUM, they being paid their money, and he againe set at liberty; he then presently armed and manned certain Ships out of the Haven of MILETUM, to follow those theeves, whom he found yet riding at Anchor in the same Island. So he took the most of them, and had the spoile of their goods; but for their bodies, he brought them into the City of PERGAMUS and there committed them to prison, whilst he himselfe went to speak with Junius, who had the government of ASIA, as unto whom the execution of these Pirates did belong, for that he was Prætor of that Country. But this Prætor having a great fancy to be fingering of the money, because there was good store of it, answered that he would confider of these prisoners at better leisure. Cæsar leaving Junius there, returned again unto PERGAMUS, and there hung up all these theeves openly upon a crosse, as he had oftentimes promised them in the Isle he would do, when they thought he did but jest. Afterwards when Syllaes power began to decay, Cæsar's friends wrote unto him, to pray him to come home again. But he failed first unto RHODES, to study there a time under Apollonius the Son of Molon, whose Scholar also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetorician. It is reported, that Cæsar had an excellent natural gift to speak well before the people, and besides that rare gift, he was excellently well studied, so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, and gave place to the first, because he would be the first and chiefest man of war and authority, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speak well, which his nature could have performed in him, because he was given rather to follow wars, and to manage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a book he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the Readers not to compare the stile of a Souldier, with the Eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned againe unto ROME, he accused Dolabella for his ill behaviour in the Government of the Provinces, and he had divers Cities of GRECE that gave in evidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cæsar to requite the good will of the GRECIANS which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, took their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driven to appeal before the Tribunes at ROME, alleagding, to colour his appeale withall, that he could have no justice in GRECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cæsar immediately wanne many mens good wills at ROME, through his Eloquence, in pleading of their causes, and the people loved him marvellously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speak to every man, and to use them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his years. Furthermore, he ever kept a good board, and fared well at his Table, and was very liberal besides: to the which indeed did advance him forward, and brought him in estimation with the people. His enemies judging, that this favour of the common people would soon quail, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence, suffered him to run on, till by little and little he was grown to be of great strength and power. But in fine, when they had thus given him the bridle to grow to this greatnesse, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeed in fight it would turn one day to the destruction of the whole state and Commonwealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not so little a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will soon make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnesse. Thereupon Cicero like a wise Shipmaster that feareth the calmenesse of the Sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the Commonwealth, found out his craft and malice, which he cunningly cloked under the habite of outward courtesie and familiarity. And yet, said he, when I consider how finely he comberth his faire bush of haire, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger onely, my mind gives me then, that such a kind of man should not have so wicked a thought in his head, as to overthrow the state of the Commonwealth. But this was long time after that. The first shew and prooffe of the love and goodwill which the people did bare unto Cæsar, was when he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footmen) standing against Caius Pompeilius, at that time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second and more manifest proof then the first, was at the death of his Aunt Julia, the wife of Marius the elder. For being her Nephew, he made a solemne Oration in the Market-place in commendation of her, and at her burial did boldly venture to shew forth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were seen after Syllaes victory, because that Marius and all his confederates had been proclaimed Traitors and enemies to the Commonwealth. For when there were some that cryed out upon Cæsar for doing of it, the people on the other side kept stir, and rejoiced at it, clapping of their hands; and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honor again into ROME, which had so long time been obscured and buried. And where it had been an ancient custome of long time, that the ROMANES used to make Funeral Orations in praise of old Ladies and Matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cæsar was the first that praised his own Wife with Funeral Oration when she was dead, the which also did encrease the peoples goodwills the more, seeing him of so kind and gentle nature. After the buriall of his Wife, he was made Treasur-er under Antistius Vetus Prætor, whom he honoured ever after: so that when himselfe came to be Prætor, he made his Son to be chosen Treasur-er. Afterwards, when he was come out of that Office, he married his third Wife Pompeia, having a daughter by his first Wife, Cornelia, which was married unto Pompey the Great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as some thought) thought) but a vaine and short glory of the favour of the people (where indeed he bought good cheape the greatest things that could be) some say, that before he bare any Office in the Commonwealth, he was grown in debt, to the summe of thirteen hundred talents. Furthermore, because he was made over-seer of the worke, for the high way called Appian way, he disbursed a great summe of his owne money towards the charges of the same. And on the other side, when he was made Edilis, for that he did shew the people the pastime of three hundred and twenty couple of sword players, and did besides exceed all other in sumptuousnesse in the sports and common feasts, which he made to delight them withall (and did as it were drowne all the stately shews of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so pleased the people, and wan their love therewith, that they devised daily to give him new Offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in ROME, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power; and the other of Marius, which then was under foote, and durst not shew it selfe. But Cæsar because he would renew it againe, even at that time when he being Edilis, all the feasts and common sports were in their greatest ruffe, he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that carried triumphs; and those he set up one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when every man saw glittering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won upon the CIMBRES, every one marvelled much at the boldnesse of him that durst set them up there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ranne straight through all the City, and every man came thither to see them. Then some cried out upon Cæsar, and said, it was a tyranny which he meant to set up, by renewing of such honours as before had been troden under foot and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a bait to gage the peoples good wills, which he had set out in the stately shewes of his common playes, to see if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide such parts to be played, and a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on the other side encouraging one another, shewed themselves straight a great number gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring again with their cries and Clapping of hands: inso much as the teares ran down many of their cheeks, for very joy, when they saw the images of Marius, and they extolled Cæsar to the skies, judging him the worthiest man of all the kindred of Marius. The Senate being assembled thereupon, Catulus Lucilius, one of the greatest authority at that time in ROME, rose, and vehemently inveighed against Cæsar, and spake that then which ever since hath been noted much: that Cæsar did not now covertly go to worke, but by plain force sought to alter the state of the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, Cæsar at that time answered him so, that the Senat was satisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimation did grow in better hope then before, and perswaded him, that hardly he should give place to no man, and that through the goodwill of the people, he should be better then all they, and come to be the chiefest man of the City. At that time the chiefe Bishop Metellus died, and two of the notablest men of the City, and of the greatest authority (Isauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cæsar notwithstanding their contention, would give neither of them both place, but presented himself to the people, and made suite for it as they did. The suite being equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, because he was a man of greater calling and dignity than the other, doubting the uncertainty of the election, sent unto Cæsar a good summe of money, to make him leave off his suite. But Cæsar sent him word againe, that he would lend a greater summe then that, to maintaine the suite against him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the doore of his house, Cæsar weeping, kissed her, and said: Mother, this day thou shalt see thy sonne chiefe Bishop of ROME, or banished from ROME. In fine, when the voices of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated, Cæsar wanne the victory, and made the Senate and Noble men all afraid of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piso fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cæsar, when he knew that he was of conspiracy with Catiline, and had opportunity to have done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to overthrow the state of the Commonwealth, but utterly to destroy the Empire of ROME, he escaped out of the hands of justice for lacke of sufficient prooffe, before his full treason and determination was knowne. Notwithstanding he left Lentulus and Cæbeus in the City, companions of his conspiracy: unto whom, whether Cæsar did give any secret helpe or comfort, it is not well known. Yet this is manifest; that when they were convinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Confull, asking every mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should have, and every one of them till it came to Cæsar, gave sentence they should die: Cæsar then rising up to speake, made an oration (permed and premeditated before) and said, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their custome did beare it to put men of such Nobility to death (but in an extremity) without lawfull inditement: and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in prison in some City of ITALY, where Cicero thought best untill that Catiline were overthrowne, the Senate then might at their pleasure quickly take such order therein, as might appear best unto their wisdomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was uttered with such a passing good grace, and eloquence, that not onely they which were to speake after him did approve it: but such also as had spoken to the contrary before, revoked their opinion, and stucke to his, until it came to Cato and Catulus to speake. They both did sharply inveigh against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæsar suspected to be of the conspiracy, and stoutly spake against him, inso much that the offenders were put into the hands of the Officers to be put to death. The love of P. Clodius unto Pompeia, Cæsar's wife.

Clodius taken in the sacrifices of the good goddess.
Clodius accused for prophaning the sacrifices of the good goddess.
Cæsar putteth away his wife Pompeia.

Cicero for the safety of his person, did set upon him with their swords drawne. But some say that Curio covered Cæsar with his Gowne, and tooke him out of their hands. And Cicero selfe, when the young men looked upon him, beckened with his head that they should not kill him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a part. But if that were true, I marvell why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Consulship. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he tooke not the opportunity offered him against Cæsar, onely for overmuch feare of the people, that loved him very dearly. For shortly after, when Cæsar went into the Senate, to cleare himselfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations objected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer, than they were wont: the people came about the Councill-house, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the insurrection of the poore needy persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæsar, and did also move the people to stirre, did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribution of Corne unto them, for a moneth. This distribution did put the Common-wealth to a new charge of five hundred and fifty Myriades. This counsell quenched a present great feare, and did in happy time scatter and disperse abroad the best part of Cæsar's force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he never fought any alteration in the Common-wealth, but contrarily he himselfe had a great misfortune fell on his house, which was this. There was a young Noble man of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth, nor eloquence but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in ROME. He became in love with Pompeia Cæsar's wife, who misliked not withall: notwithstanding she was so straightly looked to, and Aurelia (Cæsar's mother) an honest Gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two lovers could not meete as they would, without great perill and difficulty. The ROMANES do use to honor a goddesse, which they call the good goddesse, as the GRECIANS have her whom they call Gynæcia, to wit, the goddesse of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS do claime to be peculiar unto them, saying: that she is King Midas mother. Howbeit the ROMANES hold opinion, that it is a Nymph of the Woodes married unto the god Fannus. The GRECIANS, they also, that she was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for prooffe hereof, on her feast day, the women make certaine Tabernacles of vine twiggies, and leaves of vine branches; and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy Dragon for this goddesse, and do set it by her: besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say, that the women in these sacrifices do many things among themselves, much like unto the Ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast came, the husband (whether he were Prætor or Consul) and all his men and the boyes in the house, do come out of it, and leave it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, and there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they do besides passe the night away in songs and musick. Pompeia Cæsar's wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feast, Clodius who had yet no haire on his face, and thereby thought he should not be bewrayed, disguised himselfe in a singing Wench's apparell, because his face was very like unto a young Wench. He finding the Gates open, being secretly brought in by her Chamber-maide that was made privy unto it, the left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistress, to tell her that he was come. The Chamber-maide tarried long before she came againe, inasmuch as Clodius being weary waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the light; and was by chance met withall by one of Aurelia's maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he tarried for Abra one of Pompeia's women. So Aurelia maide knowing him by his voice, ranne straight where the lights and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women therewith were so amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leave off the Ceremonies of the Sacrifice, and to hide their secret things; and having seene the Gates fast locked, went immediately up and downe the house with Torch-light to seeke out this man: who at the last was found out in the Chamber of Pompeia's maide, with whom he hid himselfe. Thus Clodius being found out, and knowne of the women, they thrust him out of the doores by the shoulders. The same night the women told their husbands of this chance as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumour through the City, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deserved, not onely to be punished of them whom he had slandered, but also of the Common-wealth and the gods. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of High Treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chieftest of the Nobility and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burthened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was married unto Lucullus. Notwithstanding the people stoutly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Judges, which were amazed, and afraid to stirre the people. This notwithstanding, Cæsar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witness against him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they objected against Clodius. This answer being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Cæsar, why then he had put away his wife: Because I will not, said he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cæsar spake truly as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to save Clodius. So Clodius was discharged discharged of this Accusation, because the most part of the Judges gave a confused Judgement, for the feare they stood in one way, of the danger of the common People, if they condemned him, and for the ill opinion on the other side of the Nobility, if they did quit him. The government of the Province of SPAIN being fallen unto Cæsar, for that he was Prætor, his Creditors came and cried out upon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cæsar being unable to satisfie them, was compelled to go unto Crassus, who was the richest man of all ROME, and that stood in neede of Cæsar's boldnesse and courage to withstand Pompey's greatnesse in the Common-wealth. Crassus became his surety unto his greediest Creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirty Talents: whereupon they suffered Cæsar to depart to the government of his Province. In this Journey it is reported, that passing over the Mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a little poore Village that had not many Houfholds, and yet poore Cortages. There his friends that did accompany him, asked him merrily, if there were any contending for Offices in that Towne, and whether there were any strife there amongst the Noblemen for honour. Cæsar speaking in good earnest, answered: I cannot tell that, said he, but for my part I had rather be the chieftest man here, then the second person in ROME. Another time also when he was in SPAIN, reading the History of Alexander's acts, when he had read it, he was sorrowfull a good while after, and then burst out in weeping. His friends seeing that, marvelled what should be the cause of his sorrow. He answered them, Do you not thinke, said he, that I have good cause to be heavie, when King Alexander being no elder then my selfe is now, had in old time wonne so many Nations and Countreys: and that I hitherto have done nothing worthy of my selfe? Therefore when he was come into SPAIN, he was very carefull of his businesse, and had in few daies joyned ten new Ensignes more of Footmen, unto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward against the CALLESIANES and LUSITANIANES, he conquered all, and went as far as the great Sea Oceanum, subduing all the People which before knew not the ROMANES for their Lords. There he tooke order for pacifying of the Warre, and did as wisely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the Cities together, and made them friends one with another, but specially he pacified all suites of Law, and strife betwixt the Debtors and Creditors, which grew by reason of usury. For he ordained that the Creditors should take yearly two parts of the Revenue of their Debtors, untill such time as they had payed themselves: and that the Debtors should have the third part themselves to live withall. He having wonne great estimation by this good order taken, returned from his Government very rich, and his Souldiers also full of rich Spoiles, who called him Imperator, to say, Sovereigne Captaine. Now the ROMANES having a custome, that such as demanded honour of Triumph, should remaine a while without the City, and that they on the other side which sued for the Consulship, should necessity be there in person: Cæsar coming unhappily at the very time when the Consuls were chosen, he sent to pray the Senate to do him that favour, that being absent he might by his friends sue for the Consulship. Cato at the first did vehemently inveigh against it, vouching an expresse Law to the contrary. But afterwards, perceiving that notwithstanding the reasons he alledged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæsar) favoured his request, yet he cunningly sought all he could to prevent them, prolonging time, in dilating his Oration untill night. Cæsar thereupon determined rather to give over the suite of his Triumph, and to make suite for the Consulship: and so came into the City, and had such a device with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato onely. His device was this: Pompey and Crassus, two of the greatest personages of the City of ROME being at jarre together, Cæsar made them friends, and by that means got unto himselfe the power of them both, for by colour of that gentle act and friendship of his, he subtilly (unawares to them all) did greatly alter and change the state of the Common-wealth. For it was not the private discord betwene Pompey and Cæsar, as many men thought, that caused the Civill-warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who joyned all their Powers first to overthrow the state of the Senate and Nobility, and afterwards they fell at jarre one with another. But Cato that then foresaw and prophesied many times what would follow, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwards they found him a wiser man, then happy in his Counsell. Thus Cæsar being brought unto the Assembly of the election, in the middle of these two noble persons, whom he had before reconciled together, he was there chosen Consul with Calpurnius Bibulus, without gain-saying, or contradiction of any man. Now Consulship when he was entred into his Office, he began to put forth Lawes meeter for a seditious Tribune of the People, then for a Consul: because by them he preferred the division of Lands, and distributing of Corne to every Citizen gratis, to please them withall. But when the Noblemen of the Senate were against his device, he desiring no better occasion, began to cry out, and to protest, that by the over-bardnesse and austeritie of the Senate, they drave him against his will to leane unto the People: and thereupon having Crassus on the one side of him, and Pompey on the other, he asked them openly in the Assembly, if they did give their consent unto the Lawes which he had put forth. They both answered, they did. Then he prayed them to stand by him against those that threatened him with force of Sword to lett him. Crassus gave him his word, he would, Pompey also did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his Sword and Target both, against them that would withstand him with their Swords. These words offended much the Senate, being farre unmeetere for his gravity, and undecent for the Majesty and Honour he carried, and most of all uncomely for the presence of the Senate, whom he should have revered: and were speeches fitter for a rash light-headed youth, then for his Person. Howbeit the common People on the other side, they rejoiced: E c c

Then Caesar because he would be more assured of Pompeys power and friendship, he gave him his Daughter Julia in Marriage, which was made sure before unto Servilius Cæpio, and promised him in exchange Pompeys Daughter, who was sure also unto Faustus the Sonne of Sylla. And shortly after also, Caesar selfe did marry Calpurnia, the Daughter of Piso, whom he caused to be made Consul, to succeed him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnesse, that it was a shamefull matter, and not to be suffered, that they should in that sort make havocke of the Empire of ROME, by such horrible bawdy matches, distributing among themselves through those wicked marriages, the Governments of the Provinces, and of great Armies. Calpurnius Bibulus, fellow-Consull with Caesar, perceiving that he did contend in vaine, making all the resistance he could to withstand this Law, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be slaine with Cato, in the Market-place and Assembly; he kept close in his House all the rest of his Consulship. When Pompey had married Julia, he filled all the Market-place with Souldiers, and by open force authorized the Lawes which Caesar made in the behalfe of the People. Furthermore, he procured that Caesar had GAULE on this side and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with foure Legions granted him for five yeares. Then Cato standing up to speake against it, Caesar bade his Officers lay hold on him, and carry him to prison, thinking he would have appealed unto the Tribunes. But Cato said never a word when he went his way. Caesar perceiving then, that not onely the Senators and Nobility were offended, but that the common People also for the reverence they bare unto Catos vertues, were ashamed, and went away with silence; he himselfe secretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the Officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be President of the Senate under him, but left the City, because they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Cædicius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to Councell, because they were afraid of his Souldiers. Caesar answered him againe; and why then doest not thou keepe thee at home, for the same feare? Cædicius replied, because my age taketh away feare from me: for having so short a time to live, I have no care to prolong it further. The shamefull part that Caesar played while he was Consul, seemeth to be this: when he chose P. Clodius Tribune of the People, that had offered his Wife such dishonour, and prophaned the holy ancient Mysteries of the Women, which were celebrated in his owne House. Clodius sued to be Tribune no to other end, but to destroy Cicero: and Caesar selfe also departed not from ROME to his Army before he had set them together by the eares, and driven Cicero out of ITALY. All these things they say he did, before the Warres with the GAULES. But the time of the great Armies and Conquests he made afterwards, and of the Warre in which he subdued all the GAULES (entring into another course of life far contrary unto the first) made him to be knowne for as valiant a Souldier, and as excellent a Capitaine to lead them, as those that afore him had beene counted the wisest and most valiant Generals that ever were, and that by their valiant deedes had achieved great honour. For whosoever would compare the House of the Fabians, of the Scipios, of the Metellians, yea those also of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey selfe:

It will appeare that Caesars prowesse, and deedes of Armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard Countreys where he made Warres: another, in enlarging the Realmes and Countreys which he joyned unto the Empire of ROME: another, in the multitude and power of his Enemies whom he overcame: another in the rudenesse and austere nature of men with whom he had to do, whose manners afterwards he softned and made civill: another, in courtesie and clemency which he used unto them whom he had conquered: another, in great bounty and liberality bestowed unto them that served under him in those Warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of Battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his Enemies he had slaine in Battell. For in lesse then tenne yeares Warre in GAULE, he tooke by force and assault above eight hundred Townes, he conquered three hundred severall Nations: and having before him in Battell thirty hundred thousand Souldiers, at sundry times, he slew tenne hundred thousand of them, and tooke as many more Prisoners. Furthermore, he was so entirely beloved of his Souldiers, that to doe him service (where otherwise they were no more then other men in any private quarrell) if Caesars honour were touched, they were invincible, and would so desperately venture themselves, and with such fury, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Acilius: who in a Battell by Sea before the City of MARSEILLES, boarding one of his Enemies Shippes, one cut off his right hand with a Sword; but yet he forooke not his Target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his Enemies faces, and made them flie, so that he wanne their Shippe from them. And Cassius Scæva also, in a Conflit before the City of DYRRACHIUM, having one of his eyes put out with an Arrow, his shoulder stricken through with a Dart, and his thigh with another, and having received thirty Arrows upon his Shield, he called to his Enemies, and made as though he would yeeld unto them. But when two of them came running to him, he that clave one of their shoulders from his body with his Sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, and at the length saved himselfe, by meanes of his Companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITTAINE also, when the Captaines of the Bands were driven into a Marish or Bogge full of mire and dirt, and that the Enemies did fiercely assaile them there, Caesar then standing to view the Battell, he saw a private Souldier of his thrust in among the

the Captaines, and fought so valiantly in their defence, that at the length he drave the barbarous People to flie, and by his meanes saved the Captaines, which otherwise were in great danger to have beene cast away. Then this Souldier being the hindmost man of all the Captaines, marching with great paine through the mire and dirt, halfe swimming, and halfe on foote, in the end got to the other side, but left his Shield behinde him. Caesar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with joy to embrace him. But the poore Souldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell downe at Caesars feete, and besought him to pardon him, for that he had left his Target behinde him. And in AFRICK also, Scipio having taken one of Caesars Shippes, and Granus Petronius aboard on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurer; he put all the rest to the Sword but him, and said he would give him his life. But Petronius answered him againe, that Caesars Souldiers did not use to have their lives given them, but to give others their lives: and with these words he drew his Sword, and thrust himselfe through. Now Caesar selfe did breede this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gave them bountifullly, and did honour them also, shewing thereby, that he did not heape up Riches in the Warres, to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honourably to reward their valiant service: and that by so much he thought himselfe rich, by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deserved it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valiantnesse, in putting himselfe at every instant in such manifest danger, and in taking so extreame paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy desire of honour that set him on fire, and pricked him forward to do it: but that he alwaies continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the constitution of his body, he was leane, white, and soft skinned, and often subject to head-ach, and other-while to the falling-sicknesse (the which rooke him the first time, as it is reported, in CORDUBA, a City of SPAINES;) but yet therefore yeelded not to the discafe of his body, to make it a cloake to cherish him withall, but contrarily, toke the paines of Warre, as a Medicine to cure his sicke body, fighting alwaies with his discafe, travelling continually, living soberly, and commonly lying abroad in the Field. For the most nights he slept in his Coach or Litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwaies able to do something: and in the day time, he would travell up and downe the Countrey to see Townes, Castles, and strong places. He had alwaies a Secretary with him in the Coach, who did still write as he went by the way, and a Souldier behinde him that carried his Sword. He made such speede the first time he came from ROME, when he had his Office, that in eight daies he came to the River of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of Horfe from his youth, that holding his hands behinde him, he would gallop his Horfe upon the spur. In his Warres in GAULE, he did further exercise himselfe to indite Letters as he rode by the way; and did occupie two Secretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. As it is reported, that Caesar was the first that devised friends might talke together by writing Cyphers in Letters, when he had no leisure to speake with them for his urgent businesse, and for the great distance besides from ROME. How little account Caesar made of his Diet, this example doth prove it. Caesar supping one night in MILLAINE with his friend Valerius Leo, there was served Sperage to his Boord, and oyle of Perfume put into it, in stead of Sallet-oyle. He simply ate it, and found no fault, blaming his friends that were offended: and told them, that it had beene enough for them to have abstained to eate of that they disliked, and not to shame their friend, and how that he lacked good manners that found fault with his friend. Another time as he travelled through the Countrey, he was driven by foule weather on the sudden to take a poore mans Cottage, that had but one little Cabin in it, and that was so narrow, that one man could but scarce lie in it. Then he said to his friends that were about him, Greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, and the most necessary roomes for the sicke stiperons. And thersupon he caused Oppius that was sicke to lie there all night: and he himselfe, with the rest of his friends, lay without doores, under the eafing of the Houfe. The first Warre that Caesar made with the GAULES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGURINIANS, who having set fire on all their good Cities, to the number of twelve, and foure hundred Villages besides, came to invade that part of GAULE which was subject to the ROMANES, as the CIMBRI and TEUTONS had done before, unto whom for valiantnesse they gave no place: and they were also a great number of them (for they were three hundred thousand soules in all) whereof there were an hundred fourescore and ten thousand fighting men. Of those, it was not Caesar himselfe that overcame the TIGURINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that overthrew them by the River of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themselves came suddenly with their Army to set upon him, as he was going towards a City of his Confederates. Caesar perceiving that, made haste to get him some place of strength, and there did set his men in Battell-ray. When one brought him his Horfe to get upon, which he used in Battell, he said unto them: When I have overcome mine Enemies, I will then get upon him to follow the chase, but now let us give them Charge. Therewith he marched forward on foote, and gave charge: and there fought it out a long time, before he could make them flie that were in Battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their Campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their Carts. For there, they that before had fled from the Battell, did not onely put themselves in force, and valiantly fought it out: but their Wives and Children also fighting for their lives to the death, were all slaine, and the Battell was scant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this Victory was famous, unto that he also added another as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous People that had escaped from this Battell, he gathered together againe above an hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their Countrey which they had forsaken, and unto their Townes and which they had burnt: because he feared the GERMANES would come over the River of Rheyne, and occupie that Countrey lying void. The second Warre he made, was in defence of the GAULES against the GERMANES: although before, he himselfe had caused Ariovistus their King, to be received for a Confederate of the ROMANES. Notwithstanding, they were growne very unquiet Neighbours, and it appeared plainly, that having any occasion offered them to enlarge their Territories, they would not content them with their owne, but meant to invade and possesse the rest of GAULE. Caesar perceiving that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young Gentlemen of noble Houses of ROME, who thought to have gone to the Warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine, he called them to Councell, and commanded them that were afraid, that they should depart home, and not put themselves in danger against their wills. But they had such womanish faint hearts, to shrink when he had neede of them. And for himselfe he said, he would set upon the barbarous People, though he had left him but the tenth Legion onely, saying that the Enemies were no valiantier then the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferior unto Marius. This Oration being made, the Souldiers of the tenth Legion sent their Lieutenants unto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other Legions also fell off with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many daies Journey with good will to serve him, untill they came within two hundred furlongs of the Campe of the Enemies. Ariovistus courage was well cooled, when he saw Caesar was come, and that the ROMANES came to seeke out the GERMANES; where they thought, and made account, that they should not have abidden them: and therefore nothing mistrusting it would have come so to passe, he wondered much at Caesar's courage, and the more when he saw his owne Army in a maze withall. But much more did their courage fall, by reason of the foolish Womens Prophecies they had amongst them, which did foretell things to come: who considering the waves and trouble of the Rivers, and the terrible noise they made running downe the streame, did fore-warnie them not to fight untill the new Moone. Caesar having intelligence thereof, and perceiving that the barbarous People thereupon stirred not, thought it best then to set upon them, being discouraged with the superstitious feare, rather then losing time, he should tarry their leisure. So he did skirmish with them even to their Forts, and little Hills where they lay, and by this meanes provoked them so, that with great fury they came downe to fight. There he overcame them in Battell, and followed them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlongs, even unto the River of Rheyne: and he filled all the Fields thitherto with dead Bodies and Spoiles. Howbeit Ariovistus flying with speede, got over the River of Rheyne, and escaped with a few of his men. It is said that there were flaine fourescore thousand persons at this Battell. After this Exploit, Caesar left his Army amongst the SEQUANES to winter there: and he himselfe in the meane time, thinking of the affaires at ROME, went over the Mountaines into GAULE about the River of Po, being part of his Province which he had in charge. For there the River called Rubico, divideth the rest of ITALY from GAULE on this side of the Alpes. Caesar lying there, did practise to make friends in ROME, because many came thither to see him: unto whom he granted their suites they demanded, and sent them home also, partly with liberal rewards, and partly with large promises and hopes. Now during all this Conquest of the GAULES, Pompey did not consider how Caesar interchangeably did conquer the GAULES with the Weapons of the ROMANES, and wanne the ROMANES againe with the Money of the GAULES. Caesar being advertised that the BELGÆ (which were the warlikest men of all the GAULES, and that occupied the third part of GAULE) were all up in Armes, and had raised a great power of men together: he straight made towards them with all possible speede, and found them spoyling and over-running the Countrey of the GAULES, their Neighbours and Confederates of the ROMANES. So he gave them Battell, and they fighting cowardly, he overthrew the most part of them, which were in a troupe together, and slew such a number of them, that the ROMANES passed over deepe Rivers and Lakes on footes: upon their dead bodies, the Rivers were so full of them. After this overthrow, they that dwelt nearest unto the Sea side, and were next neighbours unto the Ocean, did yeeld themselves without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his Army against the NERVIIANS, the stoutest Warriors of all the BELGÆ. They dwelling in the Wood-Countrey, had conveyed their Wives, Children, and Goods, into a marvellous great Forest, as farre from their Enemies as they could; and being about the number of sixe-score thousand fighting men and more, they came one day and set upon Caesar, when his Army was out of order, and fortifying of his Campe, little looking to have fought that day. At the first Charge, they brake the Horsemen of the ROMANES, and compassing in the twelfth and seventh Legion, they slew all the Centurions and Captaines of the Bands. And had not Caesar selfe taken his Shield on his arme, and flying amongst the barbarous People, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth Legion also seeing him in danger, run unto him from the top of the Hill where they stood in Battell, and broken the Ranks of their Enemies, there had not a ROMANE escaped alive that day. But taking example of Caesar's valiantnesse, they fought desperately beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERVIIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in a manner flaine in the Field. It is written, that of three-score thousand fighting men, there escaped onely but five hundred: and of foure hundred Gentlemen and Councellors of the ROMANES, but three saved. The Senate understanding it at ROME, ordained that they should do Sacrifice unto the gods, and keepe Feasts and solemn Processions fiftene daies together without intermission, having never made the like Ordinance at ROME, for any Victory that ever was obtained. Because they saw the danger had bene marvellous great, so many Nations rising as they did in Armes together against him: and further, the love of the People unto him made his Victory much more famous. For when Caesar had set his affaires at a stay in GAULE, on the other side of the Alpes, he alwaies used to lie about the River of Po in the Winter time, to give direction for the establishing of things at ROME, at his pleasure. For, not onely they that made suite for Offices at ROME, were chosen Magistrates by means of Caesar's Money which he gave them, with the which, bribing the People, they bought their voyces, and when they were in Office, did all that they could to increase Caesar's power and greatnesse: but the greatest and chiefest men also of the Nobility, went into LUCA unto him. As Pompey, Crassus, Appius Drator of SARDINIA, and Nepos Proconsull in SPAIN. Inomuch as there were at one time, The great Lords of Rome, sixe-score Serjants carrying Rods and Axes before the Magistrates: and above two hundred Senators came to Luca to Caesar. Besides. There they fell in Consultation, and determined that Pompey and Crassus should againe be chosen Consuls the next yeare following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Caesar should have Money againe delivered him to pay his Army; and besides, did prorogue the time of his Governement five yeares further. This was thought a very strange and an unreasonable matter unto wise men. For they themselves that had taken so much Money of Caesar, perswaded the Senate to let him have Money of the common Treasure, as though he had had none before: yea to speake more plainly, they compelled the Senate unto it, fighting and lamenting to see the Decrees they passed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before unto CYPRUS. Howbeit Faunius that followed Cato's steps, when he saw that he could not prevaile, nor withstand them, he went out of the Senate in choler, and cried out amongst the People, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him: some for the reverence they bare unto Pompey and Crassus; and others favouring Caesar's proceedings, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet themselves, and stirred not. Then Caesar returning into GAULE beyond the Alpes unto his Army, found there a great Warre in the Countrey. For two great Nations of GERMANIE had not long before passed over the River of Rheyne, to conquer new Lands: and the one of these People were called IPES, and the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the Battell which Caesar fought with them, he himselfe doth describe it in his Commentaries, in this sort. That the barbarous People having sent Ambassadors unto him, to require peace for a certaine time; they notwithstanding, against the Law of Armes, came and set upon him as he traveled by the way, inomuch as eight hundred of their men of Armes overthrew five thousand of his Horsemen, who nothing at all mistrusted their coming. Again, that they sent him other Ambassadors to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole Army to march against them, thinking it a folly and madnesse, to keepe faith with such trayterous barbarous breakers of Leagues. Cannius writeth, that the Senate appointing againe to do new Sacrifices, Processions and Feasts, to give thanks to the gods for this Victory, Cato was of contrary opinion, that Caesar should be delivered into the hands of the barbarous People, for to purge their City and Common-weale of this breach of faith, and to turne the curse upon him that was the Authour of it. Of these barbarous People, which came over the Rheyne (being about the number of foure hundred thousand persons) they were all in manner flaine, saving a very few of them, that flying from the Battell got over the River of Rheyne againe, who were received by the SICAMBRIANS, another People of the GERMANES. Caesar taking this occasion against them, lacking no good will of himselfe besides, to have the honour to be counted the first ROMANE that ever passed over the River of Rheyne with an Army, he built a Bridge over it. This River is marvellous broad, and runneth with great fury; and in that place specially where he built his Bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one side to the other: and it hath so strong, and swift a streame besides, that men casting downe great bodies of Trees into the River (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blows and force thereof marvellously shake the posts of the Bridge he had set up. But to prevent the blows of those Trees, and also to breake the fury of the streame, he made a pile of great Woode above the Bridge a good way, and did forcibly ramme them into the bottome of the River: so that in ten daies space he had set up and finisht his Bridge, of the goodliest Carpenters worke, and most excellent invention to see to, that could be possibly thought or devised. Then passing over his Army upon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the SWABIANS, which were the warlikest People of all GERMANIE, had gotten themselves with their Goods into wonderfull great Valleys and Bogges, full of Woodes and Forests. Now when he had burnt all the Countrey of his Enemies, and confirmed a League with the Confederates of the ROMANES, he returned backe againe into GAULE after he had tarried eightene daies at the most in GERMANIE, on the other side of the Rheyne. The Journey he made also into ENGLAND was a noble Enterprize, and very commendable. For he was the first that sailed the West Ocean with an Army by Sea, and that passed through the Sea Atlanticum with his Army, to make Warre in that so great and famous Island (which many ancient Writers would not believe that it was so indeede, and did make them vary about it, saying it was but a fable and a lie) and was the first that enlarged the ROMANES Empire, beyond the Earth inhabitable.

For twice he passed over the narrow Sea against the firme Land of GAULE, and fighting many Battels there, did hurt his Enemies more then enrich his owne men: because of men hardly brought up, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon the Warre had no such successe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the King, and imposing a yearly Tribute upon him, to be payed unto the People of ROMA, he returned againe into GAULE. There he was no sooner landed, but he found Letters ready to be sent over the Sea unto him: in the which he was advertised from ROMA, of the death of his Daughter, that she was dead with child by Pompey. For the which Pompey, and Caesar both, were marvellous sorrowfull: and their friends mourned also, thinking that this alliance which maintained the Common-wealth (that otherwise was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now severed, and broken asunder; and the rather likely, because the child lived not long after the Mother. So the common People at ROMA tooke the Corpses of Julia, in despite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the Field of Mars. Now Caesar being driven to divide his Army, (that was very great) in sundry Garrisons for the Winter time, and returning againe into ITALY, as he was wont, all GAULE rebelled againe, and had raised great Armies in every Quarter to set upon the ROMANES, and to assay if they could distresse their Forts where they lay in Garrison. The greatest number and most war-like men of these GAULES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and first did set upon the Garrisons of Cotta and Titurius, whom they slew, and all the Souldiers they had about them. Then they went with threescore thousand fighting men, to besiege the Garrison which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almost taken them by force, because all the Souldiers were every man of them hurt: but they were so valiant and courageous, that they did more then men (as they say) in defending of themselves. These newes being come to Caesar, who was far from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speede, and leaving seven thousand Souldiers, made haste to helpe Cicero, that was in such distresse. The GAULES that did besiege Cicero, understanding of Caesar's coming, raised their Sieges incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handful in their hands, they were so few. Caesar to deceive them, still drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his Enemies; and commanded his men in no wise to stirre out to skirmish with them, but compelled them to raise up the Rampiers of his Campe, and to fortifie the Gates, as men that were afraid, because the Enemies should the lesse esteeme of them: untill at length he tooke opportunity, by their disorderly coming to assaile the Trenches of his Campe, (they were growne to such a presumptuous boldnesse and bravery) and then falling out upon them, he put them all to flight, with slaughter of a great number of them. This did suppress all the rebellions of the GAULES in those parts, and furthermore he himselfe in person went in the middle of Winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new supply out of ITALY of three whole Legions, in their roomes which he had lost: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other Legion he himselfe had leaved in GAULE about the River Po. During these stirs, brake forth the beginning of the greatest and most dangerous Warre that he had in all GAULE, the which had beene secretly practised of long time by the chieftest and most Warre-like People of that Countrey, who had leaved a wonderfull great Power. For every where they leaved multitudes of men, and great Riches besides, to fortifie their strong Holds. Furthermore, the Countrey where they rose, was very ill to come unto, and specially at that time, being Winter, when the Rivers were frozen, the Woodes and Forrests covered with Snow, the Meadows drowned with Floods, and the Fields so deepe of Snow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the Marshes nor Rivers to be discerned, all was so overflowne and drowned with water: all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Caesar from setting upon the Rebels. Many Nations of the GAULES were of this Conspiracy, but two of the chieftest were the ARVERNIANES and CARNUTES: who had chosen Vercingetorix for their Lieutenant-Generall, whose Father the GAULES before had put to death, because they thought he aspired to make himselfe King. This Vercingetorix dividing his Army into divers parts, and appointing divers Captaines over them, had gotten to take his part, all the People and Countreys thereabouts, even as farre as they that dwell towards the Sea * Adriaticke, having further determined (understanding that ROMA did conspire against Caesar) to make all GAULE rise in Armes against him. So that if he had but tarried a little longer, untill Caesar had entred into his Civill Warres, he had put all ITALY in as great feare and danger, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and invade him. But Caesar, that was valiant in all assayes and dangers of Warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunity, so soone as he understood the newes of this Rebellion, he departed with speede, and returned backe the selfesame way which he had gone, making the barbarous People know, that they should deale with an Army invincible, and which they could not possibly withstand, considering the great speede he had made with the same, in so sharpe and hard a Winter. For where they would not possibly have believed, that a Post or Carrier could have come in so short a time from the place where he was, unto them, they wondred when they saw him burning and destroying the Countrey, the Townes and strong Forts where he came with his Army, taking all to mercy that yielded unto him: untill such time as the HAUDI tooke Armes against him, who before were wont to be called the brethren of the ROMANES, and were greatly honoured of them. Wherefore Caesar's men, when they understood that they had joyned with the Rebels, they were marvellously sorry, and halfe discouraged thereupon,

Thereupon, Caesar departing from those parts, went through the Countrey of the LINGONES, to enter the Countrey of the *BURGONIANES, who were Confederates of the ROMANES, and the nearest unto ITALY on that side, in respect of all the rest of GAULE. Thither the Enemies came to set upon him, and to environ him on all sides, with an infinite number of thousands of fighting men. Caesar on the other side tarried their coming, and fighting with them a long time, he made them so afraid of him, that at length he overcame the barbarous People. But at the first, it seemeth notwithstanding, that he had received some overthrow: for the ARVERNIANES shewed a sword hanging up in one of their Temples, which they said they had wonne from Caesar. Infomuch as Caesar's selfe, coming that way by occasion, saw it, and fell a laughing at it. But some of his friends going about to take it away, he would not suffer them, but bade them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was an holy thing. Notwithstanding, such as at the first had saved themselves by flying, the most part of them were gotten with their King into the City of ALEXIA, the which Caesar went and besieged, although it seemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the Walls, as also for the multitude of Souldiers they had to defend it. But now during this Siege, he fell into a marvellous great danger without, almost incredible. For an Army of three hundred thousand fighting men, of the best men that were among all the Nations of the GAULES, came against him being at the Siege of ALEXIA, besides them that were within the City, which amounted to the number of threescore and tenne thousand fighting men at the least: so that perceiving he was shut in betwixt two so great Armies, he was driven to fortifie himselfe with two Walls, the one against them of the City, and the other against them without. For if those two Armies had joyned together, Caesar had bene utterly undone. And therefore, this Siege of ALEXIA, and the Battell he wanne before it, did deservedly winne him more Honour and Fame then any other. For there, in that instant and extreme danger, he shewed more valiantnesse and wisdom then he did in any Battell he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this? that they of the City never heard any thing of them that came to aide them, untill Caesar had overthrowne them: and furthermore, that the ROMANES themselves which kept Watch upon the Wall that was built against the City, knew also no more of it then they, untill it was done, and that they heard the cries and lamentations of men and women in ALEXIA, when they perceived on the other side of the City, such a number of glittering Shields of Gold and Silver, such store of bloody Corslets and Armour, such a deale of Plate and Moveables, and such a number of Tents and Pavillions after the fashion of the GAULES, which the ROMANES had gotten of their Spoils in their Campe. Thus suddenly was this great Army vanished, as a Dreame or Vision: where the most part of them were slaine that day in Battell. Furthermore, after that they within the City of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Caesar and themselves also, in the end they all yielded themselves. And Vercingetorix (he that was their King and Captaine in all this Warre) went out of the Gates excellently well armed, and his Horse furnished with rich Caparison accordingly, and rode round about Caesar, who sat in his Chaire of State. Then lighting from his Horse, he took off his Caparison and Furniture, and unarmed himselfe, and laid all on the ground, and went and fate downe at Caesar's feete, and said never a word. So Caesar at length committed him as a Prisoner taken in the Warres, to lead him afterwards in the Triumph of ROMA. Now Caesar had of long time determined to destroy Pompey, and Pompey him also. For Crassus being killed amongst the PARTHIANS, who onely did see, that one of them two must needs fall, nothing kept Caesar from being the greatest person, but because he destroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing lett Pompey to withstand that it should not come to passe, but because he did not first overcome Caesar, whom onely he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but awaited before set light by him, thinking it an easie matter for him to put him downe when he would; sith he had brought him to that greatnesse he was come unto. But Caesar contrarily, having had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a Wrestler that studieth for trickes to overthrow his Adversary, he went far from ROMA, to exercise himselfe in the Warres of GAULE; where he did traine his Army, and presently by his valiant deedes did increase his Fame and Honour, by these meanes became Caesar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution, but some occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gave him, and partly also the time delivered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill Government at that time of the Common-wealth at ROMA. For they that made suite for Honour and Offices, bought the voyces of the People with readie Money, which they gave out openly to usury, without shame or feare. Thereupon the common People that had sold their voyces for Money, came to the Market-place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hired them: not with their voyces, but with their Bowes, Slings and Swords. So that the Assembly seldom times brake up, but the Pulpit for Orations was defiled and sprinkled with the blood of them that were slaine in the Market-place, the City remaining all that time without Government of Magistrate, like a Shippe left without a Pilot. Infomuch as men of deepe judgement and discretion, seeing such fury and madnesse of the People, thought themselves happy if the Commonwealth were no worse troubled then with the absolute state of a Monarchy and Sovereigne Lord to governe them. Furthermore, there were many that were not afraid to speake it openly, that there was no other helpe to remedie the troubles of the Commonwealth, but by the Authority of one man onely, that should command them all: and that this Medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Physician, meaning covertly Pompey. Now Pompey used many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and

and yet cunningly under-hand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Caio finding the marke he shot at, and fearing lest in the end the People should be compelled to make him Dictator, he perswaded the Senate rather to make him sole Consul, that contenting himselfe with that more just and lawfull Government, he should not cover the other unlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not only make him Consul, but further did prorogue his Government of the Provinces he had. For he had two Provinces, all SPAIN and AFRICA, the which he governed by his Lieutenants: and further, he received yearly of the common Treasure to pay his Souldiers, a thousand Talents. Hereupon Caesar tooke occasion also to send his mea to make suite in his name for the Consulship, and also to have the Government of his Provinces prorogued. Pompey at the first held his peace, but Antullus and Leontulus (that otherwise hated Caesar) withstood them; and to shame and dishonour him, had much needlesse speech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the freedome from the Colonies which Caesar had lately brought unto the City of NOVUM CORNIVM in GAULE towards ITALY, where Caesar not long before had lodged them. And moreover, when Marcellus was Consul, he made one of the Senators in that City to be whipped with rods, who came to ROME about those matters: and said, he gave him those marks, that he should know he was no ROMAN Citizen, and bade him go his way, and tell Caesar of it. After Marcellus Consulship, Caesar setting open his Coffers of the Treasure he had gotten among the GAULES, did frankly give it out amongst the Magistrates at ROME, without restraint or spare. First, he let Curio the Tribune cleane out of debt, and gave also unto Paul the Consul a thousand five hundred Talents; with which Money he built that notable Palace by the Market-place, called Pauls Basilick, in the place of Falvius Basilick. Then Pompey being afraid of this practice, began openly to procure, both by himselfe and his friends, that they should send Caesar a Successor: and moreover, he sent unto Caesar for his two Legions of men of Warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of GAULE. Caesar sent him them againe, and gave every private Souldier two hundred and fifty silver Drachmas. Now, they that brought these two Legions backe from Caesar, gave out ill and seditious words against him among the People, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was marvelously desired and wished for in Caesars Campe: and though in ROME, for the malice and secret spite which the Governours there did beare him, he could hardly obtaine that he desired, yet in GAULE he might assure himselfe, that all the Army was at his commandement. They added further also, that if the Souldiers there did once returne over the Mountaines againe into ITALY, they would all straight come to him, they did loathe Caesar, because he wearied them with too much labour, and continuall fight: and withall, for that they suspected he aspired to be King. These words breeding security in Pompey, and a vaine conceit of himselfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation of Warre, as though he had no occasion to be afraid: but only studied to thwart Caesar in speech, and to crosse the suites he made. Howbeit Caesar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Caesars Captaines which was sent to ROME to prosecute his Suite, being at the Senate doore, and hearing that they denied to prorogue Caesars time of Government which he sued for, clapping his hand upon his Sword, he said: Sith he will not grant it him, this shall give it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Caesar propounded, carried great semblance of reason with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay downe Armes, so that Pompey did the like: and that both of them as private persons should come and make suite of their Citizens to obtaine honourable recompence: declaring unto them, that taking Armes from him, and granting them unto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make himselfe a Tyrant, and in the meane time to grant the other meanes to be a Tyrant. Curio making these offers and perswasions openly before the People, in the name of Caesar, he was heard with great rejoycing and clapping of hands, and there was some that cast Flowers and Nofegayes upon him when he went his way, as they commonly use to do unto any man, when he hath obtained victory, and wanne the Games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a Letter sent from Caesar, and made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys Father-in-law, made this motion: that if Caesar did not dismis his Army by a certaine day appointed him, the ROMANES should proclaime him an enemy unto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismis his Army: but few agreed to that demand. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Caesar should dismis his Army: thereto they all in manner answered yea, yea. But when Antonius requested againe that both of them should lay downe Armes, then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did insolently behave himselfe, and Marcellus also, who cried, that they must use force of Armes, and not mens opinion against a Thiefe, the Senate rose straight upon it, without further determination; and men changed Apparell through the City because of this dissention, as they use to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other Letters from Caesar, which seemed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would grant him GAULE, that lieth betwene the Mountaines of the Alpes and ITALY and ILLYRIA, with two Legions onely, and then that he would request nothing else; untill he made suite for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from the Government of CILICIA, travelled to reconcile them together, and pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him he would yeeld to any thing he would have him, so he did let him alone with his Army. So Cicero perswaded Caesars friends to be contented, to take those two Provinces, and fixe thousand men onely, that they might be friends and at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded unto it, and granted them. But Lentulus the Consul would not agree to it; but shamefully drave Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themselves gave Caesar a happy occasion and colour as could be, stirring up his Souldiers the more against them, when he shewed them these two Noblemen and Tribunes of the People that were driven to flee, disguised like Slaves, in a Carriers Cart. For they were driven for feare to steale out of ROME, disguised in that manner. Now at that time, Caesar had not in all about him above five thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse men: for the rest of his Army, he left on the other side of the Mountaines, to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So considering that for the execution of his Enterprize, he should not neede so many men of Warre at the first, but rather suddenly stealing upon them, to make them afraid with valiantnesse, taking benefit of the opportunity of time; because he should more easilly make his Enemies afraid of him; nothing so suddenly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise distresse them, assailing them with his whole Army, in giving them leisure to provide further for him: he commanded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other Armour then their Swords, to take the City of ARMINUM (a great City of GAULE, being the first City men come to, when they come out of GAULE) with as little bloudshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that Force and Army he had with him, unto Hortensius one of his friends, he remained a whole day together, openly in the sight of every man, to see the Sword-players handle their Weapons before him. At night he went into his Lodging, and bathing his body a little, came afterwards into the Hall amongst them, and made merry a while with them, whom he had bidden to Supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the Table, and prayed his company to be merry, and no man to stir, for he would straight come to them againe: howbeit he had secretly before commanded a few of his trustiest friends to follow him, not all together, but some one way, and some another way. He himselfe in the meane time tooke a Coach he had hired, and made as though he would have gone some other way at the first; but suddenly he turned backe againe towards the City of ARMINUM. When he was come unto the little River of Rubicon, which divided GAULE on this side the Alpes from ITALY, he stayed upon a sudden. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, to thinke what an Enterprize he tooke in hand: and his thoughts also fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into consideration of the desperatenesse of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himselfe, and spake never a word, waving sometime one way, sometime another way, and oftentimes changed his determination, contrary to himselfe. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Asinius Pollio, telling him what mischiefs the beginning of this passage over that River would breede in the World, and how much their Posterity and they that lived after them, would speake of it in time to come, but at length, casting from him with a noble courage all those perillous thoughts to come, and speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt dangerous and desperate Enterprizes: A man can be but once winder, come on, he passed over the River; and when he was come over, he ranne with his Coach, and never stayed, so that before day-light he was within the City of ARMINUM, and tooke it. It is said, that the night before he passed over this River, he dreamed a damnable Dreame, that he carnally knew his Mother. The City of ARMINUM being taken, and the rumour thereof dispersed through all ITALY, even as if it had bene open Warre both by Sea and Land, and as if all the Lawes of ROME, together with the extreame Bounds and Confines of the same had bene broken up: a man would have said, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proved at other times, but whole Cities themselves leaving their Habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALY. And ROME it selfe also was immediately filled with the flowing repaire of all the People their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parts like droves of Cattel, that there was neither Officer nor Magistrate that could any more command them by Authority, neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude: so that ROME had in manner destroyed it selfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were dangerous stirs and tumults every where, because they that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running up and downe the City, when they met with others in divers places, that seemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a City) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatened them with that that was to come. Pompey himselfe, who at that time was not a little amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill words some gave him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproved him, and said, that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly; because he had made Caesar to great and strong against him and the Common-wealth. And other againe did blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Caesar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consul to abuse him too much. On the other side, Phaonius spake unto him, and bade him stampe on the ground with his foote: for Pompey being one day in a bravery in the Senate, said openly: Let no man take thought for preparation of Warre, for when he lifted with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with Souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of Souldiers then Caesar: but they would never let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lies, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Caesar had bene already already at their heeles, and had wonne all: so that in the end he yielded unto them, and gave place to their fury and madnesse, determining (seeing all things in such tumult and garboile) that there was no way but to forsake the City, and thereupon commanded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tarry there, unless he loved Tyranny more then his owne Liberty and the Common-weath. Thus the Consuls themselves, before they had done their common Sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the City, fled every man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senators, taking their owne things in haste, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were some of them also that alwaies loved Caesar, whose wits were then so troubled, and besides themselves with the feare they had conceived, that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessity. But above all things, it was a lamentable sight to see the City it selfe, that in this feare and trouble was left at all adventure, as a Ship tossed in storme of Sea, forsaken of her Pilots, and despairing of her safety. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the love they bare unto Pompey) to be their naturall Country, and reckoned Rome no better then Caesars Campe. At that time also Labienus, who was one of Caesars greatest friends, and had bene alwaies used as his Lieutenant in the Wars of GAULES, and had valiantly fought in his cause, he likewise forsooke him then, and fled unto Pompey. But Caesar sent his Money and Carriage after him, and then went and encamped before the City of CORFINIUM, the which Domitius kept with thirty Cohorts or Ensignes. When Domitius saw he was besieged, he straight thought himselfe but undone; and despairing of his successe, he bade a Physician, a Slave of his, give him poyson. The Physician gave him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to have died. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemency and wonderfull courtesie Caesar used unto them he tooke, repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament and bewaile his desperate resolution taken to die. The Physician did comfort him againe, and told him that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him sleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius rejoiced, and went straight and yielded himselfe unto Caesar; who gave him his life, but he notwithstanding stole away immediately, and fled unto Pompey. When these newes were brought to Rome, they did marvellously joyce and comfort them that still remained there: and moreover there were of them that had forsaken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane time Caesar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the Cities, where he had taken any Captaines that leaved men for Pompey. Now Caesar having assembled a great and dreadfull Power together, went straight where he thought to finde Pompey himselfe. But Pompey tarried not his coming, but fled into the City of BRUNDISIUM, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with that Army he had, unto DYRRACHIUM: and he himselfe also went thither afterwards, when he understood that Caesar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his Life. Caesar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting Ships to take the Sea, he returned forthwith to Rome: so that in lesse then threecore daies he was Lord of all ITALY, without any bloudshed. Who when he was come to Rome, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senators there also, he courteously intreated them, and prayed them to send unto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them; upon reasonable Conditions. But no man did attempt it, either because they feared Pompey, for that they had forsaken him, or else for that they thought Caesar meant not as he spake, but that they were words of course, to colour his purpose withall. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common Treasure out of the Temple of Saturne, but told him that it was against the Law; Tullius, said he, time of Warre and Law, are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for Warre cannot abide this franke and bold speech. But when Warres are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou shalt speake in the Pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of favour, impairing to much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that have risen against me, and whom I have in my hands. When he had spoken thus unto Metellus, he went to the Temple doore where the Treasure lay, and finding no keys there, he caused Smiths to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon began againe to withstand him, and certaine men that stood by, praised him in his doing: but Caesar at length speaking bigly to him, threatened him, he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, Young man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly; and ever after that, Caesar had all at his commandment for the Warres. From thence he went into SPAIN, to make Warre with Petreus and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: first to get their Armies and Provinces into his hands which they governed, that afterwards he might follow Pompey the better, leaving never an Enemy behinde him. In this Journey he was oftentimes himselfe in danger, through the Ambushes that were laid for him in divers strange sorts and places, and likely also to have lost all his Army for lacke of Victuals. All this notwithstanding, he never left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, provoking them to Battell, and intrenching them in, until he had gotten their Campe, and Armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants themselves fled unto Pompey. When Caesar returned againe to Rome, Piso his Father-in-law gave him counsell to send Ambassadors unto Pompey, to treat for peace. But Isauricus, to flatter Caesar, was against it. Caesar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had bene slaine in Sylla's time: and did somewhat cut off the usuries that did oppresse them; and besides, did make make some such other Ordinances as those, but very few. For he was Dictator but eleven daies onely, and then did yield it up of himselfe, and made himselfe Consull with Servilius Isauricus, and after that determined to follow the Warres. All therest of his Army he left coming on the way, behinde him, and went himselfe before with sixe hundred Horse, and five Legions onely of Footmen, in the Winter-Quarter, about the Month of January, which after the ATHENIANS is called Pachysion. Then having past over the Sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the Cities of ORTUM and APOLLONIA. Then he sent his Ships backe againe unto BRUNDISIUM to transport the rest of his Souldiers that could not come with that speede he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of body, and lusty youth was decayed) being wearied with so many sundry Battels as they had fought with their Enemies, complained of Caesar in this sort. To what end and purpose doth this man hale us after him, up and downe the World, using us like Slaves and Drudges? It is not our Armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what shall we never be without our Harneisse on our backs, and our Shields on our armes? Should not Caesar thinke, at the least when he seeth our blood and wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the misery and paines that other men do feele? and now even in the dead of Winter, he putteth us into the mercy of the Sea and tempest, yea which the gods themselves cannot withstand; as if he fled before his Enemies, and pursued them not. Thus spending time with this talke, the Souldiers still marching on, by small Journeys came at length unto the City of BRUNDISIUM. But when they were come, and found that Caesar had already passed over the Sea, then they straight changed their complaints and mindes. For they blamed themselves, and tooke on also with their Captaines, because they had not made them make more halte in marching: and sitting upon the Rocks and Cliffs of the Sea, they looked over the maine Sea, towards the Realme of EPIRUS, to see if they could discern the Ships returning backe, to transport them over. Caesar in the meane time being in the City of APOLLONIA, having but a small Army to fight with Pompey, it grieved him for that the rest of his Army was so long of coming, not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a dangerous determination, to imbarque unknowne in a little Pinnace of twelve Oares onely, to passe over the Sea againe unto BRUNDISIUM, the which he could not do without great danger, considering that all the Sea was full of Pompeys Ships and Armies. So he tooke Ship in the night, appalled like a Slave, and went aboard upon this little Pinnace, and said never a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condition. The Pinnace lay in the mouth of the River of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme and quiet, by reason of a little winde that came from the shore, which every morning drave backe the waves far into the maine Sea. But that night (by ill fortune) there came a great winde from the Sea, that overcame the Land-winde, inso much as the force and strength of the River fighting against the violence of the rage and waves of the Sea, the encounter was marvellous dangerous, the water of the River being driven backe, and rebounding upward, with great noise and danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Master of the Pinnace seeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this River, bade the Mariners to cast about againe, and to returne against the streame. Caesar hearing that, straight discovered himselfe unto the Master of the Pinnace, who at the first was amazed when he saw him; but Caesar then taking him by the hand, said unto him, Good fellow, be of good cheare, and forwards heartily, feare not, for thou hast Caesar and his fortune with thee. Then the Mariners forgetting the danger of the storme they were in, laid on load with Oares, and laboured for life what they could against the winde, to get out of the mouth of this River. But at length, perceiving they laboured in vaine, and that the Pinnace tooke in abundance of water, and was ready to sinke, Caesar then to his great grieve was driven to returne backe againe: who when he was returned unto his Campe, his Souldiers came in great companies unto him, and were very sorry, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to overcome his Enemies, but would put his person in danger to go fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arrived, and brought with him the rest of his Army from BRUNDISIUM. Then Caesar finding himselfe strong enough, went and offered Pompey Battell, who was passingly well lodged, for victualling of his Campe both by Sea and Land. Caesar on the other side, who had no great plenty of Victuals at the first, was in a very hard case: inso much as his men gathered rocces, and mingled them with milke, and ate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it also, and sometime when they skirmished with the Enemies, and came along by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their Trenches, and said: that as long as the Earth brought forth such fruits, they would never leave besieging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly commanded them, that they should neither carry those words nor bread into their Campe, fearing lest his mens hearts would faile them, and that they would be afraid when they should thinke of their Enemies hardnesse, with whom they had to fight, fith they were weary with no paines, no more then brute Beasts. Caesars men did daily skirmish hard to the Trenches of Pompeys Campe, Caesars Army in the which Caesar had ever the better, saving once onely, at which time his men fled with such feare, fled from Pompey that all his Campe that day was in great hazard to have bene cast away. For Pompey came on with his Battell upon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driven into their Campe, and their Trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were slaine within the very Gate and Bulwarkes of their Campe, they were so valiantly pursued. Caesar stood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe, but he could not prevail. For when he would have taken the Ensignes to have stayed them, the Ensigne-bearers threw them downe on the ground: so that the Enemies tooke ooke two and thirty of them, and Caesars selfe also escaped hardly with life. For striking a great big Souldier that fled by him, commanding him to stay, and turne his face to his Enemy: the Souldier being afraid, kist up his Sword to strike at Caesar. But one of Caesars Pages preventing him, gave him such a blow with his Sword, that he strake off his shoulder. Caesar that day was brought unto so great extremity, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or spightfull fortune, left off to follow his Victory, and retired into his Campe, being contented to have driven his Enemies into their Campe) returning to his Campe with his friends, he said unto them: The Victory this day had bene our Enemies, if they had had a Capitaine that could have told how to have overcome. So when he was come to his Lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more then any night that ever he had. For still his minde ranne with great sorrow of the foule fault he had committed, in leading of his Army, of selfe-will to remaine there so long by the Sea side, his Enemies being the stronger by Sea, considering that he had before him a goodly Countrey, rich and plentifull of all things, and goodly Cities of MACEDON and THESSALY: and had not the wit to bring the War from thence, but to lose his time in a place, where he was rather besieged of his Enemies, for lacke of Victuals, then that he did besiege them by force of Armes. Thus fretting and chafing to see himself so straightned with Victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raised his Campe, intending to goe set upon Scipio, making account, that either he should draw Pompey to Battell against his will, when he had not the Sea at his backe to furnish him with plenty of Victuals; or else that he should easily overcome Scipio, finding him alone, unless he were aided. This remove of Caesars Campe, did much encourage Pompeys Army, and his Captaines, who would needes in any case have followed after him, as though he had bene overcome, and had fled. But for Pompey himselfe, he would in no respect hazard Battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding himself so well provided of all things necessary to tarry time, he thought it better to draw this Warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to consume this little strength that remained in Caesars Army: of the which, the best men were marvellous well trained, and good Souldiers, and for valiantnesse at one daies Battell, were incomparable. But on the other side againe, to remove here and there so oft, and to fortifie their Campe where they came, and to besiege any Wall, or to keepe watch all night in their Armour; the most part of them could not do it, by reason of their age, being then unable to away with their paines; so that the weaknesse of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hearts. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease among them, that came by ill meates hunger drave them to eate. Yet was not this the worst: for besides, he had no store of Money, neither could tell how to come by Victuals; so that it seemed in all likelihood, that in very short time he would come to nothing. For these respects, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his minde in that, who stucke in it the rather, because he would avoid shedding of his Countreymens blood. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies slaine in the Campe of his Enemies, at the last Skirmish that was betwene them, the which were no lesse then a thousand persons, he covered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, because he so long refrained from Battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and King of Kings, saying that he delayed this Warre in this sort, because he would not leave his Authority to command them all, and that he was glad alwaies to see many Captaines round about him, which came to his Lodging to honour him, and waite upon him. And Faonius also a hare-brained fellow, frankly counterfeiting the round and plaine speech of Cato, made as though he was marvellous angry, and said: Is it not great pity, that we shall not eate this yeare of THUSCULUM Figs, and all for Pompeys ambitious minde to reigne alone? and Africanus, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAIN (where because he had but ill successe, he was accused of Treason, that for Money he had sold his Army unto Caesar) he went busily asking, why they fought not with that Merchant, unto whom they said he had sold the Province of SPAIN? So that Pompey with these kinde of speeches, against his will, was driven to follow Caesar to fight with him. Then was Caesar at the first, marvellously perplexed and troubled by the way, because he found none that would give him any Victuals, being despised of every man, for the late losse and overthrow he had received. But after he had taken the City of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meete with plenty of Victuals to relieve his Army with, but he strangely also did rid them of their Disease. For the Souldiers meeting with plenty of Wine, drinking hard, and making merrry, drave away the infection of the Pestilence. For they disposed themselves unto dancing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the way, insomuch that drinking drunke they overcame their disease, and made their bodies new againe. When they both came into the Countrey of PHARSALIA, and both Campes lay before each other, Pompey returned againe to his former determination, and the rather, because he had ill signes and tokens of misfortune in his sleepe. For he thought in his sleepe, that when he entered into the Theater, all the ROMANES received him with great clapping of hands. Whereupon they that were about him grew to such boldnesse and security, assuring themselves of Victory, that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a bravery contended betwene themselves for the chiefe Bishopricke which Caesar had. Furthermore, there were divers that sent unto ROME to hire the nearest Houses unto the Market-place, as being the fittest places for Prætors, and Consuls: making their account already, that those Offices could not scape them, incontinently after the Warres. But besides those, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAN Knights were marvellous desirous to fight, that were bravely mounted, and armed with glittering gilt Armours, their their Horses fat and very finely kept, and themselves goodly young men, to the number of seven thousand; where the Gentlemen of Caesars side were but one thousand onely. The number of his Footmen also were much after the same reckoning. For he had five and forty thousand against two and twenty thousand. Wherefore Caesar called his Souldiers together, and told them how Cornificius was at hand who brought two whole Legions, and that he had fifteen Ensignes led by Calenus, the which he made to stay about MEGARA and ATHENS. Then he asked them, if they would tarry for that aide or not, or whether they would rather themselves alone venture Battell. The Souldiers cried out to him, and prayed him not to deferre Battell, but rather to devise some fetch to make the Enemy fight as soon as he could. Then as he sacrificed unto the gods, for the purifying of his Army, the first Beast was no sooner sacrificed, but his Soothsayer assured him that he should fight within three daies. Caesar asked him againe, if he saw in the Sacrifices, any lucky signe or token of good lucke. The Soothsayer answered: For that, thou shalt answer thy selfe, better then I can do: for the gods do promise us a marvellous great change and alteration of things that are now, unto another cleane contrary. For if thou beeest well now, doest thou thinke to have worse fortune hereafter? and if thou beest, assure thy selfe thou shalt have better. The night before the Battell, as he went about midnight to visite the Watch, men saw a great Fire-brand in the Element, all of a light fire, that came over Caesars Campe, and fell down in Pompeys. In the morning also when they relieved the Watch, they heard a false Alarme in the Enemies Campe, without any apparent cause: which they commonly call a suddaine feare, that makes men besides themselves. This notwithstanding, Caesar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to have raised his Campe from thence, and to have gone towards the City of SCOTUSA: and his Tents in his Campe were already overthrowne when his Scouts came in with great speed, to bring him newes that his Enemies were preparing themselves to fight. Then was he very glad, and after he had made his prayers unto the gods to helpe him that day, he set his men in Battell-ray, and divided them into three Squadrons, giving the middle Battell unto Domitius Calvinus, and the left Wing unto Antonius, and placed himselfe in the right Wing, chusing his place to fight in the tenth Legion. But seeing that against that, his Enemies had set all their Horsemen, he was half afraid when he saw the great number of them, and so brave besides. Wherefore he closely made six Ensignes to come from the rereward of his Battell, whom he had laid as an ambush behind his right Wing, having first appointed his Souldiers what they should do, when the Horsemen of the Enemies came to give them charge. On the other side, Pompey placed himselfe in the right Wing of his Battell, gave the left Wing unto Domitius, and the middle Battell unto Scipio his Father-in-law. Now all the ROMAN Knights (as we have told you before) were placed in the left Wing of purpose to environ Caesars right Wing behinde, and to give their hottest Charge there, where the Generall of their Enemies was: making their account, that there was no Squadron of Footmen, how thicke soever they were, that could receive the charge of so great a Troope of Horsemen, and that at the first onset they should overthrow them all, and march upon their Bellies. When the Trumpets on either side did sound the Alarme to the Battell, Pompey commanded his Footmen that they should stand still without stirring, to receive the charge of their Enemies, untill they came to throwing of their Darts. Wherefore Caesar afterwards said, that Pompey had committed a foule fault, not to consider that the charge which is given running with fury, besides that it giveth the more strength also unto their blowes, doth set mens hearts also on fire: for the common hurling of all the Souldiers that runne together, is unto them as a box on the eare that sets men on fire. Then Caesar making his Battell march forward to give the onset, saw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in Warre, in whom he had also great confidence) speaking to his Souldiers that he had under his charge encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloud by his Name, and said unto him: Well, Caius Crassinius, what hope shall we have to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crassinius casting up his hand, answered him aloud: This day O Caesar, we shall have a Noble Victory, and I promise thee ere night thou shalt praise me alive or dead. When he had told him so, he was himselfe the foremost man that gave charge upon his Enemies, with his Band following of him, being about six-score men; and making a lane through the foremost Rankes, with great slaughter he entred farre into the Battell of his Enemies, untill that valiantly fighting in this sort, he was thrust in at length into the mouth with a Sword, that the point of it came out againe at his Necke. Now the Footmen of both Battells being come to the Sword, the Horsemen of the left Wing of Pompey did march as fiercely also, spreading out their Troops to compass in the right Wing of Caesars Battell. But before they began to give charge, the six Ensignes of Footmen, which Caesar had laid in ambush behinde him, they began to runne full upon them, not throwing away their Darts farre off, as they were wont to do, neither striking their Enemies on the thighs nor on the Legges, but to seeke to hit them full in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Caesar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty young Caesars Strag-Gentlemen that had not been often in the Warres, nor were used to see themselves hurt, and the game, which, being in the prime of their youth and beauty, would be afraid of those hurts, as well for the feare of the present danger to be slaine, as also for that their faces should not for ever be deformed. As indeed it came to passe, for they could never abide that they should come so near their faces with the points of their Darts, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backs, covering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselves, they began at length cowardly to flee, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys Army. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to set upon the Squadron of the Footmen behind, and slew them. Then Pompey seeing his Horsemen from the other Wing of his Battell, so scattered and dispersed, flying away, forgot that he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had been before, but was rather like a man whose wits the gods had taken from him, being afraid and amazed with the slaughter sent from above, and so retired into his Tent, speaking never a word, and fate there to see the end of this Battell; untill at the length all his Army being overthrowne and put to flight, the Enemies came, and got up upon the Rampiers and defence of his Campe, and fought hand to hand with them that stood to defend the same. Then as a man come to himselfe againe, he spake but this onely word: What, even in our Campe? So in hast, casting off his Coate Armour and Apparell of a Generall, he shifted him, and put on such as became his miserable Fortune, and so stole out of his Campe. Furthermore, what he did after this overthrow, and how he had put himselfe into the hands of the EGYPTIANS, by whom he was miserably slaine, we have set it forth at large in his Life. Then Caesar entring into Pompeys Campe, and seeing the bodies layed on the ground that were slaine, and others also that were a killing, said, fetching a great sigh: It was their own doing, and against my will. For Caius Caesar, after he had wonne so many famous Conquests, and overcome so many great Battels, had been utterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his Army. Afinius Pollio writeth, tha he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greek; and saith furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the Sword in the Campe, were Slaves and Bondmen, and that there were not slaine in all this Battell above six thousand Souldiers. As for them that were taken Prisoners, Caesar did put many of them amongst his Legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwards slew Caesar himselfe: and it is reported, that Caesar was very sorry for him, when he could not immediatly be found after the Battell, and that he rejoiced againe when he knew he was alive, and that he came to yeeld himselfe unto him. Caesar had many signes and tokens of Victory before this Battell, but the notablest of all other that happened to him, was in the City of TRALESE. For in the Temple of Victory, within the same City, there was an Image of Caesar, and the Earth all about it very hard of it selfe, and was paved besides with very hard Stone: and yet some say that there sprang up a Palme hard by the Bale of the same Image. In the City of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothsayer, (a Countreyman and Friend of Titus Livius the Historiographer) was by chance at that time set to behold the flying of Birds. He (as Livie reporteth) knew the very time when the Battell began, and told them that were present, Even now they give the onset on both sides, and both Armies do meet at this instant. Then sitting down againe to consider of the Birds, after he had bethought him of the Signes, he suddainly rose upon his feet, and cried out as a man possessed with some Spirit: O Caesar the Victory is thine. Every man wondering to see him, he tooke the Crowne he had on his head, and made an Oath that he would never put it on againe, till the event of his Prediction had proved his art true. Livie testifieth, that it came so to passe. Caesar afterwards giving freedome unto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the Victory which he wan in their Countrey, he followed after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gave freedome also unto the GUIDIANS for Theopompas sake, who had gathered the Fables together. He did release ASIA also, the third part of the Tribute which the Inhabitants paid unto the ROMANES. Then he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was slaine: and detested Theodotus that presented him Pompeys head, and turned his head aside because he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his Seale and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteously used all Pompeys friends and familiars, who wandring up and down the Countrey, were taken of the King of EGYPT, and wanne them as to be at his Commandement. Continuing these courtesies, he wrote unto his friends at ROME, that the greatest pleasure he tooke of his Victory, was, that he daily saved the lives of some of his Countrey men that bore armes against him. And for the Warre he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not to have done it, but that he willingly did it for the love of Cleopatra: where in he wan little honour, and besides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault upon the King of EGYPTs Ministers but specially on Pothinus the Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the Kings Servants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driven Cleopatra from the Court, secretly laid wait all the waies he could, how he might likewise kill Caesar. Wherefore Caesar hearing an inckling of it, began thenceforth to spend all the night long in feasting and banquetting, that his person might be in the better safety. But besides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch spake many things openly not to be borne, onely to shame Caesar, and to stir up the People to envie him. For he made his Souldiers have the worst and oldest Wheat that could be gotten: then if they did complaine of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at another mans cost. And he would serve them also at the Table in treene and Earthen dishes, saying that Caesar had alway all their Gold and Silver, for a debt that the Kings Father (that then reigned) did owe unto him: which was, a thousand seven hundred and fifty Myriades; whereof Caesar had before forgiven seven hundred and fifty thousand unto his Children. Howbeit then he asked a Million to pay his Souldiers withall. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwards that he should at more leisure recover his debt with the Kings good will and favour. Caesar replied unto him, and said, that he would not aske counsell of the EGYPTIANS for his Affaires, but would be paid: and thereupon secretly sent for Cleopatra, which was in the Countrey, to come unto him. She onely taking Apollodorus SYCILIAN of all her friends, tooke a a little Boate, and went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foot of the Cattle. Then having no other meane to come into the Court without being known, she laid her selfe down upon a Mattresse or Flock-bed, which Apollodorus her friend tied and bound up together like a bundle with a great Leather-chong, and so tooke her upon his backe and brought her thus hampered in this Fardle unto Caesar in at the Castle-gate. This was the first occasion (as it is reported) that made Caesar to love her: but afterwards, when he saw her sweet conversation and pleasant entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, and did reconcile her againe unto her Brother the King, with condition, that they two joyntly should reigne together. Upon this new reconciliation, a great Feast being prepared, a Slave of Caesars that was his Barber, the fearfullest wretch that lived thus busily preying and listening abroad in every corner, benign mistrustfull by nature, found that Pothinus and Acchilus did lie in waite to kill his Master Caesar. This being proved unto Caesar, he did set such sure watch about the Hall, where the Feast was made, that in fine, he slew the Eunuch Pothinus himselfe. Acchilus on the other side, saved himselfe, and fled unto the Kings Campe, where he raised a marvellous dangerous and difficult Warre for Caesar: because he having then but a few men about him, was to fight against a great and strong City. The first danger he fell into, was the want of Water: for that his Enemies had stopped the mouth of the Pipes, the which conveyed the Water into the Castle. The second danger he had, was, that seeing his Enemies came to take his Ships from him, he was driven to repulse that danger with fire, the which burnt the Arsenall where the Ships lay, and that notable Library of ALEXANDRIA withall. The third danger was in the Battell by Sea, that was fought by the Tower of PHAR: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by Sea, he leapt from the Peere into a Boate. Then the EGYPTIANS made towards him with their Oares on every side: but he leaping into the Sea, with great hazard saved himselfe by swimming. It is said, that then holding divers Books in his hand, he did never let them go, but kept them alwaies upon his head above water, and swam with the other hand, notwithstanding that they shot marvellously at him, and was driven sometime to ducke into the water: howbeit the Boate was drowned presently. In fine, the King coming to his men that made Warre with Caesar, he went against him, and gave him Battell, and wanne it with great laughter, and effusion of blood. But for the King, no man could ever tell what became of him after. Thereupon Caesar made Cleopatra his Sister, Queen of EGYPT, who being great with Child by him, was shortly brought to bed of a Son, whom the ALEXANDRIANS named Cesarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and so going into ASIA, there it was told him that Domitius was overthrowne in Battell, by Pharnaces the Son of King Alabridates, and was fled out of the Realme of PONT with a few men with him: and that this King Pharnaces greedily following his Victory, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to winne ARMENIA the lesse, procuring all those Kings, Princes, and Governours of the Provinces thereabouts to rebell against the ROMANES. Thereupon Caesar went thither straight with three Legions and fought a great Battell with King Pharnaces by the City of ZELA, where he slew his Army, and drave him out of all the Realme of PONT. And because he would advertise one of his friends of the suddaine of this Victory, he onely wrote three words unto Anitius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I saw, I overcame. These three words ending all with like sound and letter in the Latin, have a certain short grace more pleasant to the eare, then can be well exprest in any other Tongue. After this he returned againe into ITALY, and came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the second time, which Office before was never granted for one whole yeare, but unto him. Then was he chosen Confull for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very ill spoken of, for that his Souldiers in a mutiny having slaine two Prætors, Cosconius and Galba, he gave them no other punishment for it, but instead of calling them Souldiers, he named them Citizens, and gave unto every one of them a thousand Drachmaes a man, and great Possessions in ITALY. He was much misliked also for the desperate parts and madnesse of Delabella, for the covetousnesse of Anitius, for the drunkennesse of Antonius and Cornificus; which made Pompeys house be pulled down and builded up againe, as a thing not big enough for him, wherewith the ROMANES were marvellously offended. Caesar knew all this well enough, and would have been contented to have redressed them: but to bring his matter to passe, he pretended he was driven to serve his turne by such Instruments. After the Battell of PHARSALIA, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICKE, King Juba joyned with them, and leaved a great puissant Army. Wherefore Caesar determined to make Warre with them: and in the midst of Winter, he tooke his journey into SYCILE. There, because he would take all hope from his Captaines and Souldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged upon the very Sands by the Sea side, and with the next gale of wind that came, he tooke the Sea with three thousand Footmen, and a few Horsemen. Then having put them a land, unware to them he hoised saile againe to fetch the rest of his Army, being afraid lest they should meet with some danger in passing over, and meeting them mid-way, he brought them all into his Campe. Where, when it was told him, that his Enemies trusted in an Ancient Oracle, which said, that it was predestined unto the Family of *Scipio*s to be Conquerors in AFRICKE: either of purpose to mocke Scipio the Generall of his Enemies, or otherwise in good earnest to take the benefit of this Name (given by the Oracle) unto himselfe, in all the Skirmishes and Battels fought, he gave the charge of his Army unto a man of meane quality and account, called Scipio Salustius, who came of the Race of Scipio AFRICAN, and made him alwaies Generall when he fought. For he was eftsoones compelled to weary and harry his Enemies: for that neither his men in his Camp had Corne enough make Warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had overcome them, to passe through HYRCANIA (compassing in the Sea Caspium, and Mount Caucasus) in the Realme of PONTUS, and so to invade SCYTHIA: and overrunning all the Countries, and People adjoining unto high GERMANIE, and GERMANIE it self, at length to returne by GAULE into ITALY, and so to enlarge the ROMANE Empire round, that it might be every way compassed in with the great Sea Oceanum. But whilst he was preparing for this Voyage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of PELOPONNESUS, in the Market-place where the City of CORINTH standeth. Then he was minded to bring the Rivers of Anienus and Tiber, straight from ROME, unto the City of CIRCES with a deepe Channell and high Banks cast up on either side, and so to fall into the Sea at TERRACINA, for the better safety and commodity of the Merchants that came to ROME to traffike there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and seaw all the Water of the Marshes betwixt the Cities of NOMENTUM and SETIUM, to make firme land, for the benefit of many thousands of People: and on the Sea Coast next unto ROME, to cast great high Banks, and to cleanse all the Haven about OSTIA, of Rocks and Stones hidden under the Water, and to take away all other impediments that made the harbour dangerous for Ships, and to make new Havens and Arsenals meet to harbour such Ships as did continually trafficke thither. All these things were purposed to be done, but tooke no effect. But the ordinance of the Kalendar, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commodity unto all men. For the ROMANES using then the ancient computation of the yeare, had not onely such incertainty and alteration of the Moneth and times, that the Sacrifices and yearely Feasts came, by little and little, to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the revolution of the Sunne (which is called Annu Solaris) no other Nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMANES themselves, onely the Priests understood it. And therefore when they listed, they suddainly (no man being able to controll them) did thrust in a Moneth above their ordinary number, which they called in old time, *Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first that devised this way, to put a Moneth between: but it was a weake remedy, and did little helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Caesar committing this matter unto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time; did set forth an excellent and perfect Kalendar, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMANES do use until this present day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his Enemies notwithstanding that envied his greatnesse, did not sticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one said, to morrow the Starre Lyra will rise: Yea, said he, at the commandement of Caesar, as if men were compelled so to say and thinke, by Caesars Edict. But the chiefeft cause that made him mortally hated, was the covetous desire he had to be called King: which first gave the People just cause, and next his secret Enemies, honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this Honour and Dignity, gave it out among the People, that it was written in the Sybilline Prophecies, how the ROMANES might overcome the PARTHIANS, if they made Warre with them, and were led by a King, but otherwise that they were unconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold besides, that Caesar returning to ROME from the City of ALBA, when they came to salute him, they called him King. But the People being offended, and Caesar also angry, he said, he was not called King, but Caesar. Then every man keeping silence, he went his way heavly and sorrowfull. When they had decreed divers honours for him in the Senate, the Consuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole Assembly of the Senate, went unto him in the Market-place, where he was set by the Pulpit for Orations, to tell him what honours they had decreed for him in his absence. But he sitting still in his Majesty, disdainful to rise up unto them when they came in, as if they had been private men, answered them: that his honours had more need to be cut off then enlarged: This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common People also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the Commonwealth: inso much as every man that might lawfully go his way, departed thence very sorrowfully. Thereupon also Caesar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his Doublet Coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friends, that his Throate was ready to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithstandyng, it is reported, that afterwards to excuse his folly, he imputed it to his disease, saying, that their wits are not perfect which have this disease of the falling-Evill, when standing on their feet they speake to the common People, but are soone troubled with a trembling of their Body, and a suddaine dimnesse and giddinesse. But that was not true, for he would have risen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friends (or rather a flatterer) would not let him, saying: what, do you not remember that you are Caesar, and will you not let them reverence you, and do their duties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproach, abusing the Tribunes of the People in this sort. At that time the Feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in old time, men say was the Feast of Shepherds or Heardsmen, and is much like unto the Feast of the LYCAIANS in ARCADIA. But howsoever it is, that day there are divers noble mens Sons, young men, (and some of them Magistrates themselves that govern them) which run naked through the City, striking in sport them they meet in their way, with Leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them give place. And many noble Women and Gentlewomen also, go of purpose to stand in their way, and do put forth their hands to be stricken, as Scholars hold them out to their Schoole-maister, to be stricken with the ferula: perswading themselves themselves that being with Child, they shall have good delivery; and so being barren, that it will make them to conceive with Child. Caesar fate to behold that sport upon the Pulpit for Orations, in a Chaîne of Gold, apparelled in triumphant manner. Antonius who was Consul at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy course. So when he came into the Market-place, the People made a lane for him to runne at liberty, and he came to Caesar, and presented him a Diademe wreathed about with Lawrell. Whereupon there rose a certaine cry of rejoycing, not very great, done onely by a few appointed for the purpose. But when Caesar refused the Diademe, then all the people together made an outcry of joy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a second shout of joy, but yet of a few. But when Caesar refused it againe the second time, then all the whole People shouted, Caesar having made this prooffe, found that the People did not like of it, and thereupon rose out of his Chaire, and commanded the Crowne to be carried unto Jupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there was set up Images of Caesar in the City, with Diademes upon their headslike Kings. Those, the two Tribunes, Flavius and Marullus, went and pulled downe, and furthermore, meeting with them that first saluted Caesar as King, they committed them to Prison. The People followed them rejoycing at it, and called them Brutes, because of Brutus, who had in old time driven the Kings out of ROME, and that brought the Kingdome of one person, unto the Government of the Senate and People. Caesar was so offended withall, that he deprived Marullus and Flavius of their Tribuneships, and accusing them, he spake also against the People, and called them Bruti and Cumani, to wit, beasts and fooles. Hereupon the People went straight unto Marcius Brutus, who from his Father came of the first Brutus, and by his Mother of the house of the Servilians a noble house as any was in ROME, and was also Nephew and Sonne in Law of Marcius Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honours and favour Caesar shewed unto him, kept him backe that of himselfe alone he did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his Kingdome. For Caesar did also save many more of his friends besides: but furthermore, he put a marvellous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Prætorship for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Consul the fourth yeare after that, having through Caesars friendship obtained it before Cassius, who likewise made suite for the same: and Caesar also, as it is reported, said in his contention, indeed Cassius hath alleadged best reason, but yet shall he not be chosen before Brutus. Some one day accusing Brutus while he practised this conspiracy, Caesar would not hear of it, but clapping his hand on his body, told them, Brutus will looke for this skin: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his Vertue deserved to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions sake, he would not shew himselfe unthankfull or dishonourable. Now they that desired change, and wished Brutus onely their Prince and Governour above all other, they durst not come to him themselves to tell him what they would have him to do, but in the night did cast sundry Papers into the Prætors seate, where he gave Audience, and the most of them to this effect: Thou sleepest Brutus, and art not Brutus indeed. Cassius finding Brutus ambition stirred up the more by these seditious Bills, did prick him forward, and edge him on the more, for a private quarrell he had conceived against Caesar: the circumstance whereof, we have set downe at large in Brutus life. Caesar also had Cassius in great jealousy, and suspected him much: whereupon he said on a time to his friends, what will Cassius do, thinke ye? I like not his pale lookes. Another time when Caesars friends complained unto him of Antonius and Dolabella, that they pretended some mischief towards him: he answered them again, As for those fat men and smooth combed heads, quoth he, I never reckon of them; but these pale visaged and carrion leane People, I feare them most, meaning Brutus and Cassius. Certainly, destiny may easie be foreseene then avoided, considering the strange and wonderfull Signes that were said to be seene before Caesars death. For, touching the Fires in the Element, and Spirits running up and downe in the night, and also the solitary Birds to be seene at noon daies sitting in the great Market-place, are not all these Signes perhaps worth the noting, in such a wonderfull chance as happened? But Strabo the Philosopher writeth, that divers men were seen going up and down in Fire: and furthermore, that there was a Slave of the Souldiers, that did cast a marvellous burning flame out of his hand, inso much as they that saw it, thought he had been burnt; when the Fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Caesar selfe also doing Sacrifice unto the gods, found that one of the Beasts which was sacrificed had no Heart: and that was a strange thing in nature: how a Beast could live without a Heart. Furthermore there was a certaine Soothsayer, that had given Caesar warning long time afore, to take heed of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fiftenth of the Moneth) for on that day he should be in great danger. That day being come, Caesar going unto the Senate-House, and speaking merrily unto the Soothsayer, told him the Ides of March be come. So they be, softly answered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past. And the very day before, Caesar supping with Marcus Lepidus, sealed certaine Letters as he was wont to do at the Board: so talke falling out amongst them, reasoning what death was best, he preventing their opinions, cried out aloud, Death unlooked for. Then going to bed the same night, as his manner was, and lying with his Wife Calpurnia, all the Windows and Doors of his Chamber flying open, the noise awoke him, and made him afraid when he saw such light: but more, when he heard his Wife Calpurnia, being fast asleepe, weepe and sigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable speeches: for she dreamed that Caesar was slaine, and that she had him in her Armes. Others also do deny that she had any such dreame, as amongst other, Titus Livius writeth, that it was in this sort: The Senate having set upon the top of Caesars House for an Ornament and setting forth of the same, a certaine Pinnacle, ness of the Sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not out, whereby it gave but small heate: therefore the Ay being very cloudy and darke, by the weaknesse of the heate that could not come forth, did cause the Earth to bring forth but raw and unripe Fruite, which rotted before it could ripe. But above all, the ghost that appeared unto Brutus, shewed plainly, that the gods were offended with the murder of Cæsar. The Vision was thus: Brutus being ready to passe over his Army from the City of ARYDOS to the other Coast lying directly against it, slept every night (as his manner was) in his Tent; and being yet awake, thinking of his Affaires, for by report he was as carefull a Captaine, and lived with as little sleepe as ever man did) he thought he heard a noise at his Tent door, and looking towards the light of the Lamp that waxed very dim, he saw a horrible Vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnesse, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him marvellously afraid. But when he saw that it did him no hurt, but stood by his bed-side, and said nothing; at length he asked him what he was. The Image answered him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the City of PHILIPPE. Then Brutus replied againe, and said, Well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the Spirit presently vanished from him. After that time, Brutus being in Battell neare unto the City of PHILIPPE, against Antonius and Octavius Cæsar, at the first Battell he wan the Victory, and overthrowing all them that withstood him, he drave them into young Cæsars Campe, which he tooke. The second Battell being at hand, this Spirit appeared againe unto him, but spake never a word. Thereupon Brutus knowing that he should die, did put himselfe to all hazard in Battell, but yet fighting could not be flaine. So seeing his men put to flight and overthrowne, he ranne unto a hile Rocke not farr off, and there setting his Swords point to his breast, fell upon it, and slew himselfe; but yet, as it is reported, with the helpe of his Friend that dispatched him.

The end of the Life of Julius Cæsar.

THE COMPARISON OF ALEXANDER the Great with JULIUS CÆSAR

ENTERING into consideration of Alexander and Cæsar, it is an easie matter to speake, and much easier to prove, that they are two of the bravest Chieftaines of Warre, that are to be noted in his Histories: that their Vertues out of Warre are excellent, and have great resemblance together: that both of them were Nobly borne, Learned, Eloquent, Liberrall, Moderate, very loving to their Friends and Servants, and wonderfull much made of, and obeyed of Captaines and Souldiers of their Armies, and mercifull even to their Enemies: that even from their youth they made good prooffe of the future greatnesse of their courages: that their Exploits are altogether admirable: that they be two Miracles for Military Dicipline, whether a man doth looke into the shortnesse of the time of their Warres, and the Countries which they have passed through, as it were with the turning of a hand: or that they behold the Enemies they have overcome, the Towns and Provinces they have conquered; their Wisdome, Valour, and Happinesse, having never received repulse, but alwaies carrying Victory in their hands, and making Valour their advantage with an assured good direction. Both of them were in marvellous danger of their Persons, the one in the City of the MALLIANS, the other in SPAIN, against the Sonne of Pompeius. Both of them were by Soothsayers expressly told of their death.

death, whom they loved and respected. Both of them in the meane space (as it were blind-fold) did throw themselves into danger, from the which men would have withdrawn them. But he that meerly considers the Life of either of them, shall finde himselfe in a Field, whereof the eye cannot see the end, nor the divers waies object unto it, but remaineth dazled, not knowing whether to point it, he seeth so many things at once before him. If he come to preferre the Life of the one before the other, he entrencheth into an Ocean of discourse, and cannot tell which of the two he should chuse, nor to what port to go to discharge himselfe of this man here, before the other there; yet to encourage some body to faile in this Sea, let us row to the Shoare: and (to speake plainly without figure) let us see wherein the one doth passe the other, to leave the Reader his free judgement of that we will say. At this present I will in few words shew what may be observed most memorable, in the Adolescence of the one and of the other, of their Exploits of Warre, of their Vices and Vertues, of their Death, and what followed after. I pleade first for Alexander, not mentioning his Race, his Beauty, nor the sweetnesse of his Body, which they speake of so much; all that being nothing worth in respect of Vertue: his continency unto Women, and for that he did moderately use the exercises of his Body, doth so much the more condemne Cæsars excesse and frailty of his youth, doing and suffering filthy things, not to be ripped up any further. The ambition of Alexander came of a noble minde, as witnesseth that he spake of the running at the Games Olympicall, his discourse with the Ambassadors of PERSIA, and the complaint he made to his Companions, that his Father would leave him nothing to conquer. Whereas Cæsar after he had remained sometime in NINETEEN and in GREECE, he cast himselfe into the armes of the common People at ROME, being bountifull, and making Orations to gaine their hearts, suing for petty Offices finely to attaine to the greater. To conclude, he tooke a quite contrary course unto Alexander, who traced the great Royall broad way to Vertue, to become one day the Honour of the World: and also to his Schoole-Master the learnedest man of all men, and shewed himselfe indeed a most worthy Disciple of Aristotle. But Cæsar pricked forward by his naturall wit, and tyrannicall manners of his time, was possessed (in an unlucky houre for him and his Country) with the intollerable Vice of self-will and ambition, which was cause of his death. The love that Alexander bore from his Infancy unto Learning and Learned-men, makes him farre excell other Princes. The Honour that he did unto Homer the Poet, returned againe to himselfe: how praise-worthy are his courtesies and liberality unto Diogenes, Xenocrates, and others? To the contrary, Cæsar never seemed to care for any man, but for himselfe; or if he have regarded some, or given Gold and Silver by handfuls, it was but to gaine men, and by degrees to serve his turne to raise him to that greatnesse he aimed at, rather then for any other consideration. Now as may be said of the one and the other, he was,

In Counsell wise: and valorous in Fight.

And to speake truly, it is their true and right Title of Honour, and the advantage they have of all those that have gone before them: let us see if we can a little in particular qualifie Alexander.

A sturdy Warriour, never fearing harmes,

And dreadfull to his Enemies in Arms:

As saith Aeschilus: for what was all his Warre in ASIA after the death of Philippus, but Tempests, extreme Heates, wonderfull deepe Rivers, marvellous high Mountaines, monstrous Beasts for greatnesse to behold, wild savage fashions of life, change and alteration of Governours upon every occasion, yea Treasons and Rebellsions of some? At the beginning of his Voyage, GREECE did yet lay their heads together, for remembrance of the Warres that Philippus made upon them, the Towns gathered together, MACEDONIA inclined to some change and alteration, divers People farr and near lay in waite to see what their neighbours would do, the Gold and Silver of PERSIA flowing in the Orators Purfes and Governours of the People in every Town did raise up Peloponnes: Philippus Treasure and Coffers were empty, and the debts were great. In despite of all these troubles, and in the midst of his poverty, a young man, but newly come to mans estate, durst in his minde thinke of the Conquest of ASIA, yea of the Empire of the whole World, with thirty thousand Footmen, and five thousand Horfe, or (as some other think) with five and forty thousand Footmen, and five thousand and five hundred Horfe; having to entertaine this Warre in ready Money but two and forty thousand Crowns, or (as Darris writeth) provision of Victuals and Money but for thirty daies: howbeit he was furnished with Magnanimity, with Temperance, with Wisdome and Valour; being more holpen in this Martiall Enterprife, with that he had learned of his Tutor Aristotle, then with that which his Father Philippus had left him: he was armed with a just quarrell against the PERSIANS, sworn Enemies unto GREECE, unto whom they had done infinite wrongs and injuries: his Magnanimity and Valiantnesse appeared in all Fights, were it in a pitched Field, or in Assaults taking of Townes; never sparing his person, having been grievously wounded in sundry Fights. What Valour shewed he in the City of the MALLIANS, he himselfe alone against so many barbarous People? With what constancy did he encourage his Surgeons to pluck out a Dart that stucke fast in his Breast? Let no man, saith he, be so faint-hearted nor cowardly; no, not if my life were in question, I could not thinke that a man would beleieve I feared death, if he had any feeling or feare in my behalfe. Now for a man in twelve yeares space and lesse, to have done these things, and to have travelled a Conquerour the most part of the World, is a commendation passing mens understanding. Cæsar on the contrary part, having made his preparations long before, happily found Craspus to pay his debts he ought, to the end to corrupt the City of ROME: and happily having of those that loved good laws and the good of the state, the which he left turmoiled with civil wars; and which began to make some shew againe under his Nephew, whom the divine providence (baving regard to things much more excellent then either heaven or earth) had in his counsell determined to make him Monarch of the world. As to the contrary, Alexander was happily stayed in BAByLON, where he was told by the divines, the wicked spirit having (according to the knowledge it pleased the just Judge to give him) conjectured and foretold something of that which God had long time before revealed unto his by his faithfull Prophet. But yet after Augustus, the Empire of ROME fell againe into new misfortunes, and was never but unconstant from that time forward, till in the end it sunke under her owne weight. The like chanced to Alexanders successors, but not through his fault: and that makes the memory of him more famous. Thus have you all I can say of him. Let us speake something of Julius Caesar also, not that I pretend to attaine to that which may be said of him: for it would require a more sufficient man then my selfe to performe that. But to make some comparision with Alexander, whose deeds he chancing one day to read of in a booke, he fell a weeping, envying the brave exploits of the other. Let us therefore consider if he have done things that came neare, or did excell the other. First of all, unto all the noble Acts that may be written of Alexander in his youth, I do object the worthy Act of Caesar against the Pirates, which were more his prisoners then he theirs, unto whom he paid ransome in such sort, that he made them repent their folly that they ever meddled with him. So that upon land they found he was very round with them, as also their Judge at Sea, though he were but a young man in their hands. That is but an example of the rest of his life, who could abide no companion, and much lesse a master, as being borne to all great things, and delighting in nothing but to be excellent in all the rarest and highest things of the world: as his deeds did witness, after he came to beare office in the Common-wealth, even to the end of his dayes. Now albeit his eloquence is no small thing to be spoken of, which did him notable service in many troublesome encounters; though it was a wonder to see the excellency of his stile and grace, lively to expresse all things in so fine and goodly termes, that the smoothest Muses neither would, nor could speake more sweetly then he: yet since we had rather stand upon good deeds then faire words, let us passe over this matter, so much to support Alexander, and let us see whether it may be received for truth of all men of understanding: that Caesar is the most excellent Captaine that ever was in the world. Albeit that Alexander had but a small meane, yet he was Lord of a great Kingdom, he had men and credit. But Caesar without patrimony of much worth without money and with few men, performed the greatest things that may be thought of. Alexander had to do with women and children, if one compare the people he fought with, those whom Caesar overthrew: not in five or six battells, but in more then fifty, very well ordered, where he was ever the weaker in number of men, but the greater in valour: never vanquished, but ever victor: and was never hurt that I can tell of, though he would venture even to his last, and let his flesh go as freely as the meanest souldier of his Legions. And yet in the mean time they shall finde he was better stayed in his enterprises then Alexander, that like a swift running streame would run into any dangers, which indifferently joyneth with all that cometh against it. So he was in the heat of his age, and Caesar entred into doings being a man of ripe judgement, and well onwards in years. To say it is a great commendation for a Generall in the field, headlong to put himself into all dangers, making no difference betwixt himselfe and a common souldier, that is somewhat too forward: and therefore therein I find Caesar to be preferred before Alexander, onely for that he was not so forward without great necessity. So that his happinesse defended him in all parts, as also for that Alexander seemed to have sought to be beaten. Shall I tell you that Caesar killed a million of enemies, hath triumphed for a million of others and hath made an innumerable number to flee? That in lesse then ten years while the warre in GAULE endured, he wan eight hundred Townes, and subdued three hundred Nations? If I should mention the wars he made in fifteen yeares space, it would make a whole booke to speake onely but of the praises he deserved. The SWITZERS, GERMANES, GAULES, ROMANES, EGYPTIANS, AFRICANS, the ASIANS, and his five triumphs of so many enemies, so mighty, and in shew so invincible, do approve his valour and sufficiency in all the parts requisite in a Chieftaine of warre. His vertues and happinesse being his Tutors, he got about him a world of good wills of certaine valiant Captaines and souldiers together, whom he ordered so well, that he made them ready to performe what he commanded, and having such an unmatchable carriage towards them, he made them invincible with him: and in the midst of his continuall troubles, he did reade, meditate, speake, wrote, and left behinde him the goodliest booke that a Martiall man, and one that entertaineth the Muses, can devise to take in his hands. His Orations were a long time held in great reputation among the ROMANES. And for his respect unto men learned, valiant, and vertuous, Caesar had renounced himselfe, if he had shut his Gate against such men. The dangers Alexander passed through were great, but what were they in respect of Caesar's dangers, environed with so brave enemies, and in so great a number, as were the GAULES, and Pompeys followers? What foule parts have been played him by some of his own people, and yet he weighed them not? But to the contrary, he suffered some of them to run what course they liked best: he sent the carriage and goods together: he alwayes respected and honoured his enemies, when they made no head against him. And by his friends he sent reasonable conditions unto Pompey, before he would fight with him. Furthermore, when he entred into wars, being greatly in debt, and raised up with hope, having the chieftest in ROME his adversaries, he took upon him to fight with all the enemies abroad, and to make his way in despite of the world, to the sovereignty of ROME, the

which he saw had need of a good master, not of so many perry Lords. His wonderful foresight served him altogether in all occurrences, being never prevented in any thing he went about, but alwayes obtained more then he desired. His magnanimity weighed more then any other vertue they could note in him: which is as much as one would say, that Caesar out weighed all the other Captaines of the GREEKS and ROMANES. He was almost at all the battels: in the warres where he commanded, he was never beaten but in his Lieutenants. For the skirmish in the which Pompey on a time had the better, it is not worth the speaking of it; because he could not tell how to follow his victory. And it is a singular direction, favoured with a most rare happinesse, that amongst so many blows given, Caesar never had one given him. If he found favour of Craesus before he went to the warres, that cannot be imputed any blame to him; since he alwayes payed his friends well, and brought his enemies to reason, though they set against him. If justice accompanied the prowess of Alexander, if he have used moderation, gentleness, and humility in his victories, if he shewed himselfe wise and circumspect in his purposes: what shall be said of Caesar then? Whose gentleness is so much spoken of, that men judge that that was one of the occasions of his death. His pastimes were very serious: and after he began to deale in affaires, he never played but in good earnest, and yet would he never lose his times of recreation, and his pleasant talke and communication with his friends and familiars. But in the midst of his victories, how did he use his enemies, and those that set themselves against him? He was a lightening of warre, that did overthrow all that durst withstand him: and he never meddled with any that yielded without resistance. He was Faithfull, Wise, Valiant, and Courageous, and did not allow all kind of meanes to obtaine victory: although more then once he might have feeded (as they say) the case of the Foxe; with the skinne of the Lyon. But yet he followed in good time his predecessors, although he did finely assault the most part of his enemies, and destroyed the one by the other. Caesar's ambition was very extreme, but he covered it in another manner of sort then Alexander did: who passing over a River, let fall certain words, plaine enough, that he sought the praise of the ATHENIANS. And the false inventions to make the glory of his name to continue for ever amongst the INDIANS, do not they discover a most grosse vanity, which did but labour after that which it could not attaine? But Caesar desired earnestly, and touched the end of his intentions. His prowess is wonderful gracious, and his gentleness grave and valiant: his liberality so great, that to thinke what he should give, was more then the gift it selfe, how great soever. Also he gathered no riches together in the warres, to live afterwards in delicioussesse at his pleasure: it was a reward of vertue that he locked up, to recompence men of valour, and to leave good souldiers a meane to live by honestly at home, when age and their wounds did constrain them to leave warres. He was never weary of any travell more then Alexander: and gave not himselfe to so much ease, though he was elder, slenderer, and thinner of body, and subject to the falling sicknesse: but he hardened himselfe against it by continuall exercise of his body, and minde, accompanied with an incredible quicknesse and diligence. He having left FRANCE, and running after Pompeius to BRUNDISIUM, he subdued all ITALIE in lesse then three weekes, returned againe from BRUNDISIUM to ROME; from whence he went to the heart of SPAIN, where he overcame extreme hardnesse in the warre against Africanus and Petorius, and at the long siege of MARSEILLES. From thence he returned into MACEDONIA, won the battell of PHARSALIA, and followed Pompeius into EGYPT, which he subdued also. After that he came into SYRIA, and into the Kingdom of PONT, where he fought with Pharnaces: and from thence into AFRICK, where he overcame Scipio and Juba. Afterwards he returned againe through ITALIE and SPAIN, and there overcame the sonne of Pompeius. Now weigh therewithall the travells, fights, conquests and expeditions of Alexander: then say plainly, what you thinke of it: Caesar carried it by much. The onely wars of the GAULES have been more sharpe and dangerous then all the conquests of ASIA and the INDIANS. For it is not in passing over mountains and Rivers ill guarded, that shews the deeds of men: it is to overcome a subtil and puissant enemy. But I pray you, these words of Caesar to the Masters of the Brigantine (who unlesse they had known him, would have passed him from APOLLONIA to BRUNDISIUM) were they not more swelling then the sea it self: courage my friend, said he, faile hardly: for thou carriest Caesar and his fortune. And that which he said passing over the River of Rubicon, to enter into ITALIE: A man can be but once undone: what a courage did he shew in that? Truly a mind, that from thence did behold death, and cared for no more, but for the execution of his counsels. If a man observe the directions of Alexander in his exploits, what is that in the respect of the wisdom of Caesar? being wont to say, he loved victory gotten by counsell more then by force. I know that Alexander was adorned with most excellent vertues, and hurt with very few knowne vices. For therein it seemeth he hath lattised up Caesar, and many others of the chieftest in the GREEKE and ROMANE History: although I cannot dissemble also, that he was led by flatterers and women too: witness that which he did at the instigation of Lais and of his minions. As also that his deeds were but wind: dangerous vices in all men, but especially in Princes: from which Caesar kept himself with better understanding. But if we bring in shew the good understanding, the spirit, the judgement, the conduct, the profound knowledge, the eloquence, the hardnesse, the greatnesse of courage, the more then humane boldnesse in the midst of the greatest dangers: the travells, the paines, the bounty, the gentleness, the courtesie, the liberality, and the good fortune of Caesar: we shall have enough to speake of. They object this against him, that among the Senators and others which tooke Pompeius part, he spared them that could not much hurt him: and others whom he thought he could not gaine, he overcame them in AFRICK.

The vertues and perfections of Caesar both in war and peace.

Cæsars vices.

But Brutus, Cassius, and his adherents shew, that Cæsar fought nothing else but to carry himselfe graciously, if his ill-willers would have let him alone. And sure it is very likely, that if they had borne with him but a while longer, matters had not gone on with such a violent course as they did after his death: but the estate of ROME had been governed with better Policy, and the ambition of this great person having attained his desire, had been satisfied, and would have fallen of himselfe. For whereas he did leane to the flatteries of Balbus and Antonius, to disdain the Senate, and to covet the marks and signes of Royall dignity, these were but the blasts of this wicked winde, which such the dangerous bellows entertained and kept in his heart. Now in this he cannot be excused. On the contrary side, they cannot too much condemne this passion of his, which sufficiently appeared in the first voyage he made into SPAIN: when passing by a pelting Village, he preferred the first place in that to the second in ROME. This passion increased in him ever after, so mightily overruling all the rest, and so absolutely possessing his minde, that it carried him whither it would, and made him that without respect of his Country or of himselfe he never left running, untill that his fierce horse cast him on the ground, and brake his necke. Yea, so many victories and triumphs drew him not for all that to seek rest: but (as Alexander sailed up and downe the Ocean, during his last sicknesse, and some hours before his death) he embraced greater wars and conquest then before. For that he did in reforming the Kalender, and the enterprize of so many buildings and works for the Commonwealth, sheweth, that that mind was a bow ever bent. For his voluptuousnesse, peradventure it will not become as to speak of it; and we were better with silence and shame lament mans imperfection, then in deservying of noble persons, content those that are never merry, but when one feedeth their malice. The ambition wherewith he was infinitely wounded, coming to fight with this wickednesse after women, made him quickly leave the haunt, utterly to subdue it afterwards: to the end that his pleasures should never make him steale a minute of an hour, nor to remove one foot from the occasions offered him to raise him to greatnesse. As for his death, it was violent indeed, but practised by the most part of them to whom he had given life, and who continued not long after him. It is true, his high carriage of himselfe was cause of his death: for nothing wanted to his happinesse, but to love his City, and to continue to be more carefull then he was to please the Senate and people, as he had begun after his five triumphs, pardoning all, raising one and other to Offices in the Commonwealth, and setting up againe the statues of Pompey. Now being fallen againe into this desperate desire to be yet greater, he made so many offended with him, that diverse put in execution, which one man alone could not easily have brought to passe. But yet he hath that more then Alexander that his death was revenged. To the contrary Alexander's mother, wives, and children made a poor end; his Army remained as a body without a head, and he had a good grace that compared it to Cyclope Polypheme, when Ulysses had put out his eye. His Captaines that succours devoured one another by long warres. As for Cæsar, he lived still in the person of his successours, who having overcome a world of hard adventures, established a Monarchy: the which in despite of a million of tempests, hath continued many hundreds of years. And specially the name of Cæsar, by excellent priviledge hath remained unto those that after him reigned in the Empire of ROME: and his valiantnesse was, and yet is to this day desired of all men, that by valourous exploits seeke to win to their name immortall praise and glory. You looke here, Reader, to see to which of the two I should give the precedency: but since the world hath been too little for the one and the other, I should go too farre if I plainly spake what I thought. Now that I have spoken for the other, I cease, and leave you to your judgement.

THE LIFE OF PHOCION.

THE Orator Demades on a time flourished in ATHENS, because in all his doings and sayings in the administration and governments of the Commonwealth, he alwayes favoured the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in respect whereof he was estoones compelled, both in his counsell and lawes, to preferre many things to the dishonour of his City, saying, that they must pardon him, because he governed the shipwracks of his Country. This was an arrogant speech: but yet referring it to the government of Phocion Demades arrogantly saying. For indeed Demades selfe was the shipwracke of the Commonwealth, because he lived so insolently, and governed so lewdly. Infomuch as Antipater said of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beast sacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion which had to fight against the cruel and bitter enemy of the time, were so obscured by the calamities of GREECE, that his fame was nothing so great as he deserved. For we must not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it selfe but weake, in these verses:

But we must onely give place to fortune, who when the frowne upon any good and vertuous man, her force is so great, that where they deserve honour and favour, the violently heapeth false and malicious accusations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite which indeed it deserveth. And yet it seemeth to many, that free Cities are most cruel unto their good Citizens in time of prosperity: because they flow in wealth and live at ease, which maketh them of haughty minds. But it is cleane contrary. For adversity commonly maketh mens maners sower, cholericke, and very hasty: besides, slow to heare, churlish, and offended with every little sharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, seemeth to cast their adversity in their teeth: and he that telleth them plainly of their faults, seemeth also to despise them. For like as honey sweet by nature, applied unto wounds, doth bring both smart and paine: even so, sharpe words, though profitable, do bite the unfortunate man, if they be not tempered with discretion and courtesie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth sweet and pleasant things μαροονη, as yeelding, and not striving with contrariety, against that part of the mind, whereby we be angry and froward. For even as fore eyes do like to look on blacke and dark colours, and cannot abide the bright and glaring: so in a City, where for want of foresight and government, things go not well, men be so divers and unwilling to hear of their owne faults and estate, that they had rather continue in their folly and danger, then by sharpnesse of words be rebuked and reformed. So that it being impossible to amend one fault with a greater, that Commonwealth

monwealth must be in great danger, that when it hath most need of helpe, is lothest to receive any: and he also hazardeth himselfe, that plainly telleth them their faults. Like as therefore the Mathematician faith, that the Sun doth not altogether follow the motion of the highest heaven: nor yet is moved directly contrary. but fetching a compasse a little overthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approaching and departing preserveth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature: even so, too severe government, contrariwise the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as also it is marvellous dangerous not to correct offenders when they offend, for fear of the peoples displeasure. But the meane, sometime to yeeld unto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleasure, to demand of them againe things profitable, that is a good way to governe men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to do many profitable things, when they seek it not of them by rigor and authority. Indeed this meane is very hard to be observed, because authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meet together, there is no harmony more musical, nor concordance more perfect then that: and therefore it is said that thereby God doth governe the world, working rather a voluntary then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of severenesse was in Cato the younger, for he could not fashion himself to the peoples manners, nor did they like his: neither did he win his estimation in the Common-wealth by flattering of them: and therefore Cicero said, that he was put by the Coufulship, for that he behaved himselfe as though he lived in the Common-wealth devised by Plato, and not amongst the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly unto timely fruit: the which though men do take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eat them not. Even so, the ancientest simplicity of Catoes manner (having so long a time been out of use, and coming then to shew it self in that corrupt time and ill manners of the City) was indeed much praise worthy: but yet not the convenientest, nor the fittest for him, because it answered nor respected not the use and manners of the time. For he found not his Country (as Phocion did) utterly destroyed, but tossed in a dangerous tempest: and being not of authority like the Pilot to take the sterne in hand, and governe the ship, he took himself to tricking the sailes, and preparing the tackle, so to assist men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he so thwarted fortune (which seemed to have sworn the overthrow of the state of ROME) that with much ado, with great difficulty, and a long time after, she executed her malice. And yet the Commonwealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by means of Cato and his vertue: whith whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of government. For there is difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades and that of Epaminondus: betwixt wisdom and wisdom, as betwixt that of Aristides, and that of Themistocles: and betwixt justice and justice, as betwixt that of Numa, and that of Agessilaus. But the vertues of these men (to him that shall superficially regard, and lightly consider them) seem all one in quality, in manner, and use, both alike in temperance of courtesie with severity; and manhood with wisdom: a valiant care for other, with presence of courage and security of mind for themselves, abhorring all filthinesse and corruption, and embracing constancy and love of justice: that for any man to discern the difference between them, it requireth an excellent good wit and judgement. Now touching Cato, every man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we will shew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I guesse he came of no base parentage. For if he had been the son of a Spoon-maker, as Idomeneus testifieth, Glaukipus the son of Hyperides, having in an invective he wrote against him, rehearsed all the mischiefs he could of him, he would not have forgotten to have upbraided him with his base parentage; neither himself also (if that had been true) had been so well brought up as he was. For when he was a young man, he was Platoes Schooler, and afterwards Xenocrates Schooler, in the Schoole of Academia: and so, even from his first beginning, he gave himself to follow them that were learned. For as Duriv writeth: never ATHENIAN saw him weep nor laugh, nor wash himselfe in any common bath, nor his hands out of his sleeves when he wore a long Gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwayes go on foot, and never wore Gowne, unless it were extreame cold: and then the fouldiers to mocke him withall, would say it was a signe of a sharpe Winter, when they saw Phocion in his Gowne. Now though indeed he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yet he had such a grimme looke withall, that no man had any desire to talke with him, but such as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator, one day mocking him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughing withall: My Masters, quoth Phocion, the bending of my browes hath done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of these flatterers have made ye oftentimes weep. Furthermore, his manner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsels he uttered; but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnesse. For as Zeno the Philosopher saith, that the wise man should temper his words with wit and reason, before he utter them: even so was Phocions speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyestus SPHETTIAN said, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech Phocion was very witty. For like as coines of Gold or Silver, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of goodnesse: even so the excellency of speech consisteth in signifying much by few words. And touching this matter, it is reported that Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone upon the Scaffold where the Players played, and was in a great muse with himselfe: whereupon, one of his friends seeing him so in his muses, said unto him. Surely Phocion, thy mind is occupied about somewhat. Indeed it is so, said he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I have to say to the people. For Demosthenes selfe little esteeming all other Orators, when Phocion rose up to speake, Ciceroes saying of Cato, and the Common-wealth of Rome. Catoes plaine manner became not the corrupt and subtile time.

speake, he would round his friends in the eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my words riseth peradventure he meant it by his manners also. For when a good man speaketh, not a winke of the eye, or a nod of his head, doth countervale many artificiall words and speeches of Rhetoricians. Furthermore, when he was a young man, he went to the warres under Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfect souldier, and in recompence thereof, he reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, and made him wiser than he was. For Chabrias otherwise being very dull and slothfull of himselfe, when he came to fight, he was so hot and couragious, that he would thrust himselfe into danger with the desperate persons: and therefore for his rashnesse it appressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wise to looke to himselfe, and very quick to execute on the one side quickened Chabrias slownesse, and on the other side also, by wisdom cooled his heate and fury. Chabrias therefore, being a good man and courteous, loved Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of service, making him famous amongst the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardest enterprises. For by his meanes he achieved great fame and honour in a battell by sea, which he wonne by the Isle of Naxos, giving him the left Wing of his Army, on which side the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he soonest put the enemies to flight. This battell being the first which the City of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had been taken, gave the people cause to love Chabrias, and made them also make account of Phocion as of a noble Souldier, and worthy to have charge. This victory was gotten on the Feast day of the great mysteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yearly in the sixteenth day of the moneth Badromion (now called August) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time Chabrias sending Phocion to receive the tribute of the Islanders their confederates, and the Ships which they should lend him, he gave them twenty Gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (it is reported) said unto him: If he sent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to have more Ships: but if he sent him as an Ambassadour unto his friends, that one ship would serve his turne. So went with one Galley onely; and after he had spoken with the Cities, and courteously dealt with the Governors of every one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their confederates, with a great Fleete of Ships and money, to carry unto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely reverence Chabrias while he lived, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friends and kinsmen, and sought to make his sonne Ctesippus an honest man, whom though he saw very wild and untoward, yet he never left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is said also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine frivolous questions, serving then under him, he being Captaine, and taking upon him to give him counsell, to reprove him, and to teach him the duty of a Captaine, he could not but say: O Chabrias, Chabrias, now do I pay for the love thou diddest beare me when thou wert alive, in bearing with the folly of thy sonne. But when he saw that the heads of the City of ATHENS had (as it were) by lot divided amongst themselves the Offices of warre and peace; and that some of them, as Eubulus, Aristophan, Demosthenes, Lycurgus and Hyperides were common speakers and preferers of matters in Councils and Senate: and that others, as Diophites, Menesthem, Leosthenes and Chares became great men by the warres, and had charge of Armies; he determined rather to follow the manner of government of Pericles, Aristides and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them seemed (as the Poet Archilocus saith,)

To be both Champions stout, of Mars's warlike band, And of the Muses eke, the Arts to understand.

He knew also that Pallas the goddesse and Protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica, to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, having thus disposed of himselfe in Government, he alwayes perswaded peace and quietnesse, and yet was often chosen Captaine, and had charge of Armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did never sue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serve the Common-wealth. It is certain that he was chosen five and forty times Prator, and was alwayes absent at the Elections, but yet sent for. Whereupon all the wisemen wondered to see the manner of the people towards him, considering that Phocion had never done nor said any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had been against their desires: and how they used other Governours notwithstanding, that there were more pleasant and delightfull in their Orations, like men to sport at: as it is said of Kings, who after they have washed their hands to go to their meate, do use to have jesters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other side, when they had occasion of warres indeed, how then like wise men they would bebinke themselves, and chuse the wisest and stoutest man of the City, and that most would withstand their mindes and desires. For on a time an Oracle of Apollo Delphicus, being openly read before them, which said, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the rest of the City: Phocion stepping forth before them all, bad them never seeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of their doings. Another time he chanced to say his people before all the people, the which they all praised and approved: but when he saw they were so suddenly become of his minde, he turned backe to his friends, and asked them: alas, hath not some evil thing slipped my mouth unawares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towards the solemnizing of a sacrifice; other men of his state having payed their part, he was often called upon to pay his: but but he answered them againe, Aske them that be rich, for it were a shame for me to give you any thing; being yet in this mans debt, pointing to Calicles the usurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out upon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: That on a time there was a coward preparing to go to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the Ravens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill signe, he put off his harnesse, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnesse againe, and went on his way toward the Campe, the Ravens began againe to make a goodlier cry behind him: but thereupon he stayed straight, and at length said: Ye shall croake as loud as ye list, before ye feed on my carcase. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre under his charge, would needs have him to leade them to give charge upon their enemies, but he would not. Thereupon they called him coward, and said, he durst not. Well said he againe, It is not you can make me valiant, no more then my self can make you cowards; and yet one of us know another. Another time in a marvellous dangerous time, the people handled him very churlishly, and would needs have him presently deliver account of his charge: but he answered them, O my friends, first save your selves. Furtherwore, the people being very lowly and humble, for farre, in time of warres; and presently in peace againe waxing brave in words against Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victory out of their hands, he only said thus to them: You are happy that have a Capitaine that knowes you, else you would sing a new song. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOEOTIANS and them, about their bounds and Frontiers, the which they would not try by law, but by battell: But Phocion told them, they did they wist not what, and counsell'd them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the stronger, and and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they so much disliked his opinion in the assembly, that they would not abide to hear him, nor suffer to him to speak. Well, my Masters, quoth he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you shall never compell me against my mind, to say that which is not to be spoken. He would as gallantly also gird the Orators his adversaries, when they were busie with him. As on a time he answered Demosthenes, that said unto him: The people, Phocion, will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads: Yea thee, quoth he, if they be wise. Againe, when Polyestus SPARTIAN, in a hot day perswaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with King Philip, sweating, and with much ado fetching his breath, being a fat man, that he was driven oftentimes to drinke water, to end his Oration: Surely said Phocion, ye shall do marvellous wisely, to make warre at such a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he do, when he hath his Curaces and his Target upon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an Oration only before you, which he hath studied long before, is almost stifled? Another time also when Lycurgus in his Oration had openly reproved him for many things before the people, and among the rest, for that Alexander demanding ten Citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counsell'd them to deliver them: Phocion answered him, I have oftentimes counsell'd them for the best, but they would never follow my counsell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a marvellous long beard, a beggarly cloake, and a fowre looke. Phocion being cheekt one day before the people, appealed unto Archibiades for a witnesse, to confirme that he spake. But he rising up, counsell'd the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiv'd, tooke him by the beard, and said unto him: Alas Archibiades, why diddest thou not then clip thy beard, seeing thou wouldst needs flatter? There was another great pleader, one Aristogiton, that in all the Assemblies of the City, did nothing but buzze warres continually in their ears. Afterwards when men were to be leaved and mustered, and their names entred that should go to the warres, Aristogiton came halting into the Market-place with a stasse in his hand, and both his legs bound up, to make the people believe that he was sicke and diseased. Phocion spying Aristogiton farre off, cried out to the Clarke that wrote the bills: Put in Aristogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muse, how, or wherefore so sharpe and severe a man (as by these examples it appeareth he was) could come to the surname of good. Notwithstanding, in the end I finde it a hard thing, but not impossible, that a man should be like wine, both sweet and sharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the first sight, seem very courteous and gentle of conversation, and upon better acquaintance, prove churlish and dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should say to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my sharpnesse, but consider if my sharpnesse be without profit. As who should say, men are not troublesome, but for covetousnesse only, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of insolency and malice, did abuse and contemne their authority. Phocion on the other side, never did Citizen hurt, for any private malice he bare him: but was ever sharpe and cruell to them which were against any matter he preferred for the benefit of the Commonwealt. For in all other things, he shewed himself marvellous lowly and courteous to every body, and would be familiar with his adversaries, and helpe them, if they wanted, or were otherwise in danger of displeasure with the state. Inasmuch as his friends therefore reproved him on a time, when he spake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O said he, honest men need no help. Another time, Aristogiton the Sycophant, being clapped up in prison, sent unto Phocion to pray him to come and speake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the prison to him, and when his friends perswaded him to the contrary, he answered them: O let me alone, said he, for where could I see Aristogiton more gladly than in prison? Furthermore, when there went any Army to Sea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen General but Phocion, the Towns and Islands all alongst the Sea coast (which were friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified walls, filled up their havens, and brought their wives, slaves, and cartell, and all their goods into their Townes and Cities, as if they had been enemies, and open war proclaimed. Contrarily also, if Phocion had been Capitaine and General, they would send out their Ships to the Sea to meete him afarre off, crowned with Garlands in token of common joy, and so would bring him to their Cities. King Philip secretly seeking to win the Ile of EUBÆA, sent an Army thither out of MACEDON, and enticed the Towns by Tyrants to rebell: whereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN prayed aide of the ATHENIANS, to take this Island from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wonne more and more, if they came not presently to aide them. So Phocion was sent General thither, but with a few men onely, because they made account the men of that Country would straight joyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found the mall Traytors and Rebels, and bribed with King Philips money, which he lavished out amongst them: so that he was brought into great danger. Thereupon he retired to a little hill severd from the plaine of TAMINES with a great large valley, and there fortified himself with that little Army he had. Then he perswaded his Captaines not to care for all those rebels, prattlers, and cowards which fled out of their Tents, and forsooke their Ensignes and Captaines, but that they should let them go out of the Campe where they would. For, said he, such disobedient souldiers here will do us no service, and moreover will hinder them that have good will to serve well: and at home also, knowing themselves in fault, for that they forsooke the Campe with licence, they dare not complaine upon us. Afterwards when the enemies came to set upon him, he commanded his men to Arme, and put themselves in readinesse and not to stirre untill he had done sacrifice: but he stayed long before he came, either because he could have no lucky signes of the sacrifices, or else for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to march for fear, went himself first into the field, with certaine light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of Armes seeing them give charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, stragling out of the Campe one after another disorderly, and so did set upon their enemies. The first being overthrowne, all the other disperfed themselves, and Plutarke himselfe fled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had been theirs, followed them even into their Campe, and came to throw downe their Rampiers. In the mean time, Phocion having ended his sacrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their Campe, and set upon them, and made part of them flee immediately, and part of them also they slew hard by the Trenches of their Campe. Then Phocion commanded that the battell should stand still, to receive their men that were scattered up and downe the fields: in the meane space he himself, with the choicest men of his Army, gave charge upon the enemies. The fight was cruell between them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their General (Glancus the sonne of Polymedes, and Thallus the sonne of Cineus) carried the praise away. And so did Cleophanes that day also shew himself very valiant. For he crying out still upon the horsemen that fled, and perswading them to come and help their General that was in danger, brought them backe againe, and thereby got the footmen the victory. After this battell, he drave Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the Castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a straightnesse, environed on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his men to take any GRECIANS prisoners, fearing lest the Orators at ATHENS might move the people, suddenly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these things were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But that did the confederates of the ATHENIANS straight wist for his justice and courtesie: and the ATHENIANS themselves also knew his skillfulnesse and manhood. For his successor Molossus, that was General for the rest of the warre, dealt so undiscreeitly, that he himselfe was taken prisoner there: Then King Philip being put in marvellous great hope, went with all his Army into HELLESPOINT, perswading himselfe, that he should straight take all CHERRONESUS, the Cities of PERINTH and BIZANTIUM. The ATHENIANS thereupon determining to send aide, to prevent King Philips coming, the Orators made great suite, that Chares might be chosen Capitaine: but he being sent thither with a good number of ships, did no service worthy commendation: neither would the Cities receive his Navy into their havens: but being suspected of every man, and despised of his enemies, he was driven to faile up and downe, and to get money of the Allies. The people being incensed by the Orators, were marvellously offended, and repented themselves that they had sent aide unto the BIZANTIANS. Then Phocion rising up, spake unto the people, and told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their confederates, they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captains that deserved to be mistrusted. For they, said he, do make your confederates afraid of you, who without you notwithstanding cannot have themselves. The people changing their mindes by his Oration, made Phocion againe their Capitaine, and sent him with an Army into HELLESPOINT to help their confederates there, which was of great importance to save the City of BIZANTIUM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was so great, that Cleon, the greatest man of vertue and authority in BIZANTIUM, having before been Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy, made suite for him unto the City. Then the BIZANTIANS would not suffer him (though he desired it) to Campe without the walls of their City, but opening their gates, received him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongst them. Who, perceiving how much the Citizens trusted them, did so honestly behave themselves in their conversation amongst them, that they gave them no manner of cause to complaine of them: and shewed themselves so valiant besides in all battells and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadful and invincible, every man being afraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPOINT without any thing done, done, and to his great discredit: where Phocion wanne some of his ships, and recovered againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his Garrisons. Furthermore, making diversie invasions into his Countreys, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was fore hurt there, and to driven to returne home againe, by means of a great Army that came against him to defend the Countrey. Shortly after, the MEGARANS secretly lent unto him, to deliver their City into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS understood it, that they would prevent him, he called a common assembly early in the morning, and told the people what message the MEGARANS had sent unto him. The people upon this motion being determined to aide them, Phocion straight founding the Trumpet at the breaking up of the assembly, gave them no further leisure, but to take their weapons; and so led them instantly incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARANS receiving him, Phocion shut up the haven of NESEA, and brought two long wals from the City unto it, and so joynd it unto the sea: whereby he stood not greatly in fear of his enemies by land; and for the sea, the ATHENIANS were Lords of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open warre against King Philip, and had chose other Captaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the Isles, above all things, he perswaded the people (King Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the danger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of these busie Orators that was still accusing one or other, said unto him: Why Phocion, how darest thou attempt to turne the ATHENIANS from warre, having now their swords in their hands? Yes truly, said Phocion: though in warre I know I shall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not hearken to him, and that Demosthenes carried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with King Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee friend, quoth Phocion unto him, let us not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall overcome; the which if we can so bring to passe, be sure we shall put the warre farre enough from us: for men that are overcome, be ever in fear and danger, wherefore they be. When the ATHENIANS had lost a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators, that hunted after innovation, preferred Charidemus to be chosen General of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the Magistrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the ARBOGITES, they made such earnest sute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much ado) they obtained, that the affaires of the City might be put into Phocions hands and government. He thought good to accept the Articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moved, that the City of ATHENS would enter into the common Treaty of peace, and common assembly of the state of GREECE, procured at Kings Philip's request, Phocion would not agree to it, untill they might understand what demands Philip would make at the assembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the perversnesse of time could not be liked of them, and that he saw the ATHENIANS soon after repented them that they did not follow his counsell, when they heard they should furnish King Philip with ships and horsemen: then he told them; the fear whereof ye now complaine, made me to withstand that, which now ye have consented unto. But sithence it is so that you have now past your consents, you must be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembering that your Ancestors in times past have sometime commanded, and otherwhile obeyed others; and yet have so wisely and discretely governed themselves in both fortunes, that they have not onely saved their City, but all GREECE besides. When newes came of King Philip's death, the people for joy would straight have made Bonfires and Sacrifices to the gods for the good newes: but Phocion would not suffer them, and said, that it was a token of a base mind, to rejoyce at any mans death; and besides that, the Army which overthrew you at CHERONNEA, hath not yett lost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speak ill of Alexander, and specially when he was near THEBES with his Army, Phocion rehearsed unto him these verses of

Homer:

How great a folly is it to stand Against a cruell King, Which being arm'd, and having sword in hand, Seeks fame of every thing?

What, when there is such a great fire kindled, wilt thou cast the City into it? For my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not suffer them to cast themselves away: for to that end have I taken upon me this charge and government. And afterwards also, when Alexander had razed the City of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliver him Demosthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus; and that the whole assembly and counsell not knowing what answer to make, did cast their eyes upon Phocion, and cried unto him to say his opinion he then rose up, and taking one of his friends unto him called Nicoles, whom he loved and trusted above all men else, he said thus openly unto them: These men whom Alexander requireth, have brought this City to this extremity, that if he required Nicoles here, I would give my consent to deliver him: for I would thinke my selfe happy to lose, for all your safety. Furthermore, though I am right heartily sorry (said he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come unto the City for succour: yet I assure you, it is better one City mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is best to intreat the conqueror for both, rather then to our certaine destruction to fight with him that is the stronger. It is said also that Alexander refused the first decree which the people offered him upon Phocions request, and sent away the Ambassadors, and would not speake with them. But the second which Phocion himself brought, he tooke, being told by his fathers old servants, that King Philip made accompt accompt of him: whereupon Alexander did not onely give him audience, and grant his request, but further followed his counsell. For Phocion perswaded him, if he loved quietnesse, to leave warre: if he desired fame, then that he should make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humor with such talke and discourse as he thought would like him best, he so altered and softened Alexanders disposition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS should looke to their affaires, for if he should die, he knew no people fitter to command then they. Furthermore, because he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend, he made so much of him, that he more honoured him then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Duris the Historiographer writeth, that when Alexander was growne very great, and had overcome King Darius, he left out of his letters this word Cherein (to wit, joy and health) which he used commonly in all the letters he wrote; and would no honour any other with that manner of salutation, but Phocion and Antipater. Chares also writeth the same. And they all do confesse, that Alexander sent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundred silver talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gave him such a great reward above all the other Citizens of ATHENS. Because said they, he onely esteemed thee to be a good and honest man. Phocion replied againe, then let him give me leave to be that I seem, and am whilst I live. The messengers would not so leave him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandry and chastitnesse. For they found his wife her self baking, and he himself drew water before them out of the well to wash his feet. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him then before, and prayed him to take the Kings present, and were offended with him, saying, it was a shame for Alexanders friend to live so miserably and beggarly as he did. Then Phocion seeing a poor old man go by, in a thread bare Gowne, asked them whether they thought him worse then he? No, God forbid, answered they againe. Then replied he againe, he lives with lesse then I do, and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be short, said he, if I should take this summe of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other side, if I occupy it, I shall make all the City speake ill of the King and me both. So this great present was sent backe from ATHENS: whereby he shewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer than needed not such gold and silver, then he that gave it him. But when Alexander wrote againe to Phocion, that he did not reckon them for his friends, that he would take nothing of him, Phocion notwithstanding would not take the money, but onely requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at liberty which were kept prisoners in the City SARDIS for certaine accusations layed against them: Echeeratides the Rhetorician, Athenodorus borne in the City of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander presently set them at liberty, and sent Criterus into MACEDON, commanding him to give Phocion the choice of one of these foure Cities of ASIA which he liked best: CIOIS, GARGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELEA: sending him word, that he would be much more angry with him now, if he did refuse his offer, than he was at first. But Phocion would never accept one of them: and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is seen yet at this day in the Village of MILITA, set forth with plates of Copper, but otherwise very meane, and without curiosity. For the wives he married, there is no mention made of the first, saving that Cephisodorus the Image Graver was her brother. But for his second wife she was no lesse famous at ATHENS, for her honesty and good husbandry, then Phocion for his justice and equity. And for prooffe thereof, it is reported that the ATHENIANS being one day assembled in the Theater, to see new Tragedies played, one of the Players when he should have come upon the Scaffold to have played his part, asked the setter forth of the Playes the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite upon her, because he was to play the part of a Queene. The setter forth of the Playes denying him, the Player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out upon the Stage. But Melanthinus the setter forth of the Playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the Stage, and cried out unto him: Doe not thou see Phocions wife that goeth up and downe the City with one maide onely waiting upon her? and wilt thou play the foole and marre the modesty of the women of ATHENS? The people hearing his words, filled all the Theater with joy and clapping of hands. The same Lady, when a certaine Gentlewoman of IONIA came at ATHENS to see her, and shewed her all the rich Jewels and precious Stones he had, she answered her againe: All my riches and Jewels, is my husband Phocion, who these twenty yeeres together hath continually been chosen General for the ATHENIANS. Phocions sonne telling his father on a time, that he was desirous to contend with other young men for the victory, who should cunningly leap out, and get up againe into the Chariots or Coaches, running full course at the feasts Panathenaea at ATHENS: his father was contented he should; not that he was desirous his sonne should have the honour of the victory, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better manners, for that he was a dissolute young man, and much given to Wine. Yet he wanne the victory at that time, and there were diverse of his fathers friends, that prayed him to do them that honour, that they might keep the feast of this victory in their houses. Phocion denied them all but one man, and him he suffered to shew his good will unto his house, and went thither himself to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing Bathes of Wine and sweet smelling Spices to wash the feet of the bidden guests as they came to the feast. Whereupon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phocion, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victory with excess? But because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there among young boyes brought up after the LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much much despise his owne Country manners and fashions. Also when Demades the Orator one day said unto Phocion: Why do we not perswade the ATHENIANS to live after the LACONIAN manner? As for me, said he, if thou wilt make one to set it forward, I am ready to be the first man to move the matter. Indeed quoth Phocion, thou art a meet man to perswade the ATHENIANS to live LACONIAN-like in common together at their meales, and to praise Lycurgus straight law, that art thy selfe commonly so presumed, and fine in thy apparel. Another time when Alexander wrote letters unto ATHENS to fend him some ships, and the Orators perswaded them not to grant him, the people called upon Phocion chiefly to say his opinion: then Phocion told them plainly, methinkes ye must either make your selves the strongest in wars, or being the weaker, procure to be friends unto the stronger. Puthias a new come Orator, being full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speake in every matter: wherefore Phocion said to him, Good gods! will this Novice never leave babling? And when Harpalus King Alexanders Lieutenant of the Province of BABYLON, fled out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with a great summe of gold and silver, straight these men that sold their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a fliot of Swallows. And he stuck not to give every one of them a peece of money to baste them with: for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion himselfe he sent seven hundred talents, and offered himselfe and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Phocion gave him a sharpe answer, and told him that he would make him repent if he corrupted the City of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus being amazed therewith, left him at that time, and went unto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIANS sate in councill about him, he perceived that those which had taken his money were shrunk from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should have excused him, to bleare world, that men should not suspect them they had been corrupted: and that Phocion on the other side which had refused his money, having respect to the Common-wealth, had also some regard to save his life: he once more attempted all the waies he could to winne him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could carry the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendship with Chariles (Phocions sonne in Law) he made him to be ill spoken of, and greatly suspected, because men saw that he trusted him in all things, and employed him in all his affaires: as in committing to his trust the making of a sumptuous Tombe for Pythonicé, the famous Curtisan that was dead, whom he loved, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking upon him whereof was no lesse shame unto Chariles, then the finishing thereof was disgrace unto him. This Tombe is seen unto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to ELEUSINE: the workmanship thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirty talents, which was reported to be given by Harpalus unto Chariles, for the finishing of the same. Furthermore, after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her up. Afterwards also, Chariles being accused for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he besought his father in law Phocion, to helpe to ease him in his judgement. But Phocion flatly denied him, and said: Chariles I tooke thee for my sonne in law, in all honest and just causes onely. Furthermore, when Aclepiades the son of Hipparchus, brought the first news of the death of Alexander, Demades the Orator would not believe him: for said he, if it were true, all the earth would smell of the favor of his Corpse. Phocion then perceiving the people began to be high minded, and sought innovation, he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got up to the Pulpit for Orations, and cried out, that Aclepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it shall be true also to morrow, and the next day after. And therefore my masters, be not too hasty, but thinke of it at better leisure, and set your affaires at a sure stay. When Leosthenes also by his practise had brought the City of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES war, and in scorne asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done unto the Common-wealth so many yeares together, as he had been General over the ATHENIANS: Phocion answered him, No small good said he, for all my Country men have been buried at home in their owne graves. Another time also, Leosthenes speaking proudly and insolently unto the people, Phocion one day had said unto him: Young man my friend, thy words are like unto the Cypress Tree, which is high and great, but beareth no fruit. Then Hyperides rising up, asked Phocion: When wilt thou then counsell the ATHENIANS to make warre? When I shall see young men, said he, not to forsake their ranks. rich men liberal, and Orators leave to rob the Common-wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondered to see such a goodly great Army as Leosthenes had leaved, and that they asked Phocion how he liked it: It is a goodly Army, quoth he for a furlong, but I fear their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I do not see the City able to make any more money, nor more ships, neither yet any more souldiers than these. The which proved true as it fell out afterwards: for at the first, Leosthenes did many notable exploits. He overcame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and drave Antipater into the City of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in such a hope and jollity, that they made continuall feasts and sacrifices through the City, to thanke the gods for these good newes. And there were some among them, that to take Phocion in a trippie, asked him if he did not wish that he had done all those things? Yes indeede, answered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not have given the counsell to have done them. Another time also when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, Good gods, said he, when shall we leave off to overcome? But when Leosthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion should be appointed Captaine, in his place, and that he would pacifie the warre, did thrust in a man of mean behaviour, and unknowne, that said in full Assembly of Councill, that he was Phocions friend, and Schoole-fellow, and therefore besought the People that they would spare Phocion, because they had not such another man as he, and that they would make Antiphalus General of the Army. The People were well contented withall. But then Phocion stood up, and said, that this man was never Scholar with him, neither did he ever know him before that time: but now, said he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friend, for thou hast given the People the best counsell for me. The People notwithstanding determining to make Warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion spake against it all he could. Thereupon his friends bidding him beware of such speeches, how he did offend the People, lest they killed him, he answered them: They shall wrongfully put me to death, quoth he, speaking for the benefit of my Country, but otherwise they shall have reason for to do it, if I speake to the contrary. But when he saw nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on still with their intent, then he commanded the Herald to proclaime by sound of Trumpet, that all Citizens from fourteen yeares unto threescore, able to carry Weapon, should presently upon the breaking up of the Assembly, arme themselves, and follow him with five daies Provision for Victuals; then was there great stirre amongst them in the City, and the old men came and complained unto him, for his over-straight commandement. He told them againe, I do you no wrong: for I am fourescore my selfe, and yet will go with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fond desire of Warre. But when all the Sea-coast was full of Souldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other strangers which were led by Micion their Captaine, that landed in the Territory of the Village RHAMNUS, and spoiled the Country thereabouts, then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, divers taking upon them the Office of a Lieutenant, and going about to counsell him, some to lodge his Campe upon such a Hill, and others to fend his Horsemen to such a place, and others to campe here: O Hercules, quoth he, how many Capitaines do I see, and how few Souldiers! Afterwards when he had set his Footmen in Battell ray, there was one among them that left his ranke, and stepped out before them all. Thereupon one of his Enemies also made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS heart failed, and he went backe againe to his place. Then said Phocion unto him: Art thou not ashamed, young lout, to have forsaken thy ranke twice? the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee; and the other, in the which thou haddest placed thy selfe? So Phocion giving Charge upon the Enemies, he overthrew them, and slew Micion their Captaine, and divers others. Furthermore, the Army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wanne the Battell of Antipater, and Leonatus that joyned with him, with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was slaine in the Field, Antiphalus being General of the Footmen, and Menon the THESSALIAN Colonel of the Horsemen. Shortly after Craterus coming out of ASIA into EUROPE with a great Army, they fought a Battell by the City of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were overthrowne: yet was not the overthrow nor slaughter great, although it came through the disobedience of the Souldiers to their Capitaines, which were but young men, and used them over-gently. Moreover, when Antipater practised to make the Cities revolt, they betrayed them, and shamefully forsooke to defend their common liberty: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his Army to the City of ATHENS. Demosthenes and Hyperides understanding that, forsooke the City. Then Demades, that was in disgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of such fines as were set upon his head (being seven severall times condemned, because he had so many times moved matters contrary to the Law) and could not therefore be suffered any more to speake in the Assembly, was then dispensed withall, and licensed to speake: whereupon he moved the People to send Ambassadors unto Antipater, with full Commission and Authority to treat with him of Peace. The People fearing to put to any mans trust this absolute Authority to treat of Peace, they called for Phocion, saying, that he onely was to be trusted with the Ambassade. Then Phocion answered them: If you had believed my former counsels I alwaies gave you, such weighty matters should not now have troubled you at all. So the Decree being confirmed by the People, Phocion was sent Ambassador unto Antipater, that lay at the Castle of Cadmea, being ready at that time to invade the Countrey of ATTICA. Phocion first requested him, that before he removed from thence, he would make Peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus presently answered him: Phocion thy request is unreasonable, that lying here we should eate out our friends, and destroy their Country, when we may live of our Enemies, and enrich our selves with their spoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we must needs do Phocion this pleasure. And for the rest, touching the Capitulations of Peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS should send them a blanke, and refer the Conditions of Peace to them: like as himselfe being besieged in the City LAMIA, had referred all Capitulations and Articles of Peace, unto the discretion of Leosthenes their General. So when Phocion was come backe to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS seeing there was no remedy, were compelled to be contented with such offer of Peace, as the Enemy made them. Then Phocion was sent backe againe to Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors joyned in Commission with him: amongst whom also was that famous Philosopher, Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no living man so proud, cruell, disdainfull, nor hasty of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would soften and qualifie him, and make him to reverence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his perverse nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the rest, and would not once salute Xenocrates. Whereupon some say, that

Xenocrates

Xenocrates said then, Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a witness of the discourtesie and evil he meaneth unto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates began to speake, Antipater would not abide to hear him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end commanded him to hold his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater answered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, so they delivered him Demosthenes and Hyperides: that they should keepe their ancient Lawes and Government; that they should receive a Garrison into the Haven of Munychia; that they should defray the charges of this Warre, and also pay a ranfome besides. All the other Ambassadors but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these Conditions of Peace, as very reasonable and favourable: but he said, that for Slaves Antipater did handle them favourably, but for Free-men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion besought him that he would yet release them of their Garrison. But Antipater (as it is said) answered him: Phocion, we would gladly grant thee any thing, saving that which would undo thee, and us both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater said not so, but asked him if he would become surety for the ATHENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the Articles and Conditions of this Peace, if he did release them of this Garrison. Phocion then holding his peace, and delaying answer, there was one Callimedes surnamed Carobus (a bold man, and hated the liberty of the People) that brake forth in these words: If Phocion were so fond to give his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldst thou Antipater believe him therefore, and leave to do that thou hast determined: Thus were the ATHENIANS driven to receive the Garrison of the MACEDONIANS, of the which Menyllus was Captaine, an honest man, and Phocion's friend. This commandement to receive the Garrison within the Haven of Munychia, was found very stately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glory to boast of his Power, then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the Castle, he further increased their griefe: because the Garrison entred the twentieth day of Boedromion (to wit, the Moneth of August) on the which the Feast day of their Mysteries was celebrated, at what time they make their Procession called Iacchus, from the City of ATHENS, unto ELEUSIN. Therefore the solemnity of this holy Feast being thus confused, many began to confider, that in old time when their Realme did flourish, there were heard and seene Voices and Images of the gods on that day, which made the Enemies both afraid and amazed: and now in contrary manner in the very self-same solemnity of the gods, they saw the greatest calamity that could have happened unto GREECE. And the holiest Feast which was kept all the yeare through before, became then to be profaned with the Title of the greatest misfortune and event that ever happened unto the GREGIANS, which was, the losse of their liberty. For not many yeares before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE unto ATHENS: that they should looke well to the Rocks of Diana, that strangers should not possesse them. And about that time also, the Coverings with the which they do adorne the holy Beds of the Mysteries, being wet with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yellow and pale, as if it had bene the covering of a dead body. Yea, and that which was most to be wondered at of all other, was this: vering of other Coverings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did that taking other Coverings which they had before. When one of the Ministers of the Temple also did wash a white Pigge in the Sea, in a cleare place by the Wharfe, there suddenly came a great Fish that bit at it, and carried the hinder parts of the Pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men conjectured that the gods did signifie unto them, that they should lose the lowest part of their City, nearest unto the Sea, and should keepe the highest parts thereof. This notwithstanding, the Garrison did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, because of the honesty of their Captaine Menyllus. Now there were above twelve thousand Citizens, that for their poverty lost the benefit of their Freedome, of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, unto whom it seemed that they offered great wrong and injury: and part of them also went into THRACIA, where Antipater assigned them Townes and Lands to inhabit. They seemed to be men like unto them, that had bene taken by assault, or by siege within a City, which had bene compelled to forsake their Country. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the Isle of CALAURIA, and of Hyperides by the City of CLEONES, (whereof we have written heretofore) were almost occasion given them to lament the times of the reigne of King Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was slaine, they that had overcome him, were so cruell unto their Subjects, that a labourer in the Country of PHRYGIA digging the Earth, being asked what he sought for, answered sighing: I seeke for Antigonus. Then many men began to say as much, when they remembered the noble mindes of those two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like unto Antipater, who craftily cloaked his tyrannicall Power, which he usurped, by being familiar, going simply apparelled, and faring meanly, and yet shewed himselfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lord and Tyrant unto them whom he had overcome. Nevertheless, Phocion obtained of him the restoring againe of divers men, whom he had banished: and those whom he could not get to be restored, yet he procured that they should not be banished into so farre Countreys, as others which had bene sent beyond the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tanarus out of GREECE, but that they had liberty to remaine within the Country of PELOPONNESUS: among the which was one Agonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he governed them that remained in ATHENS, with with great justice and lenity, and such as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwaies preferred to some Office: but such as he saw were fantastical People, and desirous of change, he kept them from Office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished away of themselves, and learned in time to love the Countrey, and to follow Tillage. When he saw Xenocrates also pay a certaine Pension or Tribute to the Common-wealth, which all strangers dwelling in ATHENS did use yearly to pay, he would have made him a Free-man, and offered to put his name amongst the number of the free Citizens. But Xenocrates refused it, saying, he would have no part of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof he had bene sent Ambassadour. And when Menyllus had sent Phocion Money, he made him answer, that Menyllus was no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occasion to receive his Present, then when he had refused King Alexanders Gift. Menyllus replying againe, said, that if he had no neede of it for himselfe, yet he might let his Sonne Phocus have it. But Phocion answered: If my Sonne Phocus will leave his naughty life, and become an honest man, that which I will leave him, shall serve his turne very well; but if it be so, that he will still hold on the course he hath taken, there is no Riches then that can suffice him. Another time also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he would have had him done an unhonest thing: Antipater (said he) cannot have me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater's selfe was wont to say, that he had two friends at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could never make the one to take any thing of him; and the other, he could never satisfie. And truly Phocion's Poverty was a great glory unto his Vertue, sithence he was growne old, continuing in the same, after he had bene so many times Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had received such friendship and courtesie of so many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrary delighted to shew his Riches, in things that were contrary to the Lawes of the City. For a Decree being made at ATHENS, commanding that no stranger, upon forfeiture of a thousand Drachmas to be payed to the defrayer of the Dances of the City, should be any of the Dancers that danced at any common Playes or Sports: Demades one day making certaine Games and Sports at his owne charges, brought a hundred Dancers of strangers at one time, and withall brought also a hundred thousand Drachmas to pay the forfeiture thereof. Another time when he married his Sonne Demas, he said unto him: Sonne, when I married thy Mother, there was so small rolt, that my next Neighbour knew not of it; where now at thy Marriage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the Feast. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to go unto Antipater, to intreate him to take his Garrison out of their City, he still refused the Ambassade, either because he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he saw the People more obedient unto reason, for feare of the Garrison. Howbeit he obtained of Antipater, that he should not be too hattie in the demanding of his Money, but should deferre it untill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiving they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter upon him, and went with his Sonne into MACEDON; whither doublelesse his destiny carried him to his utter destruction, even at that very time when Antipater was fallen sicke of a disease whereof he died: whereby the Affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Cassander his Sonne, who had intercepted a Letter of this Demades, which he had sent unto Antigonus in ASIA, willing him to come in all possible speede to winne GREECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rotten thread, mocking Antipater in this manner. Wherefore Cassander being advertised of his arrivall, he made him presently to be apprehended; and setting his Sonne hard by him, slew him before his Father, so neare him, that the bloud of his Sonne sprang upon him, so that the Father was all bloudied with the murder of his Sonne. Then Cassander casting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and treacherous Treason against his Father, giving him all the reproachfull words he could devise, at the length he slew him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death had established Polyperchon Generall of the Army of the MACEDONIANS, and Cassander his Sonne onely Colonell of a thousand Footmen. He notwithstanding, after his Father's decease, taking upon him the government of the Realme, sent Nicanor with speede to succed Menyllus in the Captainship of the Garrison of ATHENS, before his death should be revealed, commanding him first in any case to take the Castle of MUNYCHIA, which he did. Shortly after the ATHENIANS understanding of the death of Antipater, they accused Phocion, for that he had knowne of his death long before, and yet kept it secret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not his accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor; whom he handled to wisely, that he made him not onely friendly unto the ATHENIANS, but furthermore perswaded him to be at some charge to give the People the pastime of common Playes, which he made to be done at his cost. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the government of the Kings person, meaning to give Cassander a slapant and blurt, he sent Letters Patents unto the People at ATHENS, declaring how the young King did restore unto them their popular state againe, and commanded that all the ATHENIANS should use their former ancient Lawes of their City. This was a wise and crafty fetch against Phocion: For Polyperchon devising this practise to get the City of ATHENS into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, unlesse he found meanes first to banish Phocion; and thought that he should easily bring that to passe, when such as had before bene put off their freedome by his meanes, should come againe to have voices in the Assembly. and that the seditious Orators and Accusers might be turned at liberty againe, to say what they would. Phocion sent Prisoner to Athens to be condemned.

the Contents of these Letters Patents, began to be somewhat quickened and moved withall: whereupon Nicanor desiring to speake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was assembled in the Haven of PIREÆA, he went and hazarded his person amongst them, upon Phocion's faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the King, being secretly advertised thereof, and in the Field, not farre from the City, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor having warning of it in time, saved himselfe. Then it appeared that Nicanor would presently be revenged of the City, and they accused Phocion because he kept him not, but did let him go. Whereunto he answered, That he truitied Nicanor's word, and that he did not thinke he would offer the City any hurt; but if it should fall out otherwise, he had rather the World should know, that he had no wrong offered him, then that he should offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly spoken; in respect of himselfe: but considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the safety of his Countrey, I cannot tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to have had to the safety of his Countrey. Neither could he also alleadge for his excuse, that he did not lay hands on Nicanor, for feare to bring the City into manifest Warre: but that for a colour he did prefer the faith which he had sworne and promised unto him, and the justice that he would observe in his behalfe, that for his sake, Nicanor should afterwards keepe himselfe in peace, and do no hurt to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in truth it seemed, that nothing deceived Phocion, but the over-trust he had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, because when divers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he fought all the secret meanes he could to surprize the Haven of PIREÆA, and that he daily passed over Souldiers in the Isle of SALAMINA, and practised to bribe certaine of the Inhabitants within the precincts of the Haven, he would never heare of it, and much lesse believe it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMERIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS should prepare to be in readinesse to waite upon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commanded them; he made no account of it, untill he saw Nicanor come out with his Souldiers from the Fort of MUNYCHIA, and that he began to cast Trenches to compass in the Haven of PIREÆA. But then, when Phocion thought to leade out the People to prevent him, he found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commandement. In the meane time Alexander the Sonne of Polyperchon came with an Army, pretending to aide them of the City against Nicanor, where indeed he meant (if he could) to get the rest of the City into his hands, then especially, when they were in greatest broile one against another; and the rather, because the banished men entred hand over head with him, and divers strangers also, and other defamed men: so that there was a confused Councill and Assembly of Omnigatherum kept within the City, without any order; in the which Phocion was deprived of his Office of Generall, and others were also chosen Captaines in his place. And had they not seene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the Walls of the City, which made the ATHENIANS afraid and mistrustfull, they had never saved it from taking. At that time Phocion was presently accused of Treason by the Oratour Agnonides: the which Callimedes and Pericles fearing, got them out of the City betimes. And Phocion also with his friends that were not fled, went unto Polyperchon: with whom also Solon PLATEIAN and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN went for company, who thought to have found friendship and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling sicke by the way in the City of ELATIA, they stayed there many daies, hoping of his recovery. But in the meane time, the People at the perswasion of the Oratour Agnonides, and at the request of Archestratus, stablished a Decree, to send Ambassadors unto Polyperchon, to accuse Phocion: inso much as both parties met at one selfe-time, and found him in the Field with the King about a Village of the Countrey of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, standing at the foote of the Mountaine Acrorion, which they surname also Galaten. There Polyperchon commanded a Cloth of Gold to be set up, and caused the King to be set under the same, and all his chiefest friends about him. But to begin withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commanded them to put him to death, after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to say. Then they began to quarrell, and to be loud one with another, accusing one another in the presence of the King and his Councill, untill Agnonides at length stepped forth, and said: My Lords of MACEDON, put us all in Prison, and then send us bound hands and feete to ATHENS, to give account of our doings. The King laughed to heare him say so. But the Noblemen of MACEDON that were present then, and divers strangers besides to heare their complaints, made signe to the Ambassadors to utter their accusations before the King, rather then to refer them to the hearing of the People at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not a like indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked up Phocion oftentimes, and did still cut off his tale as he thought to purge himselfe; inso much as in anger he beate his staffe he had in his hand against the ground, and commanded him at length to hold his peace, and to get him thence. And when Hegemon also told Polyperchon, that he himselfe could best witnesse, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully served and loved the People, he angrily answered him: Come not hither to lie falsely upon me in the presence of the King. Therewith the King rose out of his seate, and tooke a Speare in his hand, thinking to have killed Hegemon, had not Polyperchon suddenly embraced him behinde, and staid him: So the Councill rose, and brake up, but presently Phocion was apprehended, and they that stood by him. Certaine of his friends seeing that, which stood farther off, musted their faces, and straight conveyed themselves away. The rest were sent Prisoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not so much to have their causes heard there, as to have them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carrying of them them to ATHENS was shamefull. For they were carried upon Carts through the great streete Ceramicum unto the Theater, where Clitus kept them untill the Senate had assembled the People, excepting no Bondman, no stranger, nor defamed person out of this Assembly, but left the Theater wide open to all comers in, whatsoever they were, and the Pulpit for Orations free for every man that would speake against him. So first of all, the Kings Letters were read openly, by the which he did advertise the People, that he had found these offenders convicted of Treason: notwithstanding, that he referred the sentence of their condemnation unto them, for that they were Free-men. Then Clitus brought his Prisoners before the People, where the Noblemen when they saw Phocion, were ashamed, and hiding their faces, wept to see him. Howbeit, there was one that rose up, and said: My Lords, sith the King referreth the judgement of so great persons unto the People, it were great reason all the Bond-men and strangers which are no free Citizens of ATHENS, should be taken out of this Assembly. The People would not agree to it, but cried out, that such Traitors should be stoned to death, that favour the Authority of a few, and are enemies of the People: whereupon silence was made, and no man durst speake any more for Phocion. Nevertheless when Phocion with much ado had obtained audience, he asked them: My Lords, will ye justly or wrongfully put us to death? Some answered him, justly. How then can you do it, quoth he, that will not heare our justification? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion coming nearer, said unto them: For my selfe, my Lords, I confesse I have done you wrong, and have in Government committed faults deserving death; but for these Prisoners with me, what have they done why you should put them to death? The common People answered him, Because they are thy friends. With this answer Phocion departed, and spake never a word more. Then the Oratour Agnonides holding a Decree in his hand ready written, read it openly to the People, declaring how they should be judged by voices, whether the offenders had deserved death or not: and if it were found they had, then that they should all be put to death. And there were, that when this Decree was read, cried out, that they should adde further unto the Decree, that before Phocion should be put to death, they should first torment him: and therewithall commandement was given, that the Wheele should be set up to breake his joints upon it, and also that the Hangman should be sent for. But then Agnonides perceiving that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking besides it were too beastly and barbarous a part to use him in that sort, he said openly: My Lords, when you shall have such a Varlet in your hands as Callimedes, then you may cast him on the Wheele; but against Phocion, I would not wish such cruelty. Then rose up a Nobleman among them, and added to his words: Thou hast reason to say so, Agnonides, for if Phocion should be laid on the Wheele, what should we then do with thee? The Decree being confirmed according to the Contents thereof, judgement was given by voices of the People, no man sitting, but all standing up, and most of them with Garlands on their heads, for the joy they had to condemne these Prisoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned Nicoles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pischoles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedes and Charicles, were also in their absence condemned to die. Now when the Assembly was broken up, and that the persons condemned were carried backe to Prison, from thence to be conveyed to execution: others embracing their friends, and taking their last leave of them as they went, wept, and lamented their curld fortune. But Phocion looking as cheerfully of it as he was wont to do being Generall, when they honourably waited on him to his Houle from the Assembly, he made many of them pity him in their hearts, to consider his constancy and noble courage. On the other side also, there were many of his Enemies that came as neare unto him as they could, to revile him, amongst whom there was one that stepped before him, and did spit in his face. Then Phocion turning him unto the Magistrates, said: Will ye not cause this impudent fellow to leave his railing? When they were in Prison, Thudippus seeing the Hemlocke which they brayed in a Mortar to give them drinke, he began desperately to curse and ban, saying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, said Phocion againe, and doest thou not rather rejoyce to diewith me? When one that stood by, asked Phocion if he would any thing to his Sonne Phocus: Yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him never revenge the wrong the ATHENIANS doe me. Then Nicoles, one of Phocion's dearest friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poyson before him. Phocion answered him, Thy request is grievous to me, Nicoles: but because I never denied thee anything in my life, I will also grant thee this at my death. When all the rest had drunke, there was no more poyson left, and the Hangman said he would make no more, unless they gave him twelve Drachmas, for so much the pound did cost him: Phocion perceiving then that the Hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends unto him, and prayed him to give the Hangman that little Money he demanded, sith a man cannot die at ATHENS for nothing, without cost. It was the nineteenth day of the Moneth of Munichion, (so wit, March) on which day the Knights were wont to make a solemne Procession in the honour of Jupiter: howbeit some of them left off the Garlands of Flowers which they should have worne on their heads, and others also looking towards the Prison doore as they went by, burst out a weeping. For they whose hearts were not altogether hardened with cruelty, and whose judgements were not wholly suppressed with envie, thought it a grievous Sacriledge against the gods, that they did not let that day passe, but that they did defile so solemne a Feast with the violent death of a man. His Enemies notwithstanding, continuing still their anger against him, made the People passe a Decree, that his body should be banished, and carried out of the bounds of the Countrey of ATTICA, forbidding forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire should be made for the solemnizing of his Funerals. For this respect no friend of his did once touch his body. Howbeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his living that way, being hired for Money to burne mens bodies, he tooke his Corte, and carried it beyond the City of ELEUSIN, and getting fire out of a Womans Houfe of MEGARA, he solemnized his Funerals. Furthermore, there was a Gentlewoman of MEGARA, who coming by chance that way, with her Gentlewoman, where his body was but newly burnt, she caused the Earth to be cast up a little where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow Tombe; whereupon she did use such sprinklings and effusions, as are commonly done at the Funerals of the dead: and then taking up his bones in her lappe in the night, she brought them home, and buried them in her hearth, saying: O deare hearth, to thee I bequeath the Reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring him one day to the Grave of his Ancestors, when the ATHENIANS shall come to confesse the fault and wrong they have done unto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the untowardnesse of their Affaires, that they had put him to death, who onely maintained Justice and Honesty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his Image to be set up in Brasse, and gave honourable buriall to his Bones, at the charges of the City. And for his Accusers, they condemned Agnonides of Treason, and put him to death themselves. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the City, were afterwards met with by his Sonne Phocion, who was revenged of them. This Phocion, as men report, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a young Maide, which a Bawd kept, coming by chance one day into the Schoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that believed nor there were any gods) make this Argument: If it be no shame, said he, to deliver a mans friend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeeme his Lemman which he loveth: even so it is all one to redeeme a mans Lemman, as his friend. This young man taking this Argument to serve his turne, believing that he might lawfully do it, got the young Maide he loved from the Bawd. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also revive the lamentable death of Socrates unto the GRECIANS: for men thought that was a like hainous offence, and calamity unto the City of ATHENS.

THE LIFE OF CATO UTICAN.

Ann. Mund.
3891.

Ant. Christ.

His Family and House of Cato tooke his first Glory and Name of his great The Parent-Grandfather Cato the Censor: who for his vertue (as we have declared in the life of Cato, his Life) was one of the famousst and worthiest men of ROME in his time. This Cato whom we now write of, was left an Orphan by his Father and Mother, with his Brother Cepio, and Porcia his Sister. Servilia was also Cato's halfe Sister by his Mothers side. All these were brought up with their Uncle Livius Drusus, at that time the greatest man of the City: for he was passing eloquent, and very honest, and of as great a courage besides, as any other ROMANE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed himselfe both in word and countenance, and also in all his Pastimes and Recreations, very constant and stable. For he would go through with that he tooke upon him to do, and would force himselfe above his strength: and as he could not away with flatterers, so was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh; and yet had ever a pleasant countenance. He was not cholericke, nor easie to be angered; but when the bloud was up, he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to Schoole, he was very dull of understanding, and slow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would never forget it, as all men else commonly do. For such as are quick of concept, have commonly the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, do keepe that better which they have learned. For every kinde of learning is a motion and quickening of the minde. He seemed besides not to be light of credit, and that may be some cause of his slownesse in concept. For truly he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and therefore of it cometh, that they that have least reason to resist, are those which do give lightest credit. For young men are easilier perswaded then old men, and the sicke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his doubts, there he is soonest brought to believe any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported, that Cato was obedient unto his Schoole-master, and would do what he commanded him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of every thing. Indeed his Schoole-master was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to strike him with his fist. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the People of ITALY which were Confederates of the ROMANES, sued to be made free Citizens of ROME. At that time it chanced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant Souldier, and of great estimation among the Confederates of the ROMANES, and a great friend besides of Drusus, to be lodged many daies at his House. He in this time falling acquainted with these young Boyes, said one day unto them: Good Boyes, intreate your Uncle to speake for us, that we may be made free Citizens of ROME. Cepio smiling, nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no answer, looked very wisely upon the strangers that lay in the House. Then Pompedius taking him aside, asked him: And thou, my pretty Boy, what sayest thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine Uncle, as well as thy Brother, to be good to his Guests?

Cato still held his peace and answered nothing, but shewed by his silence and looke, that he would not heare their request. Then Pompeius taking him up in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would have let him have gone, and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his armes without the window, and said, Promise us then, or else I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and never quinned for it, nor shewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompeius setting him downe againe, told his friends that stood by him: O what good hap doth this Childe promise one day unto ITALY, if he live? Sure if he were a man, I believe we should not have one voice of all the People on our side. Another time there were some of Cato's neare Kinsmen, that keeping the Feast day of his birth, had many young Boyes to supper, and amongst others this Cato. The Boyes to occupie themselves till Supper was ready, gathered themselves together great and small, into some private place of the Houfe. Their play was, counterfeiting pleadings before the Judges, accusing one another, and carrying them that were condemned to Prison. Amongst them a goodly young Boy was carried by a bigger Boy into a little Chamber, bound and a condemned person. The Boy perceiving he was locked up, cried out unto Cato: who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the Chamber doore, and putting them by force that withstood him to come unto it, he tooke out the young Boy, and carried him very angrily with him to his owne Houfe, and all the other young Boyes followed him also. So Cato had such name among the young Boyes, that when Sylla made the Game of young Boyes running on Horse-backe, which the ROMANES call Troia; to appoint them before that they might be ready at the day of the Show, he having gotten all the young Boyes of Noble-houses together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the Boyes tooke the one, because of his Mother Metella, which was the Wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was Nephew to Pompey the Great, neither would they be exercised under him, nor follow him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would have: they all cried then, Cato, and Sextus himselfe did willingly give him the honour, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their Fathers friend, and therefore did fend for them many times to come unto him, and he would talke with them: the which kindnesse he shewed to few men, for the Majesty and great Authority he had. Sarpedo also (Cato's Schoolmaster) thinking it a great preferment and fatery for his Scholars, did commonly bring Cato unto Sylla's Houfe, to waite upon him: the which was rather like unto a Goale or Prison, for the great number of Prisoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but fourteene yeares of age, and perceiving that there were many heads brought which were laid to be of great men, and that every body sighed and mourned to see them, he asked his Schoolmaster, how it was possible the Tyrant scaped, that some one or other killed him not? Because, quoth Sarpedo, that all men feare him more then they hate him. Why then, replied Cato againe, didst thou not give me a Sword, that I might kill him, to deliver my Countrey of this slavish bondage? Sarpedo hearing the Boy say so, and seeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choler, he marvelled much at it, and afterwards had a very good eye unto him, lest rashly he should attempt something against Sylla. When he was but a little Boy, some asked him whom he loved best? My Brother, said he. Then the other continuing still to aske him, and who next? he answered likewise his Brother. Then the third time againe, likewise his Brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him so oft. Yea and when he was come of age also, he then confirmed the love he bare to his Brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he never supped without his Brother Cato, neither went he ever out of his Houfe into the Market-place, nor into the Fields without him: but when his Brother did anoint himselfe with sweete oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things else, he led a straight and hard life. So that his Brother Cato being commended of every man for his temperance, honesty, and sober life, he granted indeed, that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life: but when I do (said he) compare my life with my Brother Cato's, methinks then there is no difference betwixt me and Scippius. This Scippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apollos Priest, he went from his Brother, and tooke his portion of the Goods of his Father, which amounted to the summe of an hundred and twenty Talents. Then he lived more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance with Antipater TYRIAN, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gave himselfe chiefly unto the study of Morall and Civill Philosophy, imbracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was plucked forward by some god: but above all other vertues, he loved the severity of justice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor favour. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the People, because he would there should be certaine warlike Forces entertained in civill Philosophy, as also in a great City. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any body, neither would he ever have any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so little in company: It skilleth no matter, quoth he, so they cannot reprove my life, for I will begin to speake, when I can say something worthily to be spoken. Hard by the Market-place there was the common Palace or Towne-house of the City, called Basilica Porcia, the which place Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience, and because there was a Pillar that troubled their seates, they would either have taken it away, or else have set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to go into the Market-place, and to get up into the Pulpit for Orations, to speake against them, where having given this first prooffe of his eloquence and noble minde, he was marvelously esteemed of. For his Oration was not like a young man, counterfeiting finenesse of speech and and affectation, but stout, and full of wit and vehemency: and yet in his shortnesse of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he marvellously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine gravity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voice, that might be heard of a marvellous number of People, and such a strong nature besides, that he never fainted, nor brake his speech: for many times he would speake a whole day together, and was never weary. So when he had obtained his Cause against the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his body with painfull Exercises, as to abide heate, frost and snow bare-headed, and alwaies to go on foote in the Field, where his friends that did accompany him rode on horsebacke; and sometime he would come and talke with one, sometime with another, as he went on toote by them. He had a wonderful patience also in his sicknesse: for when he had anyague, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come to see him, untill he perceived his fit was off him, and that he found he was better. When he supped with his friends and familiars, they drew lots who should choose their parts. If he chanced not to choose, his friends notwithstanding gave him the preferment to choose: but he refused it, saying, it was no reason, fith the goddesse Venus was against him. At the first he did not use to sit long at the Table: but after he had drunke one draught onely, he would straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he fate long at the Table: so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his friends, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, said, that his great businesse and affaires in the Common-wealth was the cause of it: for following that all the day long, having no leisure nor time to study, when night came he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers at the Boord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, said, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night; Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, answered him: Thou dost not adde this unto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dice. To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and fashions of mens lives in his time were so corrupt, and required such great change and alteration, that to go uprightly, he was to take a contrary course in all things: therefore when he saw the purple, red, and the lightest colours were best esteemed of, he in contrary manner desired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner, he would go abroad bare-footed without shooes, and without any gowne: not because he would be wondered at for any such strangenesse, but to acquaint himselfe to be ashamed onely of shamelesse and dishonest things; and to despise those which were not reprov'd, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, Land being left him to the value of an hundred Talents by the death of a Cousin of his that likewise was called Cato, he put it into ready Money, to lend to his friends that lacked; and without usury. And there were some of his friends also that would mortgage his Land, or his Slaves, to the Chamber of the City, for their owne private businesse: the which he himselfe would either give them to mortgage, or else afterwards confirme the Mortgage of them. Furthermore, when he was come of age to marry, having never knowne Woman before, he was made fure to Lepida. This Lepida had beene pre-contracted unto Metellus Scipio: but afterwards the pre-contract being broken, he forsooke her, so that she was free when Cato was contracted to her. Notwithstanding, before Cato married her, Scipio repenting him that he had refused her, made all the meanes he could to have her againe: and so he had. Cato tooke it so grievously, that he thought to go to Law for her, but his friends dissuaded him from it. Then seeing no other remedy, to satisfie his angry minde, he wrote Verses against Scipio, in the which he reviled him all he could: using the bitter taunts of Archilocus Verses, but not such impudent, lewd, and childish reproaches as be there. After that he married Atilia, Soranus Daughter, being the first Woman he ever knew: yet not the onely Woman whom he did know, as is reported of Lalius, Scipios friend, who therein was counted the happier, because all that long time wherein he lived, he never knew other Woman but his first Wife. Furthermore, in the Warre of the Bond-men (otherwise called Spartacus Warre) one Gellius was chosen Prator of the Army, under whom Cato served of his owne good will, for the love he bare unto his Brother Cato, who in that Army had charge of a thousand Footmen. Now Cato could not as he wished, shew his valiantnesse and good service, because of the insufficiency of the Prator, that gave ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the midst of all the riot and insolvency of them in the Campe, he shewing himselfe a playd man in all his doings, valiant where neede was, and very wise also, all men esteemed him to be nothing inferiour unto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prator gave him many honours in token of his valiantnesse, which are given in reward of mens good service: howbeit Cato refused them, and said, that he was nothing worthy of those honours. These things made him to be thought a marvellous strange man. Furthermore, when there was a Law made, forbidding all men that sued for any Office in the Common-wealth, that they should have no prompters in any of the Assemblies. to blow into their eares the names of private Citizens: he alone making suite to be Colonell of a thousand Footmen, was obedient to the Law, and committed all the private Citizens names to memory, to speake unto every one of them, and to call them by their names: so that he was envied even of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praise-worthy, by so much more were they grieved, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being chosen Colonell of a thousand Footmen, he was sent unto MACEDON, unto Rubrius, Prator there. Some say, that at his departure from thence, his Wife lamenting and weeping to see him go, one Munatius a friend of his said unto her: take no thought Atilia, and leave weeping, for I promise thee I will keepe thy Husband for thee. It is well said, answered Cato. Then when they were a daies Journey from ROME, Cato after Supper said unto this Munatius: Thou must looke well to thy promise thou had made Atilia; that thou wouldst keepe me for her, and

and therefore forsake me not night nor day. Thereupon he commanded his men that from thenceforth they should prepare two beds in his Chamber, that Munatius also might lie there: who was rather pleasantly himselfe looked unto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fiftene Slaves with him, two Freeman, and foure of his friends which rode, and he himselfe went on foote sometime talking with one, otherwhile with another as he went. When he came to the Campe, where there were many Legions of the ROMANS, the Prætor immediately gave him charge of one of them: who thinking it small honour to him for himselfe onely to be valiant, sith he was but one man, he practised to make all his Souldiers under him, like unto himselfe. The which he did not by feare and terror, but by lenity and gentle persuasions, training and instructing them in every point what they should do: adding to his gentle instruction and persuasions, reward to those that did well, and punishment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to judge, whether he had made them more quiet then warlike, more valiant, then just. So dreadfull they shewed themselves to their Enemies, and courteous to their friends: fearfull to do evill, and ready to winne honour. Whereof followed that which Cato least accounted of, that is, he wan fame and good will: for his Souldiers did greatly honour and love him, because he himselfe would ever first set his hand to any thing he commanded them; and because also both in his diet, in his apparell, and in any journey or paines, he was rather like unto the meanest Souldier, then any of the other Captaines. In contrary manner also, in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he far exceeded all the other Colonels and Captaines, for the true love of vertue (to wit, the desire to follow it) taketh no roote in mens mindes, unlesse they have a singular love and reverence unto the person, whom they desire to follow. When Cato understood that Athenodorus, surnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philosopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the City of Pergamus, being a very old man, and one that stiffly refused the friendship of Kings, Princes, and Noblemen, desirous to have him about them: to write to him, he thought it was lost labour. Wherefore having two moneths liberty by the Lawes of the ROMANS, to follow his owne affaires, he tooke Sea, and went into Asia to him, hoping he should not lose his Journey, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of divers matters together, at length he brought him from his first determination, and carried him to the Campe with him; esteeming this Victory more then all the Conquests of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most part of all the Provinces and Realmes of the East parts of the World. In the meane time, whilst he lay at his charge in the Campe, being Colonell of a thousand Footmen, his Brother preparing to go into Asia, fell sicke in the City of Ænus, in the Countrey of Thracia. Cato having speedy intelligence thereof, tooke Sea presently, when it was marvellous rough and boisterous, and imbarqued in a little Crayer of a Merchants of Thessaly, with two of his friends, and three Bondmen onely, and did escape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arrived safely, a little after his Brother Cepioes death. He tooke his death more sorrowfully then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, imbracing the dead Corpses of his Brother: but also for the exceeding charge and sumptuous Funerals which he bestowed upon him, in perfumes, sweete favours, and sumptuous filkes that were burnt with his body: and furthermore, in the stately Tombe of Thracian Marble which he made for him, and set up in the Market-place of the Ælians, that cost eight Talents. Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modesty and temperance he used in all things else, not regarding with judgement his tender love and affection towards his Kinsmen, which was mingled in him with his severity, and hardnesse, against all voluptuousnesse, feare, and shamelesse requests. Divers Cities, Princes and Noblemen, sent him many sundry Presents, to honour the Funerals of his Brother Cepio: howbeit he tooke no Money of all them, saving onely spices, and sweete favours, and such other ornaments as honoured the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, unto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the Land that fell unto him, and a little Daughter of his, by the death of his Brother, notwithstanding the charge he had bene at in his Funerals, he did not reckon it in the partition of the Land betwixt him and his Brother Cepioes Daughter. All the which things when they were solemnized, some * write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the embers where his Brothers body had been burnt, through a sieve or riddle, where-through they cleanse Corpes, and all to get out the Gold and Silver that was molten there: but such thinke that their Writings should be as far from controllment as their doings. So when Catoes time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not onely with ordinary praises, vovues, and prayers to the gods for his health: but with imbracings, reares, and marvellous lamentations of the Souldiers, which spread their garments on the ground as he went, and kissing of his hands, which honour the ROMANS did but to very few of their Generals. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to Rome to deale in the affaires there, to go and see Asia, partly to be an eye witness of the manners, customes, and power of every Province as he went: and partly also to satisfie King Deiotarus request, who having bene his Fathers friend, had earnestly intreated him to come and see him, he went the journey, and used it in this sort. First, by peep of day, he sent his Baker and Cooke before, where he meant to lie that night. They coming soberly into the City or Village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friends and acquaintance there: and if they found none, then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Governours of the Towne, and prayed them to helpe them to lodging, and did content themselves with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the Townsmen did not believe they were Catoes men, and made no account of them, because they tooke all things so quietly, and made no ado with the Officers. nothing ready for him; and when he was come, they made as small account of him, seeing him set upon his Carriages, and speake never a word: for they tooke him for some meane man, and a timorous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them unto him, and told them: O poore men, learne to be more courteous to receive travelling ROMANS that passe by you, and looke not alwayes to have Catoes to come unto you: and therefore see that you use them with such courtesie and entertainment, that they may bridle the authority they have over you: for you shall finde many that will desire no better colour nor occasion by force to take from you that they would have: because you unwillingly aldo do grant them the things they would, and need. There is a report of a pretty jest hapned him in Syracusa. When he came to Antioch, he found a great number of People divided on either side of the street, standing a row one by another very decently, the young men by themselves in faire cloakes, boyes by themselves in seemly array, and Priests and other Officers of the City also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne Procession to honour him, and fell out with his men he had sent before, because they did suffer them to make such preparation for his coming. So he made his friends light from their Horses, and go on foote to accompany him. But when they came neare to the Gate of the City, the Master of these Ceremonies that had assembled all that company (an old man, having a rod in his hand, and a Crowne on his head) came to Cato without saluting of him, and asked him onely, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeys Slaves, and because Pompeys fame was great with all men, his servant Demetrius also was much honoured and made of above his desert, for that he was in great credit with Pompey. Catoes friends hearing what question the old man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this Procession. Cato being ashamed of it, said no more then, but: O unfortunate City! Afterwards notwithstanding, when he told it to any body, he would laugh at it himselfe. But Pompey rebuked them that through ignorance had failed to honour Cato. When Cato came to the City of Ephesus, and was coming towards Pompey to salute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignity and estimation then he, who at that time also was Generall of a great and puissant Army. Pompey seeing him coming towards him afar off, would not tarry till he came to him, sitting in his Chaire of estate, but rising up went to meete him, as one of the greatest and noblest persons of Rome; and taking him by the hand, after he had imbraced and welcomed him, he presently fell in praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also commended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereupon, every man after that had him in great veneration for those things which before they despised him in, when they considered better of his noble and courteous minde. For men that saw Pompeys entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather revered, and for a kinde of duty observed, more then for any love he bare him: and they noted further, that he honoured him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he sought to keepe backe all the young Gentlemen of Rome that went to see him, and desired them to remaine with him: But for Cato, he was nothing desirous of his company, for that in his presence he thought he could not command as he would, and therefore was willing to let him go, recommending his Wife and his Children to him, the which he never did before unto any other ROMANE that returned to Rome: howbeit indeed Cato was partly allied unto him. After that time, all the Cities whereby he passed, devised (in emulation one of the other) which of them should honour him most; and made him great Feasts and Banquets: in the which he prayed his friends to have an eye to him; lest unawares he should prove Curios words true. For Curio sometime being his friend, and a familiar of his, misliking notwithstanding his severity, asked Cato if he would go see Asia, when his charge were expired. Cato answered againe, that it was his full determination. O well said, quoth Curio, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleasant and civill. And these were Curios words. Furthermore, Deiotarus King of Galatia, being a very old man, sent for Cato to come into his Countrey, to recommend his Sonnes and House unto him: who when he arrived there, had great rich Presents of all sorts offered him by the King, intreating him all he could to take them. This so much misliked and angered Cato, that he coming thither in the evening, (after he had tarried there one whole day onely) the next morning he went his way from thence at the third houre. Howbeit he had not gone one daies journey, but he found greater gifts that tarried him, with Deiotarus Letters, at the City of Pessinunta: in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them himselfe, that then he would let them be divided amongst his friends, sith every way they did deserve it, but specially for his sake, for that his goods also were not so great, as could content all his friends: But Cato would not suffer them to take any jot of it more then before, although he saw well enough, that there were some of them so tender-hearted, that they complained of him, for that he would not suffer them to take any of it. For he told them, that otherwise corruption and bribery could lack no honest colour to take: and for his friends, they should alwayes have part with him of that which was his owne justly. So he returned King Deiotarus Presents back againe. Now when he was ready to imbarque, to passe over the Sea againe unto Brundisium, some of his friends perswaded him, that it was better to put the ashes of his Brother Cepioes bones into another Ship. But he answered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leave his Brothers reliques. Thereupon he presently hoisted saile, and it is reported that he passed over in great danger, where other Ships arrived very safely. When he was returned unto Rome, he was alwayes either talking Philosophy with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the Market-place, to pleasure his friends. When his turne came that he was to make suite to be Quæstor, he would never sue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the Ordinaunces touching the Office of Quæstor, and that he had particularly made enquiry of men of greatest experience, to know what the Authority of the Office was. So he no sooner came to his Office, but he presently made great alteration amongst the Clearkes and Officers of the Treasury: who having the Lawes and Records in their hands, and exercising the Office commonly under young men which were chosen Treasurers (who for their ignorance and lacke of experience, stood rather in neede of Masters to teach them, then that they were able to correct others) they themselves were the Officers and controlled them. But Cato not contenting himselfe with the name and honour of the thing, did thoroughly understand what the Clearkes and Registers should be, and therefore would have them to be as they ought to be, Ministers under the Quæstors onely; telling them of their bribery and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also that faulted through ignorance. And when he saw some insolent and impudent persons, that curried favour with other Treasurers to be against him, he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for falsehood, in making division betwixt two co-heires: and consequently turned him cleare out of his Office, for ever doing any thing there any more. He accused another also for forging of a Will, whom Catulus Lutatius defending, being then Censor, and a man of great honour for the dignity of his Office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the justest man one of them in his time at Rome, and of those also that highly commended Cato, was conversant with him for his honest life: when he perceived that he could not defend his man by no reason, he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wise grant it. But Catulus earnestly intreating still for him, then Cato plainly said unto him: It is shame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Censor, and shouldest reforme all our lives, thus to forget the duty of thine Office, to please our Ministers. Catulus looking at Cato when he had spoken, as though he would answer him: whether it were for shame or anger, he went his way, and said never a word more. Yet was not the party condemned, though there was one voice more that did condemn then cleare him, because of the absence of one of the Judges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Cato's Colleagues in the Quæstorship, being sicke at that time, and absent, Catulus sent unto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereupon Lollius being brought thither in a Litter, after judgement given, gave his last voice: which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithstanding, would never use him as a Clarke, nor pay him his Wages, nor would count of Lollius voice among others. Thus having pulled downe the pride and stomacke of the Clearkes, and brought them unto reason, in short time he had all the Tables and Records at his commandement, and made the Treasure-Chamber as honourable as the Senate it selfe: so that every man thought, and said, that Cato had added unto the Quæstorship the dignity of the Consulship. For finding divers men indebted before unto the Common-wealth, and the Common-wealth also unto divers men, he set downe such an order, that neither the Common-wealth should be deceived by any man, nor that any man also should have wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the Chamber, he compelled them to pay their debt, and willingly and quickly also paid them to whom the Chamber ought any thing: so that the People were ashamed to see some pay which never thought to have paid any thing, and on the contrary side also others paid, which never looked to have had any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, divers men did before make false Bills of their debts, and brought them so to be put into the Coffer of the Quæstors: and many times also his Predecessors were wont of favour and friendship to receive false Messages. But whilst he was Quæstor, he never did passe any matter so lightly. For one day, he being doubtful of a Message that was sent unto him, to know whether it was true or no: albeit divers men did witnesse it was true, yet would he not believe it, untill such time as the Consuls themselves came in their owne persons to justifie it was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many unto whom Lucius Sylla (being Dictator) had appointed in his second Proscription twelve thousand silver Drachmas for every Citizen and Out-law which they had slaine with their owne hands. These men, though every man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked People and cruell murderers, yet no man durst offer to be revenged of them. Cato called these men in suite, as those that did wrongfully detaine the Money of the common Treasure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: sharply reproving (and justly) the wicked devilish fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the Money, they were straight accused by others for murder: and as if they had beene wrongfully condemned by one judgement, they were brought unto another, to the great joy of all the ROMANS, who then thought they saw all the Tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla himselfe punished. Besides all this, Cato's continuall paines and care of the Treasure, was so well thought of and liked of the People as could be. For he was alwaies the first that came to the Coffer of the Treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was never weary of any paines. Furthermore, he never missed to be at any Assembly of the People, or Senate, fearing and being alwaies careful, lest lightly by favour, any Money due to the Common-wealth should be forgiven, or else that they should abate the Rent of the Farmers, or that they should give no Money but to them that had justly deserved it. Thus having rid all Accusers, and also filled the Coffers with Treasure, he made men see that the Common-wealth might be rich without oppressing of any man. Indeed at his first coming into the Office, his Colleagues and Companions found him marvellous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and severe: howbeit they all loved him in the end; because he onely withstood the complaints and cries of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or favour let go the Money of the common Treasure) and was contented his Companions should excuse themselves unto their friends that were importunate, and lay the

the fault upon him, saying, that it was impossible for them to bring Cato unto it. The last day that he went out of his Office, being very honourably brought home to his house by the People, it was told him that Marcellus being in the Treasure-chamber, was attempted and environed with many of his friends, and men of great authority, that were earnestly in hand with him to record a certaine summe of Money, as a thing that had been due by the Common-wealth. This Marcellus had been Cato's friend even from their Child-hood, and whilst Cato was in Office, he did orderly execute his Office with him: but when he was left alone, he was of so gentle a nature, that he would easily be entreated, and was as much ashamed to deny any man, as he was also over-ready to grant every man that he required. Cato straight returned backe upon it, and finding that Marcellus had yielded unto their importunity, and recorded the Gift, he caused the Bookes to be brought unto him, and did raze it out before his face, Marcellus speaking never a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and never once repined against that he had done; neither then, nor at any time after, but continued still in friendship with him, as he had done before. But now though Cato was out of his Office of Quæstor, he was not without Spials of his men in the Treasure-chamber, who marked alwaies, and wrote what was done and passed in the Treasury. And Cato himselfe, having bought the Bookes of account for the summe of five Talents, containing the revenue of the whole State of the Common-wealth, from Sylla's time untill the very year of his Quæstorship: he ever had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate, and the last that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarrying long before they came, he went and sat down in a corner by himself, and read closely the Booke he had under his Gown, clapping his Gown before it, and would never be out of the City on that day when he knew the Senate should assemble. After that, Pompey and his Consorts perceiving that it was impossible to compell Cato, and much lesse to win or corrupt him, to favour their unjust doings, they sought what means they could to keepe him from coming to the Senate, and defending certaine of his friends Causes, and to occupie him some other waies about matters of Arbitrement. But Cato finding their wils and craft, to encounter them, he told his friends once for all, whom he would pleasure, that when the Senate did sit, no mans Cause could make him be absent from thence. For he came not to serve the Common-wealth to enrich himselfe as many did, neither for any glory or reputation, nor yet at all adventure; but that he had advicedly chosen to serve the Common-wealth, like a just and honest man, and therefore thought himselfe bound to be as careful of his duty, as the Bee working her Wax in the Honey-combe. For this respect therefore, to performe his duty the better, by the means of his friends which he had in every province belonging to the Empire of Rome, he got into into his hands the Copies of all the chiefest Acts, Edicts, Decrees, Sentences, and the notablest Judgements of the Governours that remained in record. Once Cato perceiving that Publius Clodius a seditious Orator amongst the People, did make great stirr, and accused divers unto the Assembly, as the Priests and Vestall Nunnes, among the which Fabia Terentia, Cicero's Wives Sister was accused; he taking their Cause in hand, did so disgrace Clodius their Accuser, that he was driven to flee the City. Cicero therefore giving Cato thanks, Cato told him, that he must thanke the Common-wealth, not him, for whose sake onely he both said and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certaine Orator or Common-Counsellour preferred one Witnesse unto the Judges, the Counsellour on the other side told them, that one Witnesse was not to be credited, though it were Cato himself. Infomuch as the People tooke it up for a Proverb among them, that when any man spake any strange and unlikely matter, they would say: Nay, though Cato himselfe said it, yet were it not to be beleevied. When on a time a certaine Prodigall man had made a long Oration in the Senate, in praise and commendation of sobriety, temperance, and thriftinesse, one Annius a Senatour rising up, said unto him: Alas friend, what thinkest thou? who can abide to hear thee any longer with patience, that fastest at thy Table like Craesus, buidest like Lucullus, and speakest to us like Cato? So men commonly (in sport) called them Cato's, which were grave and severe in their words, and dissolute in their deeds. When divers of his friends were in hand with him to sue to be Tribune of the People, he told them he thought it not meet at that time: for such an Office (quoth he) of so great authority as that, is not to be employed, but like a strong Medicine in time of need. So, the Terme and matters of Law ceasing for that time, Cato went into the Countrey of LUCANIA to take his pleasure there, where he had pleasant Houses, and tooke with him both his Books and Philosophers to keepe him company. But meeting as he went, with divers Sumpters and great Carriage, and a great traine of men besides, he asked them whose Carriage it was: they told him, it was Metellus Nepos that returned to Rome, to make suite to be Tribune. Thereupon Cato stayed suddenly, and bethinking himselfe, commanded his men to returne backe again. His friends marvelling at it, he answered them, Do not you know that Metellus is to be feared of himself, for his rashnesse and folly? and now that he cometh instructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would set all the Common-wealth on fire? for this cause therefore we must not now go take our pleasure in the Countrey, but overcome his folly, or otherwise die honourably in defence of our Liberty. Yet at his Friends perswasions he went first into his House in the Countrey, and tarried not long there, but returned straight againe to Rome. When he came thither over night, the next morning betimes he went into the Market-place, and sued to be Tribune of the People; purposely to crosse Metellus Enterprize, because the power and authority of the Tribune consisteth more in hindring then doing any thing: for if all men else were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were against it, the Tribune would carry from them all. Cato at the first had not many of his friends about him, but whent they heard of his intent, why he made suite for the Tribuneship, all his friends and Noble-men straight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and encouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to serve the Common-wealth then his owne turne; considering that where many times before he might (without resistance or deniall) have obtained the same, the State being toward no trouble, he then would never sue for it, but now that he saw it in danger, where he was to fight for the Common-wealth, and the Protection of her Liberty. It is reported that there were such a number of People about him to favour his suite, that he was like to have been stifled among them, and thought he should never have come to the Market-place, for the presse of People that swarmed about him. Thus when he was chosen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceived how they bought and sold the voices of the People when the Consuls were chosen: whereupon he made an Oration, and sharply took them up for this detestable Merchandize; and after his Oration ended, solemnly protested by Oath, that he would accuse him, and bewray his Name which had given Money to be chosen Consull. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllanus, whose Sister Servilia he had married: but he flatly accused Lucius Murena, that had obtained to be Consull with Syllanus, by means of his Money. Now a Law being provided, that the party accused might have a Keeper or Spiall to follow the Accuser, to see what he would accuse the party with; that he might the better be able to defend himselfe, knowing what should be objected against him: Murena having one for him to waite upon Cato, to consider thoroughly what course he tooke, when he saw that he went not maliciously to work, but tooke a plaine common way of a just Accuser, he had so great confidence in Cato's upright minde and integrity, that not regarding the narrow sifting of him otherwise, he did one day aske him himselfe in the Market-place (or at home in his own house) if that day he were determined to prosecute any matter against him touching his Accusation. If Cato answered that he did not, then he went his way, and simply beleaved him. When the day came indeed that his cause was to be heard and pleaded unto, Cicero being Consull that yeare, defending Murena, played so pleasantly with the Stoicke Philosophers, and their strange Opinions, that he made all the Judges laugh: insomuch as Cato himselfe smiling at him, told them that were by him: See, we have a pleasant Consull that makes men laugh thus. So Murena being discharged by this judgement, did never after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Consull, he was alwaies ruled by his counsell in all his Affaires, and continued ever to honour him, following his Counsell in all things touching his Office. Hereof Cato himselfe was cause, who was never rough nor terrible, but in matters of Counsell, and in his Orations before the People, for the maintenance onley of equity and justice: for otherwise he was very civill and courteous to all men. But before he entred into his Tribuneship, Cicero being yet Consull, he did help him in many things touching his Office, but specially in bringing Catiline's conspiracy to good end which was a noble Act done of him. For Catiline did practise a generall commotion and stir in the Common-wealth, to overthrow the whole State of Rome, by civill discord within Rome, and open Warres abroad: who being discovered and overcome by Cicero, he was driven in the end to flee Rome. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conspiracy, blamed Catiline for his faint and cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to burne the whole City of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in uproare, by strang Warres, and rebellious forreine Nations and Provinces. Howbeit this Treason being discovered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred unto the judgement of the Senate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllanus being the first who was asked his Opinion therein said, that he thought it good they should suffer cruell paines: and after him also, all the rest said the like untill it came to Cesar. Cesar being an excellent spoken man, and that rather desired to nourish then to quench any such stirres or seditions in the Common-wealth, being fit for his purpose long determined of, made an Oration full of sweet pleasant words declaring unto them, that to put such men as they to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether unreasonable, and rather that they should do better to keep them in Prison. This Oration of Cesar so altered all the rest of the Senators minds, for that they were afraid of the People, that Syllanus selfe mended his Opinion againe, and said, that he meant not they should put them to death, but keep them fast in Prison; because that to be a prisoner, was the greatest paine a ROMANE Citizen could abide. Thus the Senators minds being so suddenly changed, and bent to a more favourable sentence, Cato rising up to say his Opinion, began very angrily with marvellous Eloquence, grievously to reprove Syllanus for changing his minde, and sharply to take up Cesar, that under a popular semblance, and maske of sweet sugred words, he sought under-hand to destroy the Common-wealth, and also to terrifie and make the Senate afraid: where he himselfe should have been afraid, and think himselfe happy, if he could scape from being suspected, giving such apparent cause of suspicion as he did, going about so openly to take the Enemies and Traitors of the Common-wealth out of the hands of justice, seeming to have no pity nor compassion of his naturall City, of such Nobility and Fame, being even brought in manner to utter destruction; but rather to lament the fortune of these wicked men, that it was pity they were ever borne, and whose death preserved Rome from a thousand Murthers, and Mischiefs. Of all the Orations that ever Cato made, that onely was kept: for Cicero the Consull, that day had dispersed divers Pen-men in sundry places of the Senate-house, which had marvellous swift hands, and had further taught them how to make brieve Notes and abridgements, which in few Lines shewed many words. For untill that time, Writers were not known that could by Figures and Ciphers expresse a whole sentence and word, as afterwards they could, being then the first time that ever they were found out. So Cato at that time prevailed against Cesar, and made them all change their minde againe, that these men were put to death. But that we may not leave out a jot of his manners, as the very paterne and impression of his minde: it is reported, that when Cato that day was so hot and vehement against Cesar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both, a Letter was delivered Cesar, sent him into the House. Cato began presently to suspect it, and so earnestly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commanded his Letter should be seene and read openly. Cesar thereupon reached his Letter unto Cato, that late not farre from him. When Cato had read it, and found that it was a Love-letter, which his Sister Servilia, had written unto Cesar, whom she loved, and had knowa, he callt it againe to Cesar, and said, There drunkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begun before. In fine, it seemeth that Cato was very unfortunate in his Wives: for this Servilia, as we have said; had an ill Name by Cesar. And the other Servilia also, which was his Sister, was worie detamed: for she being married unto Lucullus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by whom she had a Sonne, was in the end put away from him, for her naughty life. But worst of all, his own Wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspition: for though he had two Sons by her, yet he was driven to be divorced from her, she was so naught and common. After that, he married Martia, the Daughter of Philip, which by report seemed to be a very honest Gentlewoman. It is she that is fo famous among the ROMANES. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a Fable or Comedy) is disputable, and hard to be judged. For thus it was, as Thraseus writeth, who referreth all to the report and credit of one Munatius, Cato's very familiar friend. Among many that loved Cato's Vertues and had them in admiration, some of them did shew more what he was, then other some did: amongst the which was Q. Hortensius a man of great honesty and authority. He desiring not onely to be Cato's friend and familiar, but also to joyne with him in alliance, and by affinity to make both their Houses one, was not abashed to move him to let him have his Daughter Porcia in marriage (which was Bibulus Wife, and had brought him two Children) that he might also cast abroad the Seed of goodly Children, in that pleasant fertile ground. And though to men this might seeme a strange minde and desire, yet that in respect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the Commonwealth, not to suffer a young Woman in the prime of her youth to lose the fruit of her Wombe, being apt to beare Children: nor also that he should impoverish his Soone-in-law with more Children then one house needed. And further, that communicating Women in this sort from one to another, specially being bestowed upon worthy and vertuous men, that Vertue thereby should be increased the more, being so dispersed in divers Families; and the City likewise should be the stronger, by making alliances in this sort together. And if it be so, quoth he, that Bibulus do love his Wife so dearly, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him againe when he had a Child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by means of this communication of Children with Bibulus selfe, and with him. Cato answered him; that he loved Hortensius well, and liked of his alliance, howbeit that he marvelled he would speake to him to let him have his Daughter to get Children of, sith he knew that she was married to another.

Then Hortensius altering his tale, stuck not to tell him his minde plainly, and to desire his Wife of him, the which was yet a young Woman, and Cato had Children enough. But a man cannot tell whether Hortensius made this suite, because he saw Cato made no reckoning of Martia, for that she was then with Child by him. In fine, Cato seeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he must also get Philip's good will, the Father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had granted his good will, would not therefore let him have his Daughter before that Cato himselfe by his presence did confirme the contract and marriage with him. Though these things were done long after, yet having occasion to talke of Cato's Wives. I thought it not amisse to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus and his Consorts of Catiline's conspiracy being put to death; Cesar to cloake the Accusations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate; did put himselfe into the Peoples hands; and gathering the rake-hels and seditious persons together, which sought to set all at six and seven, he did further encourage them in their mischievous intent and practises. Whereupon; Cato fearing lest such a rabble of People should put all the Common-wealth in uproare and danger, he perswaded the Senate to winne the poore needy People that had nothing, by distributing Corne amongst them, the which was done: and the charge thereof amounted yearly unto twelve hundred and fifty Talents. This liberality did manifestly drink up and quench all those troubles which they stood in feare of. But on the other side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certaine seditious Orations and Assemblies, and preferred a Law to the People, that Pompey the Great should presently be called into ITALY with his Army, that he should keepe the City by his coming from the present danger of Catiline's conspiracy. These were but words spoken for fashions sake, but indeed the Law had a secret meaning, to put the whole Common-wealth and Empire of Rome into Pompey's hands. Hereupon the Senate assembled, wherein Cato at his first coming spake somewhat gently, and not too vehemently against Metellus, as his manner was to be sharpe unto them that were against him: but modestly perswaded him, and fell to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwaies taken part with the Senate and Nobility. But Metellus therewith tooke such pride and conceit of himselfe, that he began to despise Cato, thinking he had used that mildnesse, as though he had been afraid of him: insomuch as he gave out proud speeches against him, and cruell threats, that in despite of the Senate he would do that Metellus Tribunship he had undertaken. Then Cato changing his countenance, his voice and speech, after he bene of the had spoken very sharply against him, in the end he roughly protested, that while he lived, he would

the People besides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his part: marvelling much, and also being offended with Cæsar's great unreasonablenesse and importunity, who by the Authority of his Consulship did preferre such things, as the most seditious Tribunes of the People were wont commonly to do, to curry favour with the People, and by such vile meanes sought to make them at his commandement. Wherefore, Cæsar and his friends fearing so great Enemies, fell to open force. For to begin withall, as the Consul Bibulus was going to the Market-place, there was a basket of Dung poured upon his head: and furthermore, the Officers Rods were broken in their hands, which they carried before him. In fine, Darts were thrown at them out of every corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driven to flie, and leave the Market-place. But Cato he came last of all, keeping his wonted place, and often cast backe his head, and cursed such Citizens. So, they did not onely passe this Law Agraria by voyces of the People, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate should be sworn to establish that Law, and be bound to defend the same (if any attempted the alteration thereof) upon great Penalties and Fines to be set on his head, that should refuse the Oath. All the other Senators Swore against their wils, remembering the example of the mischiefe that chanced unto the old Metellus, who was banished out of ITALIE, because he would not sweare to such a like Law. Whereupon, the Women that were in Cato's house, besought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the Oath: and so did also divers of his friends besides. Howbeit, he that most enforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswaded him, that peradventure he would be thought unreasonable, that being but one man, he should seem to milke that, which all other had thought meet and reasonable: and that it were a fond part of him wilfully to put himselfe in so great a danger, thinking to hinder a matter already past remedy. But yet that besides all this, a great inconvenience would happen, if he forsooke his Countrey (for whose sake he did all these things) and left it a prey unto them, which sought the utter subversion of the same, as if he were glad to be rid from the trouble of defending the Common-wealth. For (said he) though Cato have no need of ROME, yet ROME hath need of Cato, and so have all his friends: of the which, Cicero said he was the chiefe, and was most maliced of Publius Clodius the Tribune, who sought to drive him out of the Countrey. It is said that Cato being won by these like words and perswasions at home, and openly in the Market-place, they so softened him, that he came to take his Oath last of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friend of his. Cæsar's heart being then lift up, for that he had brought his purpose to passe: he began now to preferre another Law, to divide all CAMPANIA, and the Countrey called TERRA DI LAVORO (the Land of labour) unto the poor needy People of ROME, and no man stood against him but Cato. Whereupon Cæsar made his Officers to take him from the Pulpit for Orations, to carry him to Prison. All this made not Cato stoop, nor leave his francke speech, but as he went he still spake against this Edict, and perswaded the People to beware of them that preferred such Lawes. All the Senate, and the best sort of Citizens followed Cato with heavy hearts, shewing by their silence that they were offended and angry for the injury they did unto him, being so worthy a man. Inomuch as Cæsar's selfe perceived that the People were offended with it, and yet of ambition and stomacke, he looked alwaies when Cato would have appealed unto the People. So when he saw that Cato meant no such matter, at length overcome with shame and dishonour, he himselfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Cæsar's practise tended to this end, that when he had wonne the Peoples favour by such Lawes: they should then grant him the Government of all the GAULES (as well on this side, as beyond the Mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an Army of foure Legions, for the space of five yeares, notwithstanding that Cato told the People before, that they themselves with their own voyces did set up a Tyrant, that one day would cut their throates. They did also chuse Publius Clodius Tribune of the People, which was of a noble house: a thing directly contrary to the Law. But this Clodius had promised them, so that they would helpe him to banish Cicero out of ROME, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calpurnius Piso (Cæsar's Wives Father) and Galbinus Paulus (a man wholly at Pompey's commandement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Consuls the next year following. Now, notwithstanding they had the rule of the Common-wealth in their own hands, and that they had won part of the City with bribes, and the other part also with fear: yet they were both afraid of Cato, when they considered what trouble they had to overcome him, which they did very hardly notwithstanding, and to their great shame, being driven to use force, and yet thought they should never have done it. Furthermore, Clodius utterly despaired that he could possibly banish Cicero, so long as Cato was there. So devising waies how to do it, when he had taken possession of his Office, he sent for Cato, and began to tell him, that he thought him the honestest and justest man of ROME, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deed. For, where many made suite unto him to be sent into CYPRUS, to make War with King Ptolemy: he thought none so worthy as himselfe, and therefore for the good will he bore him, he was very willing to offer him that pleasure. Cato straight cried out with open mouth, that this was a device to intrap him, not to pleasure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely answered him, Well, seeing thou wilt not go with good will, thou shalt go then against thy will: and so he did. For at the first assembly of the City, he caused the People to grant his Commission for his journey thither: but he neither appointed him Ships, nor Souldiers, nor Ministers to go with him, saving two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very Villaine and an arrant Theefe, and the other one of Clodius followers. Besides all this, as if they had appointed him but little to do in CYPRUS against Ptolemy, he made them command him after that, to go and restore the Outlawes and banished men of the City of BYZANTIUM, unto their Countrey and Goods againe, of purpose onely to keepe keepe Cato farr enough from ROME, whilst he continued Tribune. Cato being driven by necessity to obey, he counselled Cicero (whom Clodius pursued) to beware that he made no stirr against him, for fear of bringing ROME into civil War and Murther for his sake: but rather to abient himselfe, that he might another time preserve his Countrey. After that, he sent his Friend Canidius before into CYPRUS, unto Ptolemy, to perswade him to be quiet without Warre: declaring unto him, that he should neither lack Honour nor Riches, for the ROMANES would grant him the Priesthood of VENUS in the City of PAPHOS. Cato in the meane time remained in the Ile of RHODES, preparing himselfe there, and abiding his answer. In the time of these stirres, Ptolemy King of EGYPT, for a certaine offence and discord with his Subjects, departing out of ALEXANDRIA, sailed towards ROME hoping that Cæsar and Pompey with a great Army would restore him to his Crown and Kingdom againe. He being desirous to see Cato, sent unto him, supposing he would come at his sending for. Cato by chance was occupied at that time about some businesse, and bad the Messenger will Ptolemy to come to him, if he would see him. So when Ptolemy came, he neither went to meet him, nor rose up unto him, but onely welcomed him, and bad him sit down. It amazed the King at the first, to see under so simple and meane a traine, such a statelynesse and majesty in Cato's behaviour. But he heard him boldly talke with him of his Affaires, and such grave talke come from him, reproving his folly he had committed, to forsake such Princely Pleasure and Wealth, to go and subject himselfe unto such dishonour, such extreme paines, and such passing great Gifts and Presents, as he should throw away, to satisfie the covetousnesse of the Rulers at ROME, the which was so unsatiable, that if all the Realme of EGYPT were converted into Silver to give among them, it would scarce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to returne backe with his Navy, and to reconcile himselfe againe with his Subjects, offering himselfe also to go with him, to helpe to make this Peace. Then Ptolemy coming to himselfe, and repenting him of his folly, knowing that Cato told him truly, and wisely, he determined to follow his counsell, had not his friends turned his minde to the contrary. So when Ptolemy came to ROME, and was driven to waite at the Gates of the Magistrates that were in Authority, he sighed then, and repented his folly, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wise man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolemy that was in CYPRUS (a happy turne for Cato) poisoned himselfe. Cato being also informed that he left a wonderful summe of Money behinde him, he determined to go himselfe unto BYZANTIUM, and sent his Nephew Brutus into CYPRUS, because he durst not trust Canidius so farre. Then having restored the banished men unto the Peoples favour againe, setting agreement betwixt them, he returned into CYPRUS. There he found a marvellous great Treasure, and Plate both of Gold and Silver, Tables, precious-Stones, Hangings, and Purple Silkes, all the which he was to make ready Money of. There he tooke great care and paines to raise all things to the utmost and dearest prices that could be, and he himselfe was present at all, to keepe the reckoning of the last Penny. Wherefore, to bring this to passe, he would not stand to the common use of the sale of the Crier, but suspected them all, both Criers, Praisers, and his own Friends, and therefore talked himselfe with the Praisers, and made them set high Prises upon every thing that was to be sold. And thus were the most part of their Goods sold and carried away, at the dearest Prises. This did marvellously offend the most part of his Friends, when they saw that he did mistrust them: but Munatius specially, his dearest Friend, tooke it so inwardly, that he thought never to be friends with him againe. Inomuch as in the Booke Cæsar wrote against Cato, in this place he forceth most the accusation against him. Munatius notwithstanding writeth, that he was not angry so much with Cato for that he mistrusted him, but for a certaine disdain he had himselfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him, and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a Booke of Cato's deeds and sayings, whom Thrafeas in his History chiefly followed. In this Booke he sheweth that he came late into CYPRUS, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he would have come into Cato's house, they kept him out of the Gates, for that Cato was busie, doing something with Canidius. He modestly complaining of it unto Cato, it with thee, who over-loving me, doest thinke that I esteeme thee not as thou deservest, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I must tell thee truly, I do rather employ him for his skill and faithfulness in things, then any man else: for that he hath been with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was never bribed, but cleane handed still. These words Cato told Munatius secretly between them two, but afterwards he knew that he had also reported them unto Canidius. When he saw that, he would no more go and sup with Cato as he was wont; and when he was also called to Counsell, he would not come there neither. Whereupon Cato threatened him, that he would seize upon all his Goods and Carriage, as they use to handle them that are disobedient unto justice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke Sea, and returned againe to ROME, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Cato's Wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to supper together unto a friend of theirs called Barca. Thereupon Cato also arrived, and came thither when they were all set at Supper, and asked where he should sit: Barca told him againe where it pleased him. Then casting his eyes about, he said, he would sit by Munatius: and so fetching a compass about the the Board, he went and sat by him but offered him no friendship and familiarity all Supper-time. Afterwards notwithstanding, at the request of Martia, that was earnestly in hand with Cato for him, he wrote unto him, and willed him to come and speak with him. Munatius went to Cato's house in the morning, where Martia stayed him, and kept him company, untill all the rest that came to salute Cato were departed. Then Cato coming to him, embraced embraced him in his Armes, and made very much of him. We have the willinglier dilated this matter at length, because mens natures and manners might be discerned even in these small matters of friendship privately, as otherwise in the greatest publique Causes. Now touching Cato's Commission, he got together little lesse then seven thousand Silver Talents. Furthermore, fearing the farnesse of the journey he had to go by Sea, he made divers little Coffers, and put into every one of them two Talents, and five hundred Drachmes, and tied unto each of them a long Rope, and a great piece of Corke; because that if the Shippes should fortune to miscarry, those Corkes might shew where the Chefts with Money lay in the bottome of the Sea. Thus was all the Money saved, saving a little, and brought safely to Rome. Cato having made two Bookes, wherein he had noted all things done in his journey, he could neither save the one nor the other of them. For one of his Bond-men made free, called Philaretyrus, took the one way; who taking Ship at the Haven of Cenchreae, was himselfe drowned, and the Booke he had also, lost with him. The other Booke which he himselfe had kept untill he came to Corinthe, he lying in the Market-place of the City in his Tents which he caused to be set up; the Marriners being very cold in the night, made so great a Fire, that it burnt the Tents, Stuffe, Booke and all. Notwithstanding, he brought certaine of the late King Ptolemies Slaves with him, who while he lived, had the charge and custody of all his Treasure and Riches, the which he brought as Witnesse to stop the mouthes of his malicious Enemies, that would have accused him in any thing. But yet the losse of them did grieve him, not so much for the great care and paines he had taken in setting down the account of his charge, for the justification and proof of his fidelity and good service; but also for that they might have served for a good Memoriall and example unto all others, to have been alike carefull in their charge, as himself. But the gods denied him this good hap. Newes being brought that he was come to Rome by Water; when they understood he was at hand, by and by all the Magistrates, the Priests, the Senate, and the most part of the People also went out to meet him by the Rivers side: so that both sides of the River of Tyber were full of People, and the receiving of him in, seemed not inferiour to the entry of a Triumph. Notwithstanding, some thought him very presumptuous, that the Consuls and Prators coming out to meet him, he did not stay his Galley, but rowed still up the Streame (being in a Kings Galley of six Oares to every Bank) and never stayed, untill all his Fleet arrived in the Haven. This notwithstanding, when the Coffers with Money were carried through the Market-place into the Treasure-chamber, the People wondered to see so great a quantity of it. And thereupon the Senate being assembled, with great and honorable words they gave Cato an extraordinary Pratorship, and Priviledge also, at any common Sports to wear a Purple Gown. Cato refused all these honours, and onely befought the Senate to make Nicias a Freeman, Steward of the late deceased King Ptolemy, being a Witnesse of his faith and great paines he had taken in this service. Philip the Father of Martia, was that year Consul, so that after a fort, the Authority of the Consull was in Cato: because Lentulus, Colleague and fellow Consull with Philip, did no lesse reverence Cato for his Vertues, then Philip did for his alliance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was restored againe from his banishment, the which Publius Clodius (being then Tribune of the People) had put upon him, and being againe grown to great credite, he went one day into the Capitoll, in the absence of Clodius, by force to take away the Tables which Clodius had consecrated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being assembled, Clodius did accuse Cicero of this violent fact. Cicero answered him againe, that because Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the Law, therefore all his doings were void, and of no validity. Then stood up Cato, and said, he knew that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was scanty good and allowable; but yet if generally any man should undoe all that he had passed by that Authority, then all that he himselfe had done likewise in Cyprus, must of necessity be revoked. For the Commission that was granted unto him (by Vertue whereof he had done many things) should be unlawfull: because the Tribune also that did grant it him, was not lawfully chosen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune against the Law, who by consent of the Law was taken out from a Noble House, and made a Popular Person: howbeit, if he had behaved himselfe undutifully in his Office, as other men happily had offended, then he was to be accused to make him mend his fault, and not to destroy the Authority of the Officer, which in it selfe was lawfull. After that, there fell milking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counterbuss he had given him: and Cicero continued a long time after, before he did shew him any countenance of friendship as he had at other times done. But afterwards they were reconciled together againe, by this occasion. Pompey and Crassus having been with Cesar to talke with him (who for that purpose came out of Gauls beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demand the second Consulship together, and when they had it, then to prorogue Casars Government for five years more, and also they would have the best Provinces and greatest for themselves, with great Armies, and Money enough to pay them with. This was indeed a plaine conspiracy to divide the Empire of Rome between them, and utterly to overthrow the State of the Common-wealth. At that time there were many Noble men, which came to make suite for the Consulship. But when they saw Pompey and Crassus offer to make suite for it, all the rest gave over, but Lucius Domitius that had married Porcia, Cato's Sister: through whose perswasion he would not relinquish his suite, considering that it was not the Office onely of the Consulship that was the chiefest matter of importance, but the liberty of the Senate and People. Straight there ran a rumour through the most part of the People, that they were not to suffer Pompeys power to be joynd with Crassus, by meanes of this Office: for then his Authority would be too great and strong, and therefore, that of necessity one of these two were to be denied. For

For this cause therefore; the good men tooke Domitius part, and did encourage him to go on with his suit, assuring him of aide under-hand of divers, which durst not be seen openly for fear of those two great men, who at the day of the Election would procure him voyces in his favour. Pompey and Crassus mistrusting this, made Domitius be set upon, going with Torch-light before day into the Field of Mars, where the Election was alwaies made: and first striking the Torch-bearer that went before him, they hurt him so fore, that he fell down dead at his feet. Then they laid at the rest in like case, who finding themselves cruelly hurt, ran away every man of them, and left Domitius and Cato poit alone. But Cato, notwithstanding he was hurt in one of his Armes, still held Domitius fast, and prayed him to tarry, and not to leave to defend the liberty of their Countrey, against Tyrants, which plainly shewed after what manner they would governe, sith by such wicked meanes they aspired to tyrannicall Government. All this notwithstanding, Domitius would tarry no longer, but betook him to his legges, and ran home. This were Crassus and Pompey without deniaff proclaimed Consuls. Cato never yeilded therefore, but came and sued to be Prator, because that thereby he might yet make it some strength and countenance to him against their Consulship, that being no private person, he should have some better Authority to resist them that were the chiefest persons. But they fearing, that the Pratorship by the elimation of Cato, would come to equall their Authority of the Consulship: first assembled the Senate (the most part of the Senators not hearing of it) and in that assembly caused the Senate to decree: that all such as were chosen Prators, should presently go to their charge, not attending the time and liberty appointed by the Law, during which time men might accuse those which had bought the voyces of the People with Money. Then having by this colour and Decree set ill-doers at liberty, without fear of punishment, they pretending to use corruption, did preferre some of their own Ministers to make suite for the Pratorship, themselves giving Money to corrupt the People, and being present at the Election. But notwithstanding all these practises, the Vertue and reputation of Cato overcame them. For the People had him in so great reverence, that they thought it too shamefull a part to sell Cato by voyces, who deserved rather to be hired to take the Pratorship upon him. Then the first Tribe being called to give their voyces, declared him Prator. Pompey seeing that, straight brake off the assembly, making a shamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the Romans do marvellously detest, and will conclude nothing when it thundreth. Howbeit afterwards they gave more Money then they had done before, and thereby drave away the chiefest men out of the Field of Mars, and by practise obtained, that Varinius was chosen Prator for Cato. And the report went, that they that had so wickedly given their voyces, feeling themselves pricked in conscience, fled immediately out of the Field: and the honest men that remained, were both very sorry and angry, for the injury they had offered Cato. At that time one of the Tribunes keeping an assembly of the City, Cato stood up, and told (as if he had prophesied) before them all, what would happen to the Common-wealth by these practises, and stirred up the People against Pompey and Cesar, saying: that they were guilty of those things; and therefore protured them to be done, because they were afraid that if Cato had been Prator, he would too narrowly have sifted out their devices. In fine, Cato going home to his house, had more company to waite upon him alone, then all the other Prators that had been chosen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the People, had preferred a Law for the dividing of the Provinces into the new Consuls, Spain and Africa unto the one, and Aegypt and Syria unto the other, with full power to make Warre as they thought good both by Sea and Land: all other men having no hope to keep it back, did let it alone, and spak nothing to contrary it. Then Cato getting up into the Pulpit for Orations, before the People began to give their voyces, could hardly have two houres space to speak: but at length, they perceiving that he delayed time by foretelling things to come, would suffer him to speak no longer, but sent a Sergeant to him, and plucked him by force out of the Pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cried out notwithstanding, and divers gave good eare unto him: the Sergeant went to him again, and took him, and carried him out of the Market place. Howbeit the Officer had no sooner left him, but he went straight towards the Pulpit for Orations, and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the People to have an eye to aid the liberty of their Common-wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentimes together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commanded his Sergeant to carry him to Prison. The People followed him hard notwithstanding, to hear what he said unto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing stirre, was forced to command his Sergeant to let Cato go. So Cato drave off all that day without any matter concluded: The next morning notwithstanding, the contrary Faction having partly put the Romans in fear, and won the other part also by faire words and Money, and by force of Armes, likewise kept Aquilinus, one of the Tribunes, from coming out of the Senate, and after they had also violently driven Cato out of the Market-place, for saying that it thundred, and having hurt many men, and also slain some out of hand in the Market-place: in the end they forcibly passed the Decree by voyces of the People. Many being offended therewith, went a company of them together to pluck down Pompeys Images: but Cato would not suffer them. And afterwards also, when they preferred another Law for the prorogation of the Provinces and Armies which Cesar demanded, Cato would speake no more to the People to hinder it, but protested unto Pompey himself, that he saw not how he plucked Cesar upon him, and that he should feel the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then, when he could neither suffer nor remedy it, he would even cast his burthen and himself upon the Common-wealth, and too late would remember Cato's warnings, which were privately as profitable for Pompey; as openly just and reasonable for the Common-wealth. Cato used many of these perswasions sundry times unto him, but Pompey never made account of them: for he would not be perswaded swaded that Cæsar would ever change in that sort, and besides he trusted too much to his own power and prosperity. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prætor for the next year following, in the which it appeared (though he ministered justice uprightly) that he rather de faced and impaired the majesty and dignity of his Office, then that he gave it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foot bare-legged, and without any Coate, unto his Prætors Chaire, and there give sentence of life and death, otherwiles of men of great account. And some report, that he would give Audience when he had dined, and drunk Wine: but that is untrue. Now Cato perceiving that the Citizens of Rome were marred by bribes and gifts of those which aspired unto Offices, and that the People made it an Art and faculty to gaine by: to root this Vice altogether out of the Common-wealth, he perswaded the Senate to make a Law, that such as hereafter should be chosen Consuls or Prætors, should (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer themselves before the Judges, and taking their Oath, should truly declare what meanes they had used to attain to their Office. This offended the Suiters for the Offices, but much more the mercenary multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his Audience, and all cried out upon him, reviled him and threw Stones at him: inasmuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and himself also was driven out of the place by the preece of the People, and had much adoe to get to the Pulpit for Orations, where standing on his feet, he presently pacified the tumult of the People, by the boldnesse and constancy of his countenance only. Then when all was pacified by the present perswasions he used, aptly spoken to purpose for the instant, they giving attentive eare, without stirr or uproare. The Senate giving him great commendation therefore he told them roundly and plainly: but I have no cause to praise you, to leave a Prætor in such danger of his life, offering no aid to helpe him. But the Suiters for the Offices, they were in a marvellous case: for one way, they were afraid to give Money to buy the Peoples voices; and on the other side, they were afraid also if any other did it, that they should go without their suite. So they were all agreed together, every man to put down twelve Myriades and a half a piece, and then they should make their suite justly and uprightly: and whosoever were taken faulty, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should loofe the Money he had laid down. This agreement being concluded between them, they chose Cato (as it is reported) for their Arbitrator, and Keeper of all the same Money. This match was made in Cato's house, where they all did put in caution or sureties to answer the Money: the which he took, but would not meddle with the Money. The day being come, Cato assisting the Tribune that governed the Election, and carefully marking how they did give their voices: he spied one of the Suiters for the Office break the Accord agreed upon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture unto the rest. But they greatly commending his justice and integrity, forgave the forfeiture, thinking it punishment enough unto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured himself the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he seemed therein to take upon him the power and authority over the whole Court and Election. For there is no Vertue, whereof the honour and credit doth procure more envie, then justice doth: because the People do commonly respect and reverence that more then any other. For they do not honour them as they do valiant men, nor have them in admiration, as they do wise men: but they love and trust them better. As for the two first, the one they are afraid of, and the other they distrust: beside, they suppose that valiancy and wisdom cometh rather by the benefit of nature, then of our intent and choice, esteeming wisdom as a readinesse of conceit; and fortitude, a preece and courage of the minde. For every man may be just that will, and therefore injustice is of all other Vices most shamefull: for it is a willfull and malicious default, and therefore cannot be excused. Lo, this was the cause why all the Noble men in manner were against Cato, as though he onely had overcome them. Pompey, he thought that the estimation of Cato was altogether the discountenance of his power and greatness, and therefore did daily raise up many Railers against him. Of them Publius Clodius that seditious Tribune, who was again fallen in friendship with Pompey, he accused Cato and cried out upon him, how he had robbed the Common-wealth of a wonderful Treasure, by his Commission in CYPRUS: and that he was Enemy unto Pompey, because he did refuse to marry his Daughter. Cato thereto made answer, that he had brought more Gold and Silver out of CYPRUS, into the Treasure of ROME, without the allowance of either Horse or Souldier, then Pompey had done with all his Triumphs and Wars, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreover, that he did never seeke alliance with Pompey, nor that he thought him unworthy of it, but because he saw he dealt not as uprightly in the Common-wealth as he himself did. I, said he, have refused a Province offered me when I came out of my Prætorship: but Pompey hath taken some by force, and given away unto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæsar not long since, an Army of six thousand men to serve him in the Wars in GAULE: the which he never required of us, nor Pompey granted them him by our consent. But we see, that so many Armies, Armour and Weapons, so many men and horses by common pleasures of our private Citizens, given and lent at our charge: and Pompey himself reserving onely the Name of Emperour, and Lieutenant-Generall, assigneth over his Armies and Provinces to the government of others, whilst he himself besiegeth here the Wallies of the City, with seditious and tumultuous Election of Officers, craftily undermining thereby the Statute of the Common-wealth, to bring all to confusion, that he himself might be absolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he revenged of Pompey. Among Cato's friends, he had own called Marcus Faunius, such a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN was said to be in old time, unto Socrates, who did counterfeit to be another himself, in doing all things as he did. This man man would be farr out of reason, and passionate in his walke, storming like a drunkard. He one year made suite to be Ædilis, but he was rejected. Howbeit Cato furthered his suite, marked, that the Tables wherein the voyces were written, were all one hand.

hand. So he finding out the falshood, appealed thereupon unto the Tribunes, and made the Election voide for that time. After that Faunius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his Office, and specially in setting forth playes in the Theater, which are customably done at the coming in of every such new Officer, to give the People pastime: and gave unto the common Playes and Dancers in those Playes, no golden Crowns, as other Ædilis did, but Crowns of Wild-Olive Twiggs, as they commonly use in GREECE at the Olympian Games. And where others gave unto the poor rich Gifts, he gave the GREGIANS Leeks, Lettices, Redishes, and Peares: and unto the ROMANS, they had Earthen Pots full of Wine, Porke, Figges, Cucumbers, and Fagots of Wood of small value. Inasmuch as some thought scorn of them they were so meane, others were very glad of them, seeing that Cato which was severe and heard of nature, had a doing in them, and by little and little they turned this austericy of his into pleasure. In fine, Faunius himself sitting down amongst the People, which looked upon the Players, clapped his hands for joy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he should give them good rewards that played well, alluring them also about to do the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole Ruler of those Sports. At the self-same time, Curio, Faunius Colleague and Companion in the Office of Ædilis, had likewise goodly Playes in another Theater: but all the People forsooke his, and went to see Faunius Playes, who late among them like a private man, and Cato as the Master of the Playes. Cato did this in scorn and mockery of vaine charge and Expences, which men are wont to bestow in such trifles, shewing thereby, that whosoever will make any Playes, he should make the charge but a sport also, furnishing it onely with a convenient grate, but with no vaine expence or charge about such a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypseus, and Milo, sued all three together to be Consuls, not onely by bribery of Money (a common fault then in suing for any of the Offices in the Common-wealth) but by plaine force of Armes, slaying and killing as in a civil War, they were so desperat and insolent: some preferred a Law, that they should make Pompey Præfident in these Elections, because men should move their suit after a lawfull sort. But Cato straight was against it, saying, that the Law could have no safety by Pompey, but Pompey might have safety by the Law. Notwithstanding, when he saw this trouble continue of a long time, without any Consuls in ROME, and that daily there were three Campes in the Market-place, that it was almost impossible to prevent the mischief at hand, and to stay that it should go no farther: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their own good wils, rather then by compulsion, should put the Government of the State into Pompey's hands alone, chusing the lesser evil, to withstand the greater, and so to yeeld to the absolute Government without constraint, which the sedition would bring it unto. Therefore Bibulus, Cato's friend and kinsman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chuse Pompey Sole-Consull. For, said he, either the Common-wealth shall be well governed by him, or else ROME shall serve an ill Lord. Cato then rising up, beyond all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and said: that the City were better to have one Sovereigne Magistrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could give present order for the pacifying of this confusion, and that he would be careful to preserve the City, when he saw that they trusted him with the Government thereof. Thus was Pompey by Cato's meanes chosen Sole-Consull. Then he sent for Cato to come to his Gardens to him, which were in the Suburbs of the City. Cato went thither, and was received with as great honour and courtesie of Pompey as could be devised: and in the end, after he had given him great thanks for the honours he had done him, he prayed him to afford him his advice and counsell in his Government. Cato answered him thus, That he had not spoken any thing before that time in respect of any ill will he bare him, neither that he delivered this last opinion of his in respect of his friendship, but wholly for the Common-wealths sake: howbeit otherwise, that for his own private Affaires, if he thought good to use his advice, whensoever it pleased to aske his opinion, he would tell him the best he could. But for common Causes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he never asked him: and in fine, he performed all he said. For, first of all, when Pompey did set grievous Penalties and new fines upon their heads, which had bought the Peoples voyces for Money: Cato counseled him to provide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already past. For, said he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man should seeke to reforme the faults that are past: and furthermore, if the punishments appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they should do wrong unto them that were already accused, to punish them by a new Law which they had not offended. Afterwards also, certaine men of good calling (Pompey's friends) being accused, Cato perceiving that Pompey grew remisse, and yeelded in many things, he sharply reproved and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by Law taken away the praises which were wont to be spoken of the offenders that were accused, he himself notwithstanding having written an Oration in the praise of Munatius Plancus, sent it unto the Judges, whilst his Cause was a hearing. Cato being one of the Judges at that time, stopped his eares with both his hands, and would not have it read. Wherefore Plancus refused him for one of his Judges, after his Cause was pleaded unto: howbeit he was condemned notwithstanding. To conclude, Cato was such a grieve and trouble unto them that were accused, that they could not tell well how to deal with him. For, once they durst not let him be any of their Judges, neither could they well also refuse him. For there were many that were condemned, which refusing Cato, seemed unto others that they were guilty: and many also were shamefully reproved, because they would not accept Cato for their Judge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this sort at ROME, Cæsar remained in GAULE with his Army, where he made Wars: nevertheless he wan him friends still in ROME, by Gifts and Money, and made himselfe very strong. Now appeared Cato's Predictions and Forewarnings true unto Pompey, and began to quicken his Spirits which had slept so long, and made him then to consider of the danger, the which which before he could not be perswaded to beleve. But perceiving his slacknesse and fear withall, doubting how to proceed : to prevent Caesars practises, Cato determined to sue to be Consull, with intent either to make him leave his Army, or else to finde out the practise he intended. Cato's Competitors, they were both of them very honest men also, of the which Sulpicius had received great honour and preferment by Cato's credit and authority : in respect whereof many thought that it was scant honestly done of Sulpicius, to shew himself so unthankfull, as to stand against Cato in this suite. Howbeit, Cato never complained of the matter, but said, that it was no marvell he would give place to no man in that, sith it was the greatest good hap that ever came unto him. This notwithstanding he perswaded the Senate to make a Law, that from thenceforth, such as sued for any Office, they should themselves be Suiters to the People, and not preferre their suite by others. This caused the People to be more offended with him then before, because thereby he did not onely take away their fingering of Money, which they got by their voices in Elections : but tooke from them the meanes they had also to pleasure many, bringing them now into poverty and contempt. He therefore having no face to flatter the People and to curry favour with them, but rather sticking to his grave manner and modest life, then to seeke the dignity of a Consull by such meanes, made suite himselfe in person, and would not suffer his friends to take the ordinary course which might win the Peoples hearts, whereupon he was put by his Consullship. This deniall was wont not onely to have made the parties refused, very sorrowfull, but their friends and kinsmen also greatly affamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at Tennis with his friends in the Field of Mars and after he had dined, walked againe in the Market-place, as his manner was, without Shooes on his feet, and Coat. Cicero blamed him much for that, because the Common-wealth requiring then such a Consull as he, he had not carefully endeavoured himselfe by courtesie and gentle meanes to win the favour of the People, neither would ever after make suite for it, although at another time he sued to be Praetor. Thereunto Cato answered, that for the Praetorship he was not denied it by the good-will of the People, but rather for that they were bribed with Money. And for the Election of the Consuls, where there was no deceit used, he knew plainly he went without it, for his manners which the People misliked : the which he thought were no wise mans part to change for any mans pleasure, nor yet by making the like suite again to hazard the refusal. Furthermore, Caesar making Warre with very stout Nations, and having with no small danger and travell subdued them : and having also set upon the GERMANS with whom the ROMANS were at peace, and also slaine three hundred thousand Persons: his friends made suite that the People should do solemne Sacrifice to give thanks unto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they should deliver Caesar into their hands whom he had injured, to receive such punishment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be cast upon him, that the City might be no partaker of it, sith they could not do withall. Nevertheless, said he, we are to do Sacrifices unto the gods, to give them thanks, for that they turned not the revenge of the fury and rashnesse of the Captaine, upon our poor Souldiers which were in no fault, but have pardoned the Common-wealth. Caesar being advertised thereof, wrote a Letter unto the Senate, containing many Accusations against Cato. The Letter being read, Cato rose, not as a man put in a chafe with choler, nor pricked with envie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would say) declared that the Accusations which Caesar heaped against him in his Letters, were but pretty mockes and sleights which he had gathered together, to make the People merry withall. But on the other side, when he began to unrip his whole intents and practises from the beginning, not as if he had been his Enemy, but rather a Confederate with him in his conspiracy, declaring that they were not the GERMANS, nor the GAULES, which they were to be afraid of, but of himselfe, if they were wise : he thereupon so offended the Senate, and made such stirr among them, that Caesars friends repented them they had caused his Letters to be read in the Senate, giving Cato thereby occasion justly to complaine of Caesar, and to alleadge much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Caesar, but this was said onely, that it was good reason to let him have a Successour. Then Caesars friends made suite that Pompey should put away his Army, and resigne up the Provinces he kept, or else that they should compell Caesar no more then him to do it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and said, the thing was now come to passe, which he had ever told them of, and that Caesar came to oppresse the Common-wealth, openly turning the Army against it, which deceitfully he had obtained the same. All this prevailed not, neither could he thereby win any thing of the Senate, because the People favoured Caesar, and would alwaies have him great; for the Senate did beleve all that he said, but for all that they feared the People. When news was brought that Caesar had won the City of ARMINUM, and was coming on with his Army towards ROME, then every man looked upon Cato, and the People and Pompey confessed, that he onely from the beginning had found out the marke Caesar shot at, and had hit the white of his slie device. Then said Cato unto them, If you would have beleevd me, my Lords, and followed my counsell, you should not now have been afraid of one man alone, neither should you also have put your onely hope in one man. Pompey answered thereunto, that Cato indeed had guessed more truly, howbeit that he also had dealt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gave counsell that the Senate should referre all unto Pompeys order : for, said he, they that can do great mischief, know also how to helpe it. Pompey perceiving that he had no Army convenient about him to tarry Caesars coming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint-hearted, he forsooke the City. Cato being determined to go with him, sent his younger Sonne before unto Antinium, which lay in the country of the BRUTIANS, and tooke his Eldest Soone with him. Now because he was to provide a stay stay and governor of his house and daughters, he took Martia againe, which was left a widdow and very rich, for that Hortensius dying made her his heir of all that he had. Thence Caesar upbraided Cato much, reproving his covetousnesse to marry for goods. For said he, if he had need of a wife, why then did he before grant her to another? If he had no need of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Unless she were before a bait unto Hortensius, to keep her whilest she was young, that he might have her again when she was rich. But against that methinks it is sufficient to recite these verses of Enrypides :

That ever feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reprove Hercules cowardlinesse and Catoes covetousnesse. But if his marriage be to be reprov'd, peradventure it is in another sort. For so soon as he had married Martia againe, he left his house and his daughters to her government, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men report that he never polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any Garland, but to his dying day, lamented and bewailed in his heart, the misery and clamity of his Country, whether they had victory, or were overcome. So having the Province of SICILE allotted to him, he went into SYRACUSA. There understanding that Asinius Pollio was arrived at MESSINA, with men of war from his enemies, Cato sent unto him, to know wherefore he came thither, Pollio againe asked of him, who was the causer of all this war? Againe, when Cato advertised that Pompey had forsaken ITALIE, and that he lay in Campe beyond the sea by the City of DYRRACHUM, then he said, he saw a marvellous great change and uncertainty in the providence of the gods: that when Pompey did all things beyond reason, and out of course, he was invincible, and now that he sought to preserve his Country, he saw he lacked his former good hap. Now he knew he was strong enough at that time to drive Asinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would but because there came a grater aide unto him, he would not plague that Island, with the misery of warre. Then after he had advised the SYRACUSANS to take the stronger part, and to looke to their safety : he tooke the sea and went towards Pompey. When he was come unto him, he did alwayes counsell him to prolong the warre, hoping still of some Treaty of Peace : and would in no case they should come to fight any battell, where the weaker part should of necessity be put to the sword by the stronger. Therefore he perswaded Pompey and the counsellors about him, to establish certaine lawes to this effect. That they should sacke no City in this warre, the which belonged unto the Empire of ROME : and also, that that they should kill no Citizen of ROME, but in fury of battell, when their swords were in their hands. Thereby he wanne himselfe great honour, and brought many men to take Pompeys part, by the lenity and clemency he used unto them that were taken. Thereupon, Cato being sent into ASIA, to aide them that had commission to presse Ships and men of warre, he tooke his siter Servilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her : for all the time of her widow-hood, she had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name she had before, sith they saw she had so willingly given her self to follow him in his flying, and contented her selfe with his straight manner of life. This notwithstanding, Caesar did not let to shame her to Cato. Pompeys Capaines had no need of Cato any where but at RHODES. For he wanne the people there with his courteous usage and perswasion, leaving with them Servilia and her little sonne, and went from thence to Pompeys Campe, who had leaved a great Army both by sea and land. There did Pompey most of all discover his mind and intent. For first he meant to have given Cato the charge of the Army by sea, which were above five hundred ships of warre, besides an infinite number of Foits and Pinnaces, and such small bottomes uncovered : but suddenly considering better of it (or possibly being informed by some of his friends, that all Catoes regard and counsel in matters of government was, to deliver ROME from Tyranny, and that if he had so great a charge under him, Caesar being once overcome, he would also force Pompey to leave his Army, and so make him subject to the law) he changed his mind, notwithstanding he had already moved it to Cato, and leaving him, gave Bibulus the charge of all his Army by sea. But Cato therefore shewed no lesse good will unto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certain skirmish and conflict before the City of DYRRACHUM, Pompey encouraging his souldiers, and commanding every Captaine also to do the like in his quarter : the souldiers gave but faint ear unto them, and made no manner of shew of men whose hearts had been any while the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time served) the reason of Philosophy, touching liberty, manhood, death, and honour, and that with a vehement affection : and last of all, ending his Oration, with calling upon the gods, turning his speech unto them, as if they had been present to have seen how valiantly the souldiers fought for the liberty of their Country : they gave such a lusty cry, and had such a brave conceit and vehement desire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, and so led them to battell, where they gave such a cruel charge and firce onset upon their enemies, that they overthrew them, and put them that day to flight. Howbeit Caesars good fortune tooke the finall end of this victory from Pompey, by his over great feare and mistrust : who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victory, as we have written more amply in his life. But when all the rest joyced that they had done so noble an exploit, and made their vaunts of the great advantage they had of their enemies : Cato to the contrary bewailed the calamity of his Country, and lamented that cursed ambition which caused so many good and valiant Citizens of one self City, to kill and murder one another. After this overthrow, Caesar taking his way into THESSALIE, Pompey raised his Campe to follow him, and leaving a great power at DYRRACHUM, of men, armour, munition, and friends : he gave Cato the charge of them all, and fifteen Ensignes of footemen besides. The which he did for the fear and mistrust he had of him, being assured, that if by ill fortune he should lose the battel, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a trustier man then he: but on the other side if he wan the victory, he doubted sore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was. There were also many other Noblemen, as a man would say, cast away, and left at DYRRACHIUM with Cato. In fine, the overthrow of the battel at PHARSALIA being blown abroad, Cato resolved with himself if Pompey were dead, that he would passe over all his men into ITALY, and then like a banished man would himself alone wander as far as he could from the tyranny: and contrarily, if he were alive, that then he would keep his Army together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he passed over the Sea into the Isle of CORFU, where Pompey's Army by sea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would have surrendered up his charge unto him, as to a man of a greater dignity, for that he had been Consul, and Cato only but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wise receive it, but returned immediately into ITALIE. Cato then perceiving that Pompey the younger (son unto Pompey the Great) of a rash and haughty mind, would have punished all them that went into ITALY, and left the Army by sea, and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproved him privately for it, so that he certainly saved Cicero's life, and many other moe besides. Now Cato supposing that Pompey the Great had saved himself in AFRICK, he determined to take the seas, to meet him with all his men: but before he took ship, he gave all men leave to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arrived in AFRICK, sailing up and down the coast there, he met with SEPTIMIUS, the youngest son of Pompey, who first told him, that his father was slain in AFRICK: when the souldiers heard it, they took it very heavily, and not one of them after the death of Pompey the Great, would serve under any other Capitaine then Cato. He thereupon being ashamed, and thinking it pity also to leave so many noble and good men that had served so faithfully under him, without a Captain, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to go: at their request he was contented to take charge of them, and went first unto the City of CYRENE, where not many dayes before, the Citizens had shut the Gates against Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompey's father in law, was gotten unto King Juba, who had received him, and that Atilius Varius, unto whom Pompey had given the charge of the Province of AFRICK, was in their company with an Army, and determined to go joyn with them. So he went by land in the Winter time, and had gotten a marvellous number of Asses together, to carry water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of Carts besides, and of those men, which the AFRICANS call PSILLES, to wit, they that do heal the stinging of serpents, and do sucke out the poison with their mouthes, and do furthermore charme and enchaunt the Snakes, that they have no power to do any hurt. He was seven dayes together marching continually, and went a foot as a guide unto his men, without helpe of horse or beast. From that day forth, on the which he understood of the battel lost at PHARSALIA, he never supped, but sitting, * and added that unto the rest of his sorrow, that he never laid him down, but when he went to bed for all night. Cato having passed the Winter in LYBIA, he brought his souldiers into the field, which were about ten thousand persons. The affairs on their side had but hard successe, for the contention and variance betwixt Scipio and Varius, for the which, they both flattered King Juba to win his favour: being a marvellous proud man, for his greatnesse and riches: as he shewed the first time he spake with Cato. For when Cato came, he caused his own Chaire to be set betwixt Scipio and Cato, to have the honour to be in the midst. But Cato perceiving it, tooke up his own Chaire, and set it on the other side by Scipio to put him in the midst, notwithstanding that he was his enemy, and had written a shameful booke against him. Many make no account of this fact of Cato, but reprove him, because that walking one day with Philostratus in SICILE, he gave him the upper hand, honouring him for his Philosophy. Thus Cato did pull down the pride of the King at that time, who before had used Scipio and Varius as his noblemen and subjects: howbeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole Army and that Scipio himself and Varius both, did first give him place, and willingly resigned unto him the honour to command the whole Campe: he answered them, he would not offend the law, sith he made warre onely to preserve the authority and priviledge thereof, neither would take upon him to command all, himself being but Vice-prætor, where there was a Vice-consul present. For Scipio was created Proconsul, and furthermore, the people had a certaine confidence that their affairs would prosper the better if they had but the name of a Scipio to lead them in AFRICK. Now when Scipio was General over them, he would straight, for Juba's sake, have put all the inhabitants of the City of UTICA (without respect of age) unto the sword, and have razed the houses to the ground, as those that had taken Cæsar's part. Howbeit Cato would not suffer him, but protesting unto them that were present, and calling the gods to witnesse in open counsell, with great difficulty he saved the poor people of UTICA from that cruel Tragedy and slaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipio's instance, Cato took upon him to keep the City, fearing lest by treason, or against their wills it should come into Cæsar's hands: because it was a strong place of situation, and well replenished with all things necessary for him that should keep it. Cato did both furnish it, and also fortifie it. For he brought in great store of Corne, he repaired the rampiers of the walls, made great high Towers, and cast deep trenches round about the City, passing them in: and betwixt the Trenches and the Town, he lodged all the young men of UTICA, and compelled them to deliver up their armour and weapons, and kept all the rest within the City it self, carefully providing that never a man of them should be hurt by the ROMANS; and besides, did also send corne, armour, munition and money unto the Campe: so that the City of UTICA

was the staple and store-house of the wars. Moreover, as he had before counselled Pompey not to come to battel, the like counsel he now gave also unto Scipio, not to hazard battel against a man of great skill and experience in wars, but to take time, whereby, by little and little, he should consume the power and strength of Cæsar's tyranny. But Scipio was so stout, that he regarded not Cato's counsel, but wrote other while unto him, twitting him with his cowardlinesse in this manner: That it was enough for him to be safe in a good City, compassed about with walls, though otherwise he fought not to hinder men to be valiant, to execute any enterprize, as occasion was offered. Cato wrote again unto him, that he was ready to go into ITALY with his footmen and horsemen which he had brought into AFRICK, to draw Cæsar from them, and to turn him against him. Scipio made but a sport at it. Then Cato shewed plainly, that he repent him that he had given him the preferment to be General of the Army, because he saw he would but fondly prosecute this war; and also, that if he chanced to overcome, he could not moderately use the victory against his Countermen. Then he began to mistrust the good successe of this war (and so he told his friends) for the Generals hastinesse and unskilfulnesse: and yet if beyond expectation it fell out well, and that Cæsar were overthrown, he would never dwell at ROMA any more, but would flee the cruelty and bitterness of Scipio, who even at that present time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out sooner then looked for. For a post came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the Campe, and brought news that all was lost, in a great battel, by the City of THAPSUS, which Cæsar had won: that he had taken both Campes; that Scipio and King Juba were fled with a few men, and that all the rest of their Army was slaine. These news did put the Citizens in such a fear and maze (and specially being in the war, and in the night-time): that for very fear they could scant keep themselves within the walls of their City. But Cato meeting with them, stayed them that ran up and down crying in the streets, and did comfort them the best he could. Yet he took not all their fear from them, though he brought them again unto themselves from the extasie they were in, declaring unto them that the losse was nothing so great as it was made; and that it was a common matter to enlarge such news with words enough. By these persuasions, he somewhat pacified the tumult and uprore, and the next morning by break of day he made a proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had chosen for his counsellors, should come and assemble in the Temple of Jupiter, they all being Citizens of ROMA, which for trafficke of Marchandise lay in AFRICK, and all the ROMAN Senators and their children also. Now whilst they gathered themselves together, Cato himself went very gravely with a set modest countenance, as if no such matter had happened, having a little book in his hand, which he read as he went. This book contained the store and preparation of Munition he had made for this war, as Corne, Armour, Weapons, Bowes, Slings, and Footmen. When they were all assembled, he began greatly to commend the good love and faithfulness of these three hundred ROMANS, which had profitably served their Country with their persons, money, and counsell; and did counsel them not to depart one from another, as men having no hope, or otherwise seeking to save themselves scatteringly. "For remaining together, as Cæsar would lesse despise them, if they would make war against him: and would also sooner pardon them if they craved mercy of him. Therefore he counselled them to determine what they would do, and, for his owne part, he said he would not mislike whatsoever they determined of: for if their minds followed their fortune, he would thinke this change to proceed of the necessity of time; but if they were resolved to withstand their misfortune, and to hazard themselves to defend their liberty, he then would not onely commend them, but having their noble courage in admiration, would himself be their Chieftain and companion, even to prove the fortune of their Country to the uttermost. The which was not UTICA nor ADRUMETUM, but the City selfe of ROMA: the which oftentimes through her greatnesse had raised her self from greater dangers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many wayes to save themselves, and the greatest mean of all was this, that they should make war with a man, who by reason of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAINES of one side was up against him, and took part with the younger Pompey: and the City of ROMA also not being used to be bridled with the snaffle of such insolency, could not abide it, but would rather rise with any other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuse any danger, but to take example of their enemy: who to work his mischievous intent, spareth not his person in any danger. And contrarily also, that unto them the uncertainty of the war, if victory followed, would make them happy; as also in being overthrown, their death would turn to immortal glory. Notwithstanding, they were to think of the matter among themselves, and to make their prayers to the gods, that in recompence of their vertue and good service which they had shewed thereunto, they would grant them grace to determine for the best. After Cato had ended his Oration, there were divers of them that were stirred up by his lively persawfions, but the most part of them were encouraged by his constancy and noble mind, and also by his kindness: so that they presently forgot the danger they were in, and praying him to command their persons, goods, and weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only invincible Captain, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to die obeying his counsell, then to save themselves, forsaking so valiant and worthy a man. Then, when one of the assembly made a motion that they should make their bondmen free, and that divers also did confirme it, Cato said, he would by no means suffer it, because it was neither meet nor lawful: howbeit if their masters would manumisse them, that he was contented to receive them for souldiers that could wear any weapon. Divers promised him to do it: and Cato commanded their names should be enrolled that would, and so went his way. Immediately after, letters were brought him from King Juba and Scipio: of the which, King Juba was hidden in a mountaine with few men with him, who sent unto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he meant to forsake UTICA, he would carry him there: and if otherwise he determined to keep UTICA, then that he would come and help him with an Army. Scipio on the other side riding at Anchor, at a point of the land not far from UTICA, said for the like answer. Then Cato thought it best to stay the messengers which had brought him their letters, till he saw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROMANS, were very glad men, and did presently make their bondmen free, and gave them weapons. But the other three hundred which were Merchant venturers, and that lived by usury and exchange, who had the most part of their goods in slaves and bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counsel, but like men, whose bodies soon receive heat, and are soon cold again when they are once gone from the fire: even so those Merchants, while Cato was present among them, had some good pretty will and desire, but when by themselves they had cast their account, the fear they had of Cesar made them forget the reverence they bare unto Cato, and unto their duty. For, said they, what are we, and what is he whom we disdain to obey? Is it not Cesar himself, who at this day is Lord and Emperor of ROMANS? Never a one of us is Scipio, Pompey, or Cato; and yet now, when all men for fear (and in manner compelled) do yeeld and submit themselves, we will needs take upon us with in the walls of UTICA to fight for the liberty of ROMANS against him, for whom Cato flying with Pompey forsooke ITALY: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cesar, having no better liberty our selves then it pleaseth him to give us. Let us therefore now know our selves whilst we have time, and crave mercy at his hands that is the strongest, and send unto him to pray him to pardon us. The greatest and wisest men of those three hundred Merchants had this speech. But the most part of them sought means how to intrap the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cesar's hand, if they did deliver them unto him. Cato did look for this change in them, but yet uttered not that he thought, and returned the messengers backe again unto King Juba and Scipio, and wrote unto them, that they should beware they came not near UTICA, because he did mistrust these three hundred Merchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had escaped from the battell, who coming towards UTICA, sent three of their company unto Cato, the which brought him not one self determination from all the company: For some of them meant to go unto King Juba, others also to joyne with Cato, and part of them were afraid to come into UTICA. These things being thus reported unto Cato, he commanded Marcius Rubrius to take care of these three hundred men, and to receive the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumitted, without compelling of any man. In the mean time Cato with all the Senators went out of UTICA to meet with these horsemen, and there he spake to the Captaines, and prayed them that they would not forsake so many Noblemen and Senators of ROMANS as were there: and that they would not have King Juba for their Captain before Cato, but to come in to UTICA, where they might save themselves the City was of such strength, and besides, so well armed and victualled for many years. The like request did the Senators also make unto them, with the teares running down their cheeks. Thereupon the Captains went and spake with their souldiers. Cato in the mean time set him down on a little hill, with the Senators, tarrying for answer. But then on the suddaine came Rubrius unto him in great haile, complaining of the tumult of these three hundred Merchants, which went about to make the City to rebell: whereupon the rest (their hearts failing them) fell to bewaile their miserable fortune. But Cato sought to comfort them, and then sent unto the three hundred Merchants, to pray them to have a little patience. So the Captains returned again with unreasonable demands of the horsemen. For they said that they cared not for Kings Jubaes pay, neither were they afraid of Cesar's malice, so that they had Cato for their General: yet to be pend up within the wals of a City with AFRICANS, that were PHOENICIANS, and a traitorous Nation as could be, that grieved them most of all. For, said they, though now they stir not, and be quiet, yet when Cesar comes, they will be the first that will betray us, and cut our throats. And therefore, if Cato would have them to joyn with him in this war, that he should either kill or drive away all the UTICANS out of the City, and then that they would come in to it, when it was clear of all those barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruel and barbarous condition, nevertheless he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and so returning again into UTICA, he spake unto them. But they then not regarding the reverence unto Cato, dissembling no longer, said openly, that they would not like of him whatsoever he were, that should compel them to make war with Cesar, both because they would not, nor could not do it. Further, there were some of them that mumbled to themselves, that the Senators, should be kept there till Cesar came. Cato over-heard them, for indeed his hearing was not very quicke. At that very instant one came to him, and told him, that the horsemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing lest these three hundred Merchants would lay hands upon the Senators, he went unto them himselfe with his friends, and perceiving they were gone a great way off, he took his horse and rode after them. They rejoicing to see him come, received him among them, and prayed him to save himselfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to save the Senators, and that with such affection, as it forced teares in him: besides, he held up his hands unto them, took their horses by the bridles, and themselves by their weapons, that at the length he obtained of them, that they would remaine there one day at the least to help the Senators to save themselves. So Cato returning with them into the City, he appointed some of them to ward at the Gates, and put others also in Garrison into the Castell: so that the three hundred Merchants quaked for fear, lest he would have been revenged of them, because of their return with him. Thereupon they sent unto Cato, humbly to pray him to come unto them in any case. But the Senators flocking about him, would not suffer him to go, and said, that they would would not cast away their favior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtlesse, all that were within UTICA plainly saw the vertue and simplicity of Cato, and found that there was no fraud nor deceit in him: who having long time resolved to kill himself, he onely took that extreame paines and care for others, that their lives being saved, he might then rid himself of his own. For men might easily see, though he dissembled it, that he was resolved to die. Whereupon, having comforted the Senators, he yeelded unto the requests of the three hundred Merchants, and went himself alone unto them. Then they thanked him much for his coming, and prayed him to command them, and boldly to trust them: so that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pitie of their faint hearts, though they were not so constant and noble minded as he. For they were determined to send unto Cesar, specially to intreat him for him: and if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were assured they could have none for themselves, and therefore would fight for the safety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wils, answered, that they should send quickly to crave pardon for themselves, but to aske none for him. For (said he) men that be overcome, & have offended, it standeth them upon to make humble suite, and to crave pardon: but for himselfe, he was never overcome in his life, and yet had overcome as much as he desired; and had alwayes been better then Cesar in justice, who onely (not himselfe) was now taken and overcome: the thing being apparently proved in fight against him which he had alwayes denied to have practised against his Country. When he had made this answer unto the three hundred Merchants, he departed from them. News being brought that Cesar was in his way with all his Army, coming towards UTICA: O gods, said he, then he commeth against us as against men. Then turning unto the Senators, he gave them counsel quickly to save themselves, whilst the horsemen were yet in the City. So shutting all the Gates of the City, saving that towards the haven, he appointed ships for them all, and set every thing at a stay, without tumult or disorder, no man having injury offered him, and gave every one money to make way for their safety. When Marcius Othavius (who came with two Legions, and Camped hard by UTICA) sent unto Cato, to determine which of them two should be General, he made no answer, but turning to his friends, said: How can we wonder any more, that all goeth to wrack with us, sith there is such ambition amongst us for the government, even now, when we are at the last call? In the mean time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoiling of the Citizens goods, as a lawful prey in warre. He straight ran thither himself, and the first he met withall, he took from them that they had gotten: the rest, before he came unto them, threw downe that they were carrying away, and hanging down their heads for shame, they went their way, said nothing. Then Cato calling all the Citizens of UTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor move Cesar against the three hundred, but rather to crave of him pardon for them all. Then he went againe to the peers, and there embracing his friends, and taking his leave of them all, he brought them to their ships. Now for his son, he did not counsel him to go, neither did he thinke it meet to urge him to forsake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a young man in his company, of a noble courage, that was determined to follow the invincible constancy of Cato: who counselled him to take the sea, and to sail away with the rest; because he knew he was Cesar's mortall enemy. Statilius said, he would not go. Then Cato turning him unto Apollonides a Stoick Philosopher, and unto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philosopher, said: You must take this stout young man, to perswade him to obey unto necessity. Cato himselfe in the mean time sent away the rest, and did minister justice unto them that required it, spending all that night and the next day about those matters. Then Lucius Cesar, the kinsman of Julius Cesar, the conqueror, being chosen by the three hundred, to go and make suite unto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his Oration, which he should say unto Cesar for them all: and as for thee Cato, said he, I will kisse his hands, and fall down on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay, said Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would save my life by Cesar's grace, I could do it, if I would but go unto him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyrant for injustice. For it is an injustice in him, to take upon him as a Lord and soveraigne to save a mans life, when himselfe hath no authority to command. But yet let us consider if thou wilt, what thou shalt say, to crave pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together considering the matter: and in fine, Lucius Cesar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his son and friends unto him, and embracing him, tooke his leave of him. Then he returned unto his lodging, and calling his sonne and friends before him, and talking of many matters, among others he charged his sonne in no case to meddle in the affaires of the Common-wealth. For, said he, to deale uprightly like Catoes son, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it: and contrarily, observing the time, thou canst not do like an honest man. Towards evening he went into his Bath to wash himself, and as he was bathing, thinking upon Statilius, he cried out aloud: Well Apollonides, thou hast at length yet perswaded Statilius to go his way, and pulled down his stout courage he had: and is he gone without bidding us farewell? How, gone, said Apollonides? Nay, his heart is now more stout and courageous then ever it was, notwithstanding all the perswasions we could use unto him: for he is determined to tarry, and to take such part as thou doest. After he had bathed himself, he went to supper, and sate at his meat, as he had alwayes used after the battell of PHARSALIA, and never lay, but when he went to bed: and he had all his friends and the chief Magistrates of UTICA to supper with him. After supper they fell into grave talke, and matters of Philosophy, till at length they came unto the strange opinion of the Stoicke Philosophers, which was this, that only the good man is free, and all the evil be slaves. The Peripatetick Philosopher that was present there, was straight against it.

Plato's Dialogue of the soul.

Cato's last words unto the Philosophers his friends.

Cato considered his sword wherewith he killed himself.

The death of Cato.

But Cato was very earnest against the Peripatetick and argued the matter a long time, with a vehement speech and contention: insomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid himselfe out of all those troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and saw that every man held their peace, and looked sadly on it: to comfort them againe; and to put the suspicion of his death out of their heads, he began againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and seemed to be carefull of them, as though he had been affraid lest some misfortune were come unto them upon the sea, or unto them that were gone by land, because they passed through deserts, where there was no water to be had: Now when supper was done, and the strangers gone, he walked as his manner was with his friends, and having taken order with the Captaines of the watch for matters of service, as the time required, going into his Chamber he embraced his sonne and his friends more lovingly then he was wont to do, whereby he made them againe suspect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his Chamber and laid in his bed, he took Plato's Dialogue in hand, treating of the soule, and read the most part of it. Then looking by his beds side, and missing his sword (which his son had taken from him when he was at supper) he called one of the Groomes of his Chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his sword away. His man made him no answer, and he fell againe to read his Book. Then a pretty while after, not seeming to be importunate, or over hasty of the matter, but as though he would onely know what became of it, he willed them to bring him his sword againe. They tarried long, and he had read over all the booke, but yet his sword was not brought him againe. Whereupon he called for all his men, one after another, and very angrily asked them his sword, and gave one of them such a blow on his face, that his nose fell a bleeding, and his hand was all bloody withall; and cried out, that his sonne and his servants would deliver him naked into the hands of his enemies, untill his son and his friends at length ran unto him, and falling down on their knees, lamented, and besought him to be contented. Cato then rising out of his bed, looked grimly upon them, and said unto them: O gods, who ever saw me in this taking? why doth no man by reason perswade me, if they see me out of the way, and not to keep me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doest not thou (my son) bind thy fathers hands behind him, that when Cesar cometh, he may finde me in case not to defend my self? I do not desire my sword to hurt my self, for if I had any such mind, I need but hold my breath a little, or give but a knocke of my head against the wall onely, and dispatch my selfe quickly. When he had said thus, his sonne went out of his Chamber weeping, and all his friends also, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, unto whom he spake more gently, and reasoned in this sort: What do you thinke to keepe an old man as I am alive by force? and have you tarried behind but to sit staring upon me, and say nothing unto me? if otherwise else, by reason you come to perswade me, that it shall be no shame for Cato (despairing of the safety of his life) to seek it by the grace and mercy of his enemy, why then do you not now tell me your reasons to perswade me; that forsaking all other fancies and determinations which hitherto we have holden for good, being on a sudden become wiser by Cesar's means, we should be bound the more therefore to give him thanks; I do not tell you this, that I have determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I list) to put the thing in execution I have determined: but yet I will consult with you, when I am so determined, to hear the reasons and opinions of your bookes, which your selves do use in discourse and argument together. Go your way therefore hardly unto my son, and tell him that he must not thinke to compell his father unto that which he cannot prove good unto him by reason. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his Chamber. Then his sword was brought him by a little boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his sword was sharpe and would cut: when he saw it was well: O, said he, now am I where I would be, and so laying down the sword naked by him, he tooke his book againe in his hand, and read it over (as they say) twice together. Then he slept so soundly after it, that his men which were without his Chamber heard him snore againe. About midnight he called for two of his freemen, Cleantes his Phisitian, and Brutus, whom he chiefly employed in his weighty affaires of the Commonwealth. So he sent him unto the haven, to see if all his men that were imbarcked were under saile, and gave his hand to the Phisitian to be bound up, because it was swollen with the blow he gave one of his slaves when he hit him on the face. All his servants were glad to hear of that, hoping then that he desired to live. Soone after came Brutus backe againe from the haven, and brought him word that all were gone but Crassus, who stayed about some businesse he had, and yet that he was going to take ship: howbeit that the sea was very rough, and wind exceeding great, Cato hearing this, sighed, being forry for them that were upon the sea: and sent Brutus backe againe to the haven, to see if any man came backe for any matter they had to say unto him. The little birds began to chirpe, and Cato fell againe in a little slumber. But thereupon Brutus returned, and brought him word that all was quiet in the haven, and there was no stirre. Then Cato bade him go his way, and shut too the doore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had meant to have slept out all the rest of the night. Brutus backe was no sooner turned, but Cato taking his naked sword in his hand, thrust it into his breast: howbeit the swelling of his hand made the blow so weake, that it killed him not presently, but drawing on to his latter end, he fell down upon his bed, and made such a noise with his fall (overthrowing a little table of Geometrie hard by his bed) that his servants hearing the noise, gave a great shriek for fear. Thereupon his son and his friends ran into the Chamber, and found him all of a goare blood, and the most part of his bowels coming out of his body, himself being yet alive and seeing them. They were all stricken with such sorrow to behold it, that at

at the first they were so amazed, as they could not tell what to say to it. His Phisitian coming to he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not perished, and to sow up his wound. But Cato coming to himselfe, thrust back the Phisitian, and tore his bowels with his own hands, and made his wound very great, and immediately gave up the Ghost. Whereupon the three hundred ROMANS (in lesse time then a man would have thought Cato's own household servants could have knowne of his death) were at his doors, and immediately after all the people of UTICA also came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor and saviour, and said, he onely was a freeman, and had an invincible mind: and this was done, when they heard say, that Cesar was not farre from UTICA. Furthermore, neither fear of the present danger, nor the desire to flatter the conqueror, neither any private quarrell amongst themselves, could keep them from honoring Cato's Funerals. For sumptuously setting out his body, and honorably accompanying his Funerals as might be, they buried him by the sea side, where at this present time is to be seen his image, holding a sword in his hand. After that, they made their best way to save themselves and their City. Now Cato being advertised by them that came unto him, how Cato stirred not from UTICA, nor fled not, but sent all others away, saving himself and his son, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing, he could not devise what he meant by it. Therefore esteeming Cato much, he made hast with all the speed he could with his Army to come thither. But when he understood that Cato had slain himself, writers do report he said thus: O Cato, I envy thy death, sith thou hast envied mine honour to save thy life. For indeed, had Cato been contented Cesar should have saved his life, he had not so much impaired his own honour, as he had augmented Cesar's glory. And yet what Cesar would have done, men make it doubtful, saving that they conjecture well of Cesar's clemency. Cato died when he was but eight and forty yeares old. For his son, Cesar never did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him that he was very idely given, and lascivious besides. For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in a Noblemans house of the Kings blood, called Maphradates, who had a faire woman to his wife, he tarried longer there then he might well with honesty; whereupon he fell to be a laughing stocke to the people, and in mockery they said: Cato will go to morrow, a thirty dayes hence. And further that Maphradates and Porcius are two good friends, but they have but one mind: and the reason was, because Maphradates's wife was called Psyche, which in the Greek signifieth, mind: and Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a Princely mind: howbeit his famous death did stop this infamous speech. For he valiantly fighting against Augustus ann Antonius at the battell of PHILIPPES, for the liberty of his Country, their Army being overthrown and fled, he would neither flie nor hide himselfe, but running in amongst his enemies, he made them know what he was by encouraging those of his side, which yet did defend themselves, tell he was slain in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnesse. Furthermore, Porcia the daughter of Cato, gave no place unto her father, neither for chastity, nor greatnesse of mind. For the being married unto Brutus, who slew Cesar, was of the conspiracy, and slew her self as courageously as became the vertue and nobility of her blood from whence she came, as we have more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius also, who had said, he would runne Cato's fortune (as we have told you before) was kept from killing of himselfe by the Philosophers, Demetrius and Apollonides. But after that time having shewed himself very faithful and serviceable unto Brutus in all his affaires, he was slain in the field also at the battell of PHILIPPES.

Ixion against ambitious persons.

Ruely the Fable of Ixion was not ill devised against ambitious persons, who imbracing a cloud for the goddess Juno, begot (as it is said) the CENTAUR. For even so ambitious men, imbracing glory for the true image of virtue, do never any act that is good nor perfect: but being carried away with diverse fancies, and following others humors with desire to please the people, they may as the herdmen in the Tragedy of Sophocles (speaking of their cattell) say:

And wheresoever they become, there also follow we*

Such indeed are they compared to, that governe Common-weales after peoples lust and fancy: who doubtlesse are as their servants obedient at call, because they onely may enjoy the glorious title and name of an officer. For like as in a ship the Mariners that stand in the Prow, do better see before them then Pilots that steere the Helme in the Poop, and yet looke alwayes backe unto them to see what they command: even so, they that governe in the Common-wealth for honors sake, are no better then honorable slaves of the people, having no more but the bare name of a Governor. But indeed, the perfect good and honest man should never covet outward glory, but as a mean to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a young man that coveteth honour by virtue, give him leave a little to glory in his well doings: for as Theophrastus saith, virtue buddeth and flourisheth in youth, and taketh fast roote by praises given, as wit and courage groweth in them. But overmuch praise is dangerous in every person, but chiefly in ambitious Governors. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many desperate parts: for they will not allow that honour proceeds of virtue, but that honour is vertue it selfe. But indeed they should say as Phocion said unto Antipater, that requested an unlawful matter of him: Thou canst not, said he, have Phocion a friend and a flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be said unto the people: you cannot have one, both a master and a servant, that can command and obey together. Or else the mischief spoken of in the tale of the Dragon must needs happen, which was; The taile on a time fell out with the head, and complained, saying, it would another while go before, and would not alwayes come behind. The head granted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing how to guide the head; and besides that, the head thereby was tormented every way, being compelled against nature to follow that part and member, which could neither hear nor see how to guide it. The like matter have we seen happen unto many, which in the administration of the Common-wealth, did seek to please the humors of the multitude. For when they have once put their heads under their girdles to please the common people, which without cause and reason do soon rebell, they can by no possible meanes afterwards bridle their fury and insolency. Now the reason that made us enter into discourse against the ambition and vaine glory amongst the people, was the consideration I had of their great power, remembering the misfortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus: both of the which coming of a noble house, and having been marvellous well brought up, and managing also the affairs of the Common-wealth with a good desire, were notwithstanding in the end cast away: not so much through covetousnesse of glory, as for fear of dishonour, which came also of no base mind. For they having received great pleasures and friendship of the people, were ashamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earnestly fought to exceed the people in goodwill, by new decrees and devices, devices, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their parts contended to honor them the more, by how much they strived to shew themselves thankful. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people to honour them, were so unwares entangled with publicke causes, that they could no more follow the common Proverbe, which saith:

Although our deeds dissent from equity, Yet can we not desist with honesty.

This thou shalt easily find by the declaration of the History. With these we do compare two other popular men, both Kings of LACEDÆMON, Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Gracchi, seeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the just and honest government againe of the Commonwealt of LACEDÆMON, which of long time had been out of use, did in like manner purchase the hate of the Nobility, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted covetousnesse. Indeed these two *LACONIAN*s were no brethren borne, but yet did both follow one self course and Forme of Government, which had beginning in this sort. After that covetousnesse of Gold and Silver crept againe into the City of SPARTA, and with riches, covetousnesse also and misery, and by use voluptuousnesse and licentious life: SPARTA then was void of all honour and goodnesse, and was long time drowned in shame and dishonor, until King Agis and Leonidas came to reigne there. Agis was of the house of the Eurytionides, the sonne of Endamedas, the sixth of lineall descent after Agesilam who had been the great Prince of all GREECE in his time. This Agesilam had a son slaine in ITALY by the *MESSAPHIAN*s, called Archidamus before the City of MANTONUM. Archidamus had issue two sons, Agis and Endamidas that was King, who succeeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater slew before the City of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Endamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Endamidas: which Endamidas also begat Agis, whose life we now write of. Leonidas also, the sonne of Cleonymus, was of the other family of the Agiaides, the eight of succession after Pausanias, who slew Mardonius, the Kings Lieutenant Generall of PERSIA, in a battell fought before the City of PLATEES. This Pausanias had a son called Plistonax, and Plistonax also another, called Pausanias: who flying from SPARTA unto the City of THEBA, his eldest son Agesipolis was made King in his fathers roome, who dying without issue, his younger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the Kindome. Cleombrotus had two sons, Agesipolis and Cleomenes: of the which, Agesipolis reigned not long King, and died without issue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was King after him, had two sons, Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the younger which survived him, and was not King, but one Arenus his Nephew, the son of Acrotatus. This Arenus died before the City of CORINTH, who having another Acrotatus to his son, he succeeded him in the Kindome. He also died at a battell before the City of MEGALIPOLIS, and was there slaine by the Tyrant Aristodemus, leaving his wife great with child. She being brought to bed after his death of a sonne, whom Leonidas the son of Cleonymus taught and brought up, the child dying very young, the crowne by his death was cast upon Leonidas himselfe. Howbeit his manners and conditions never liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the Common-wealth, and clean out of order, yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the ancient LACONIAN life: because he had been long time brought up in Princes houses, and followed also Selencus Court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those Courts into GREECE, where Law and Reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not onely farre excell Leonidas, in honour and magnanimity of mind: but all other almost also which had reigned in SPARTA from the time of Agesilam the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty years old, and being daintily brought up with the finenesse of two women, his mother Agistrata, and Archidamia his Grandmother, which had more Gold and Silver then all the *LACEDÆMONIAN*s else, he began to spurne against these womanish delights and pleasures, in making himselfe fair to be the better liked, and to be fine and trim in his apparell; and to cast upon him a plaine Spanish Cape, taking pleasure in the Diet, Bathes, and manner of the ancient LACONIAN life: and openly boasted besides, that he would not desire to be King, but onely for the hope he had to restore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began state of the LACEDÆMON first to be corrupted, and to leave her ancient discipline, when the *LACEDÆMONIAN*s having subdued the Empire of the *ATHENIAN*s, stored themselves and Country both with plenty of Gold and Silver. But yet reserving still the lands left unto them by succession from their fathers, according unto Lycurgus first ordinance and institution, for division of lands amongst them: which ordinance, and equality being inviolably kept amongst them, did yet preserve the Common-wealth from defamations of divers other notorious crimes, untill the time of the authority of Epidamius, one of the Ephores, a seditious man, and of proud conditions: who bitterly falling out with his own son, preferred a law, that every man might lawfully give his lands and goods whilest he lived, or after his death by testament, unto any man whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this man made a law to satisfie his anger, and others also did confirme it for covetousnesse sake, and so overthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy lands of numbers, and so transferred it from the right and lawful heirs: whereby a few men in short time being made very rich, immediately after there fell out great poverty in the City of SPARTA, which made all honest sciences to cease, and brought in thereupon unlawful occupations, who envied them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not above seven hundred natural Citizens of SPARTA in all, and of them, not above an hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the rest were poor people in the City, and were of no countenance nor calling, and besides that, went unwillingly to the the warres against their enemies, looking every day for stirre and change in the City. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good act (as indeed it was) to replenish the City of SPARTA againe, and to bring in the old equality, he moved the matter unto the Citizens. He found the youth (against all hope) to give ear unto him, and very well given unto vertue, easily changing their garments and life, to recover their liberty againe. But the oldest men, which were now even rotten with covetousnesse and corruption, they were afraid to returne againe to the straight ordinances of Lycurgus, as a slave and runagate from his master, that trembleth when he is brought backe againe unto him. Therefore they reproved Agis, when he did lament before them their present miserable estate, and with also for the former ancient honour and true dignity of SPARTA. Howbeit Lysander the sonne of Lybius, and Mandroclidas the son of Euphanes, and Agefilaw also, greatly commended his noble desire, and perswaded him to go forward withall. This Lysander was of great authority and estimation amongst them in the City, Mandroclidas was also very wise, and careful about any matter of counsell, and with his wisdom and policy, very valiant: Agefilaw in like manner, the Kings Uncle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and covetous, and yet prick forward to give his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his sonne Hippomedon, who was a noble good soldier, and could do very much, by means of the love and good-will the young men did bear him. But indeed, the secret cause that brought Agefilaw to consent unto this practise, was the greatnesse of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be discharged by changing of the state and Common-wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he fought by his means to draw his mother also unto the matter, which was Agefilaw sister. She could do very much by the number of her friends, followers, and debtors in the City, by whose means she ruled the most part of the affaires of the City after her own pleasure. But the young man Hippomedon making her privy unto it, at the first he was amazed withall, and bade him hold his peace if he were wife, and not to meddle in matters impossible and unprofitable. But when Agefilaw had told her what a notable act it would be, and how easily it might be brought to passe, with marvellous great profit: and that King Agis began also to intreat her with great intreaty, and that she should willingly depart with her goods to win her son honour and glory: who though he could not in money and riches come to be like unto other Kings (because the slaves and factors onely of the Kings Selencus, and Ptolomy, had more money then all the Kings of SPARTA had together that ever reigned) yet if in temperance, thriftinesse, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to restore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe unto equality, that then indeed he should be counted a Noble King. These women stirred up with ambition by those persuasions of the young man, seeing him so nobly bent, as if by the gods their minds had secretly been inflamed with the love of vertue, did presently alter their mindes in such sort, that they themselves did prick forward Agis, and sent for their friends to pray and intreat them to favour his enterprise: and furthermore they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did ever heare and believe their wives, suffering them to understand more of the affaires of the State then they themselves did of their private estate at home. Herein is to be considered, that the most part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were against it, not onely because thereby they were cut off from their finenesse and excesse, in the which being ignorant of the true good indeed, they put all their felicity: but also because they saw their honour and authority which they had by their riches, clean troden under foote. Therefore coming to Leonidas, they did perswad him to reprove Agis, because he was an elder man then he, and to lett that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in favour of the rich, but fearing the common people, who desired nothing but alteration, he durst not openly speak against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Agis practise; talking with the Magistrates of the City, and accusing Agis unto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods unto the poor, the division of their lands, and the abolishing of all debts, for reward to put the tyranny into his hands, and that thereby he got a strong guard unto himself, but not many Citizens unto SPARTA. This notwithstanding, King Agis having procured Lysander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preferred his law unto the counsell. The Articles whereof were these: That such as were in debt, should be cleared of all their debts, and that the lands also should be divided into equal parts: so that from the valley of Pallena unto mount Taugerum, and unto the Cities of MALEA and SELASIA, there should be four thousand five hundred parts; and without those bonds, there should be in all the rest, fifteen thousand parts, the which should be distributed unto their neighbours meet to carry weapon: and the rest unto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbours and strangers in like manner, which should be very well brought up, and be able men besides to serve the Common-wealth: all the which afterwards should be divided into fifteen companies, of the which, some should receive two hundred, and others four hundred men, and should live according to the old ancient institution observed by their Ancestors. This law being preferred unto the Senate, the Senators grew to diverse opinions vpon it. Whereupon Lysander assembled the great counsell of all the people, and there spake unto them himself, and Mandroclidas, and Agefilaw also, praying them not to suffer the honour of SPARTA to be troden under foot, for the vanity of a few: but that they would remember the ancient Oracles of the gods, warning them to beware of a varice, as of the plague and destruction of the Common-wealth: and of the late Oracle also brought unto them, from the Temple of Pasiphae. The Temple and Oracle of Pasiphae was famous at the City of THALAMES: and some say, that Phasiphae was one of the daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with childe by Jupiter, and was delivered of a son called Hammon. Other thinke thinke that it was Cassandra, one of Priamus daughters that died there, which was firnamed Pasiphae, because she gave all the answers and Oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth that Daphné the daughter of Amicyla, flying from Apollo that would have ravished her, was turned into a Lawrel Tree, and honoured by Apollo with the gift of prophecy. So, they said that this Oracle of the god commanded them, that the SPARTANS should againe returne unto their former ancient equality, stablished first by Lycurgus law. When every man else had spoken, King Agis rising up, briefly speaking unto the people, said: that he would bestow great contributions for the reformation of this Common-wealth, which he was desirous to restore again. For first of all, he would make common all his arable and pasture he had, and besides that he would adde too six hundred talents in ready money, and so much should his mother, grandmother, kinsmen, and friends, all the which were the richest and wealthiest in SPARTA. When the people heard what he said, they marvelled much at the noble mind of this young King and were very glad of it, saying: that for three hundred years space together, the City of SPARTA had not so worthy a King as he. But Leonidas contrarily assaied with all the power he could to resist him, thinking with himself that if King Agis purpose took place, he should also be compelled to do as he did, and yet he should have no thanks, but King Agis: because that all the SPARTANS indifferently should be compelled to make their goods common, but the honour should be his onely that first began it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had been a good and just man, or not? Agis answered that he had been. Then replied Leonidas, Did you ever see that he had taken away and abolished any debts, or had received strangers into the number of the Citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily though this Common wealth imperfect, if all strangers were not banished the City. Agis againe answered him: that he marvelled not that Leonidas being brought up in a strange Countrey, and also married there in a Noblemans house, he should be ignorant of Lycurgus Laws, who banishing gold and silver out of his City, did therewithal exile debt and lending. And for strangers he hated them that would not conforme themselves unto the manners and fashions of life which he instituted, and those they were which he banished: not for any ill will he bare unto their persons, but because he feared their manners of life, lest that mingling them with the Citizens, they should make them run after vanity and covetousnesse to be rich. For otherwise, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all strangers, were marvellously revered and honoured in SPARTA in old time, because they did sing in their writings, the selfe same things which Lycurgus had established in his lawes. And thou thy selfe also dost commend Euprepes, being one of the Ephores, because he did cut with a Hatchet the two strings which Phrynis the Musician added unto the Citherne, more then the seven common strings, and those also which did the like unto Timotheus: and yet thou reprovest me, because I go about to root out all excesse and pride out of SPARTA, as though those men did not farre off prevent that these superfluous strings of the Musicke, delighting the Citizens minds too much with their songs, should not cause them fall unto such trade and manner of life, as should make the City at discord with itself. After this contention the common people did sticke unto King Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidas: praying and perswading him not to forsake them: and further, they did so intreat the Senators, in whom consisteth the chief authority, to determine and digest all matters before they be propounded unto the people, that they overthrow the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lysander who was yet in office, attempted to accuse Leonidas by an ancient law, forbidding that none of the race of Heracles should marry with any strange woman, nor beget children of her: and said further, that no man upon death should dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When he had instructed others to object these things against Leonidas, he with others of his colleagues observed a signe in the Element, the Ceremony whereof was in this sort: Every ninth year, the Ephori choosing a bright night without Moon-light, did sit down in some open place, and beheld the Starres in the Element, to see if they saw any Starre shoot from one place to another: if they did, then they accused their Kings, that they had offended the gods, and did deprive them of their Kingdom, untill some Oracle came from DELPHES or OLYMPUS, to restore them again. Lysander then declaring that he had seen a Star stein the Element, did therefore accuse King Leonidas, and brought forth witnesses against him, how he had married a woman of ASIA, the which one of King Selencus Lieutenants had given him in marriage, and that he had two children by her; and afterwards being forsaken of his wife that refused him, he returned again into his Country against his will, and had so possessed the Kingdom for lacke of a lawful heir. So following his accusation in this manner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his son in law, being also of the Kings blood, to make title to the Crowne. Leonidas being afraid of the successe hereof, tooke sanctuary in the Temple of Juno, firnamed Chalcecos, and his daughter with him, who forsooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appear in person, and making default they deposed him, and made Cleombrotus King. In the mean time Lysander office expired, and the new Ephori which succeeded him, did deliver Leonidas againe, and accused Lysander and Mandroclidas, because against the Law they had abolished all debts, and had againe made new division of lands. When they saw they were openly accused, they incensed both the Kings, that joyning together, they should make the Ephores ordinances of no effect, declaring that their authority was onely erected for the discord of the two Kings, because they should give their voices unto that King that had the best judgement and reason, when the other would willfully withstand both right and reason: and therefore they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controulement of any person: and that to resist the Kings, was a breaking of the Law, sith that by right the Ephori had no other priviledge and authority, but to be Judges and arbitrarours between them, when there was any cause of Jarre or controversie. Both the Kings being carried away by this persuasion, went into the Market-place accompanied with their friends, plucked the Ephores from their seats and put others in their roomes, of the which Agefilaus was one. Furthermore they armed a great number of young men, and opening the prisons, did set the prisoners at liberty: the which made their adversaries afraid of them, doubting some great murder would have followed upon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Agefilaus being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled to the City of TEGEA, and having also layed men in waite for him by the way, King Agis hearing of it, sent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, and they did accompany Leonidas, and brought him safely unto the City of TEGEA. Thus their purpose taking effect, and no man contrariying them, one man onely Agefilaus overthrew all, and dashed a noble LACEDÆMONIAN law by a shamefull vice, which was covetousnesse. For he being a great landed man, and having the best lands of any man in the Country, and owing a great summe of money besides, would neither pay his debts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he perswaded King Agis, that if he went about to establish both together, he should raise a great uproare in the City, and withall, if he did first win them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting off of debts onely, then that they would easily and willingly also accept the law of partition of lands. Lysander was also of this opinion: whereby King Agis and he both were deceived by Agefilaus subtilty. So they commanded all the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bills of debt (which the LACEDÆMONIANS do call Claria) into the Market-place, and there jaying them on a heape together they did set fire on them. When the Usurers and Creditors saw their Writings obligatory on a fire, they departed thence with heavy hearts: but Agefilaus mocking them said, he never saw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands also should be presently divided, and the Kings likewise commanding it, Agefilaus still interposing some cause of let, delayed time, untill opportunity served, that King Agis should go to the warres: for that the ACHÆIANS their confederates had prayed aide of LACEDÆMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betweene them, because they looked daily that the ÆTOLIANS coming through the Country of MEGARA, would invade PELOPONNESUS. Aratus General of the ACHÆIANS had leaved a great Army to withstand their invasion, and had also written unto the Ephores, that they should fend them aide. Whereupon they presently sent King Agis, perceiving also the readinesse and good will of the souldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the most part of them were young men and needy, who seeing themselves discharged of the fear of their debts, and hoping also at their returne, that the lands likewise should be divided among them, they went with glad hearts, and were obedient to King Agis. So that the Cities where they passed through, wondred how they came through PELOPONNESUS, from the one side to the other, very quietly, without noise or offence to any man. Likewise many GRECIANS calling to minde the ancient times, told one another, that it was a noble gift then to see the Army of LACEDÆMON when they were led by Agefilaus, Lysander, and Leonidas, famous Captaines: sith now they saw so great obedience unto Agis by his souldiers, who was in manner the youngest man of all his Campe: who also glorying to be content with little to away with paines, and not to be more costly apparelled, and armed then any private souldier he had, he wanne himselfe thereby a marvellous love of the people. Howbeit the rich men liked not this charge, and were afraid lest Agis should give other people example to rise also, and to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meeting with Aratus by the City of CORINTH, even as he was consulting whether he should fight with his enemy, or not, shewed himselfe in his counsell then, no rash, but a resolute and valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, and not to suffer the warre to come any further, leaving the entry into PELOPONNESUS free to their enemy: nevertheless, that he would do what Aratus thought good, because he was the elder, and General also of the ACHÆIANS, whom he came not to command, but to aide them. But Baton SINOPIAN writeth that King Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he hath not read that which Aratus had written for his excuse and justification, alledging there that the farmers and husbandmen having brought all the Corne into their Barnes, he thought it better to suffer the enemies to come farther into their Country, rather then to hazard battel, to the losse of the whole Country of PELOPONNESUS; and that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart, and brake up his Army. So King Agis returned home againe, greatly honoured of them that served with him in his journey, finding the City of SPARTA then in great broile and trouble: For Agefilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himselfe ridde of the fear which before kept him under, cared not what injury or mischief he did unto any Citizen, so he might get money. For amongst other things, that very yeare he made them pay beyond all reason the Tallages and Taxes due unto the Common-wealth for thirteene moneths, adding too the thirteenth moneth above the ordinary time of the yreare. Wherefore perceiving every man hated him, and being afraid of them he had offended, he kept souldiers about him, armed with their swords, and so came downe into the Market-place among them. And for the two Kings, he made no account of the one; but of the other that was Agis, he seemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds sake, then for his dignity of a King; and furthermore gave it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next year following. Whereupon his enemies speedily to prevent the danger, gathered force together, and openly brought King Leonidas from TEGEA, to restore him againe to his Kingdome. The people were glad to see that, because they were angry they had been mocked in that sort, for that the lands were not divided according unto promise. Furthermore Hippomidon was so well beloved of every man for his valiantnesse, that intreating the People for his Father Agefilaus, he saved his life, and got him out of the City. But for the two Kings, Agis tooke Sanctuary in the Temple of Juno Chalcocoe, and Cleombrotus the other King fled into the Temple of Neptune: for it seemed Leonidas being much more offended with him, did let King Agis alone, and went against him with certaine Souldiers armed. Then he sharply taunted him, that being his Son-in-law, he had conspired against him, to deprive him of his Kingdome, and had driven him out of his Country. But then Cleombrotus not having a word to say, fate still, and made him no answer. Whereupon his Wife Chelonis, the Daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the injury they did her Father, and had left her Husband Cleombrotus, that had usurped the Kingdome from him, to serve her Father in his adversity, and while he was in Sanctuary tooke part with him also of his misery, and afterwards when he went into the City of TEGEA, wore blacks for sorrow, being offended with her Husband: she contrarily then changing her anger with her Husbands fortune and misery, became also an humble suiter with him, sitting downe by him, and imbracing him, having her two little Sonnes on either side of them. All men wondring, and weeping for pity to see the goodnesse and naturall love of this Lady, who shewing her mourning Apparell, and haire of her head flaring about her eyes, "bare-headed, she spake in this manner unto her Father: O Father mine, this sorrowfull Garment and countenance is not for pity of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting fore your former misery and exile: but now, which of the two should I rather choose, either to continue a mourner in this pitifull state, seeing you againe restored to your Kingdome, having overcome your enemies; or else putting on my Princely Apparell, to see my Husband slaine, unto whom you married me a Maide? who if he cannot move you to take compassion on him, and to obtaine mercy, by the teares of his Wife and Children, he shall then abide more bitter paine of his evil counsell, then that which you intend to make him suffer. For he shall see his Wife die before him, whom he loved more dearly then any thing in the World. Also, with what face can I looke upon other Ladies, when I could never bring my Father to pity by any intercession I could make for my Husband, neither my Husband intreat him for my Father: and that my hap is to be borne a Daughter and Wife alwaies most unfortunate, and despised of mine owne? And for my Husband, if he had any reason to do that he did, I then tooke it from him, by taking your part, and protesting against him: and certainly your selfe doth give him honest colour to excuse his fault, when he seeth in you the desire of the Kingdome so great, that for the love thereof, you thinke it lawfull to kill your Sonne-in-law; and also not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her sake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this sort, putting her face upon Cleombrotus head, cast her swollen and blubbered eyes upon the standers by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a little with his friends, he commanded Cleombrotus to get him thence, and to leave the City as an exile: and prayed his Daughter for his sake to remaine with him, and not to forsake her Father, that did so dearly love her, as for her sake he had saved her Husbands life. This notwithstanding, she would not yeeld to his request, but rising up with her Husband, gave him one of his Sons, and her selfe tooke the other in her armes; and then making her prayer before the Altar of the goddesse, she went as a banished woman away with her Husband. And truly the example of her vertue was so famous, that if Cleombrotus minde had not bene too much blinded with vaine glory, he had cause to thinke his exile far more happy, to enjoy the love of so noble a Wife as he had, then for the Kingdome which he possessed without her. Then Leonidas having banished King Cleombrotus out of the City, and removing the first Ephores, had substituted other in their places, he presently bethought him how he might craftily come by King Agis. First, he perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary, and to governe the Kingdome safely with him, declaring unto him that his Citizens had forgiven him all that was past, because they knew he was deceived, and subtilly circumvented by Agefilaus craft, being a young man, ambitious of honour. Agis would not leave the Sanctuary for Leonidas cunning persuasion, but mistrusted all that he said unto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares and Arcefilaus, did oftentimes go to visit King Agis; and otherwhile also they got him out of the Sanctuary with them unto the Bath, and brought him backe againe into the Temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares having borrowed not long before, certaine rich Apparell and Plate of Agefilaus, because he would not re-deliver them againe, he determined to betray King Agis, his Mother and Grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did serve Leonidas turne, and provoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) against Agis. Now therefore, Agis keeping all the rest of his time within the Temple, saving when he went upon occasion to the Bath, they determined to intercept him by the way, and to take him when he was out of the Sanctuary. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed, and came and saluted him as their manner was, and seemed to accompany him, sporting and being merry with him, as with a young man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a streete that went towards the Prison, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, said unto him: I arrest thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to give account of thy doings in the Common-wealth. Then Demochares which was a great mighty man, cast his Gowne over his eares, and pulled him forward: others also thrust him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being neare them to helpe Agis, they got him into Prison. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of Souldiers that were strangers, and beset the Prison round about. The Ephores went into the Prison, and sent unto some of the Senate to come to them, whom they knew to be of their minde: then they commanded Agis, as if it had bene judicially, to give account of the alteration he had made in the Common-wealth.

Thereupon the Ephors incontinently sent Cleomenes back againe with his Army : who tooke the Fort of MEATHYDRUM, and burnt the Borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came against him with an Army of twenty thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horsemen led by Aratus. Cleomenes met with them by the City of PALANTUM, and offered Battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardnesse of this young man, would not suffer Arifimachus to hazard Battell, but went his way derided by the ACHAIANS, and despised by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who in all were not above five thousand fighting men. Cleomenes courage being now list up, and bravely speaking to his Citizens, he remembered them of a saying of one of their ancient Kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS never enquired what number their Enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, the ACHAIANS making Warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to aide them, and met with the Army of the ACHAIANS by the Mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne; he setting upon them, gave them the overthrow, slew a great number of them, and tooke many also Prisoners, that the rumour ran through GREECE, how Aratus selfe was slaine. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this Victory gave him, he went straight to the City of MANTINEA, and taking it upon a sudden, when no man knew of his coming, he put a strong Garrison into it. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hearts failing them, and resisting Cleomenes enterprises, over-wearying them with Warres, he went about to send Archidamus, King Agis Brother, being then at MESSINA, unto whom the Kingdome of right belonged by the other House; supposing that he should easily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the Authority of the two Kings, if both of them joyned together. Which when the murderers of King Agis understood, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be revenged of them, they secretly received him into the City, and found the means to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was unwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly testifieth) or else with his privy, suffering them to make him away, by perswasion of his friends. But it is a cleare case, the City was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out, that they had compelled Cleomenes to do it. Nevertheless, he holding still his first determination, to alter the state of the Common-wealth of SPARTA, as soone as he could possible, he so fed the Ephores with Money, that he brought them to be contented he should make Warre. He had also wonne many other Citizens by the means of his Mother Cratæclea, who furnished him with Money, that he lacked not to honour him withall: and further, married as it is reported (though otherwise she meant not to marry) for her Sons sake, unto one of the valiantest men of all the City. So Cleomenes leading his Army into the Field, wanne a place within the Territory of MEGALIPOLIS, called LEUCTRA. The ACHAIANS also being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus, they straight fought a Battell by the City selfe, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his Army. Howbeit Aratus would not suffer the ACHAIANS to follow them, because of bogs and quavemires, but sounded the retreat. But Lyfidas a MEGALIPOLITAN being angry withall, caused the Horsemen he had about him to follow the Chase, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongst Vines, Walls and Ditches, where he was driven to disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiving it, sent the light Horsemen of the TARENTINES and CRETANS against him: of whom Lyfidas valiantly fighting was slaine. Then the LACEDÆMONIANS being courageous for this Victory, came with great cries; and giving a fierce charge upon the ACHAIANS, overthrew their whole Army, and slew a marvellous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take up the dead bodies of their men to bury them. For Lyfidas Corpes, he caused it to be brought unto him, and putting a Purple Robe upon it, and a Crowne on his head, sent it in this array unto the very Gates of the City of MEGALIPOLIS. It was that selfe Leonidas, who giving over the Tyranny and Government of MEGALIPOLIS, made it a Popular State, and free City, and joyned it to the ACHAIANS. After this Victory, Cleomenes then determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded himselfe that if he might once come to stablish the Affaires of the Common-wealth at SPARTA to his minde, he might then easily overcome the ACHAIANS, brake with his Father-in-law Megeisthus, and told him that it was necessary to take away the Authority of the Ephores, and to make division of the Lands among the SPARTANS: and then being brought to equality, to encourage them to recover the Empire of GREECE againe unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, which their Predecessors before them held and enjoyed. Megeisthus granting his good will and furtherance, joyned two or three of his friends more unto him. It chanced at that time, that one of the Ephores lying in the Temple of Paphæa, had a marvellous dreame in the night. For he thought he saw but one Chaire standing where the Ephors did use to sit to give audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away; and that marvelling at it, he heard a voice out of the Temple that said, That was the best for SPARTA. He declaring this Dreame the next morning unto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard some inkling of his intent. But when he perswaded himselfe that the other meant good faith, and died not unto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose; and taking with him unto the Campe all those SPARTANS which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and tooke the Cities of HERA and ALSEA, Confederates of the ACHAIANS, and victualled ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the City of MANTINEA. In fine, he so wearied and over-hurried the LACEDÆMONIANS by long journeys, that at length they besought him he would let them remain in ARCADIA, to repose themselves there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his strangers which he had hired, returned againe unto SPARTA, and imparted his intent by the way unto them he trusted best, and marched at his owne ease, that that he might take the Ephores; at supper.. When he came neare unto the City, he sent Euryclidas before, into the Hall of the Ephores, as though he brought them newes out of the Campe from him. After him, he sent also Thericon and Phobis, and two other that had beene brought up with him, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a few Souldiers. Now whilst Euryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they also came in upon them with their Swords drawne, and did set upon the Ephores. Agefilau was hurt first of all, and falling downe, made as though he had beene slaine; but by little and little he crept out of the Hall, and got secretly into a Chappell consecrated unto Feare, the which was wont ever to be kept shut, but then by chance was left open: when he was come in, he shut the doore fast to him. The other foure of the Ephores were slaine presently, and above ten moe besides, which came to defend them. Furthermore, for them that fate still and stirred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was desirous to go out of the City: but moreover, they pardoned Agefilau, who came the next morning out of the Chappell of Feare: Amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS in the City of SPARTA, there are not onely Temples of Feare and death, but also of Laughter; and of many other such passions of the minde. They do worship Feare, not as other spirits and devils that are hurtfull, but because they are persuaded that nothing preserveth a Common-wealth better then feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Aristotle witnesseth) when they are created, do by publicke Proclamation command all the SPARTANS to shave their chins, and to obey the Law, lest they should make them feeble the rigour of the Law. They brought in the shaving of their chins, in my opinion, to enure young men to obey the Magistrates even in trifles. Moreover, it seemes that men in old time did esteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare and lothnesse to incur shame. For commonly those that are most afraid to offend the Law, are in the Field most valiant against their Enemies, and shun no perill to win fame and honest reputation. And therefore it was wisely said of one:

And so Homer in a certaine place made Helen say unto King Priamus :

Of truth I do confesse deare father-in-law,
You are the man of Whom I stand in awe, And reverence most of all that ever I saw.

And in another place, speaking of the GREEKIAN Souldiers, he saith thus :

For men do use to reverence them whom they feare. And this was the cause why the Chappell of Fear was by the Hall of the Ephores, having in manner a Princely and absolute Authority. The next morning Cleomenes banished by Trumpet fourscore Citizens of SPARTA, and overthrew all the Chaires of the Ephores but one onely, the which he reserved for himselfe to sit in to give audience. Then calling the People to Councell, he gave them account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had joyned the Senators with the Kings, and how the City had bene governed a long time by them, without helpe of any other Officers. Notwithstanding, afterwards the City having great Warres with the Messinians, the Kings being alwaies employed in that Warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the Common-wealth at home, did choose certaine of their friends to sit in judgement in their steads, to determine controversies of Law, which were called Ephores, and did governe long time as the Kings Ministers; howbeit that afterwards by little and little, they tooke upon them absolute government by themselves. And for manifest proofe hereof, you see that at this present time when the Ephori do send for the King, the first and second time he refuseth to come, but the third time he riseth and goeth unto them. The first man that gave the Ephores this Authority, was Asteropus, one of the Ephores, many yeares after the first institution of the Kings: and yet if they had governed discreetly, peradventure they might have continued longer. But they licentiouslly abusing their Authority, by suppressing the lawfull Governours instituted of old time, taking upon them to banish some of their Kings, and putting other of them also to death, without Law and Iustice, and threatening others, that desire to restore that noble and former blessed Government unto SPARTA againe: all these things, I say, are in no wise to be suffered any longer. And therefore if it had bene possible to have banished all these plagues of the Common-wealth out of SPARTA, brought from foraine Nations (I meane, Pleasures, Pastimes, Money, Debts, and Usuries, and others yet more ancient, Poverty and Riches) he might then have esteemed himselfe the happiest King that ever was, if like a good Physician he had cured his Countrey in that infection, without griefe or sorrow. But in that he was constrained to begin with blood, he followed Lycurgus example, who being neither King nor other Magistrate, but a private Citizen onely, taking upon him the Authority of the King, boldly came into the Market-place with force and armed men, and made King Charilans that then reigned so afraid, that he was driven to take Sanctuary in one of the Temples. But the King being a Prince of a noble nature, and loving the honour of his Countrey, tooke part with Lycurgus, adding to, his advice and counsell, for the alteration of the state of the Government of the Common-wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus saw it was a hard thing to alter the Common-wealth without force and feare: the which he notwithstanding had used with as great modesty and discretion as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profit and wealth of LACEDÆMON, giving all the Lands of the Countrey also to be equally divided amongst them, and setting all men cleare that were in debt. And furthermore, that he would make a choice and proofe of the strangers, to make them free Citizens of SPARTA whom he knew to be honest men.

thereby to defend their City the better by force of Armes: to the end that from henceforth we may no more see our Countrey of LACONIA spoiled by the ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defend themselves against them. Then he began first himselfe to make all the goods common, and after him Megisthenes his Father-in-law, and consequently all his other friends. Then he caused the Land also to be divided, and ordained every banished man a part, whom he himselfe had exiled, promising that he would receive them againe into the City, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the Citizens of SPARTA, with the choicest honest men their neighbours, he made foure thousand Footmen well armed, and taught them to use their Pikes with both hands, instead of their Darts with one hand, and to carry their Targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he tooke order for the education of children, and to restore the ancient LACONIAN Discipline againe: and did all these things in manner by the helpe of Sphærus the Philosopher. Inasmuch as he had quickly set up againe Schoole-houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of diet: and all but a very few, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institution of life. Then because the name of one King should not offend any man, he made his Brother Euclidas King with him. But this was the first time that ever the two Kings were of one House: but then. Furthermore, understanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratus were of opinion, that he durst not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leave it in perill of revolting, because of the late change and alteration in the Common-wealth, he thought it an honourable attempt of him to make his Enemies see the readinesse and good will of his Army. Thereupon he invaded the Territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and booty, after he had done great hurt unto his Enemies. Then having taken certaine Players and Minstrels that came from MESSINA, he set up a stage within the Enemies Countrey, made a game of forty minas for the Victor, and sate a whole day to looke upon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the sight of it, but more to despight the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they to make such a maygame in their owne Countrey, in despight of them. For otherwise of all the Armies of the GRECIANS, or Kings in all GREECE, there was no Army but his onely, that was without Players, Minstrels, Fooles and Juglers: for his Campe onely was cleane of such rabble and foolery, and all the young men fell to some exercise of their bodies, and the old men also to teach them. And if they chanced to have any vacant time, then they would pleasantly be one merry with another, in giving some pretty fine mock after the LACONIAN manner. And what profit they got by that kinde of exercise, we have written it at large in Lycurgus Life. But of all these things, the King himselfe was their Schoolmaster and example, shewing himselfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curiosity, no more then any private Souldier of all his Campe: the which were great helpes unto him in his enterprises he made in GREECE. For the GRECIANS having cause of suite and negotiation with other Kings and Princes, did not wonder so much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhor and detest their pride and infolency: so disdainfully they would answer them that had to do with them. But contrarily when they went unto Cleomenes, who was a King in name and deed as they were, finding no purple Robes nor stately Mantles, nor rich imbroidered Beds, nor a Prince to be spoken to but by Messengers, Gentlemen-ushers, and supplications, and yet with a great ado: and seeing him also come plainly apparelled unto them, with a good countenance, and courteously answering the matters they came for: he thereby did marvellously win their hearts and good wills, that when they returned home, they said he onely was the worthy King that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his diet at his boord, that was very streight and LACONIAN-like, keeping onely three boords: and if he chanced to feast any Ambassadors or other his friends that came to see him, he then added to, two other boords; and besides made his men see that his fare should be amended, not with pastry and conserves, but with more store of meate, and some better wine then ordinary. For he one day reprov'd one of his friends, that bidding strangers to supper, he gave them nothing but black broth, and brown bread onely, according to the LACONIAN manner. Now, said he, we may not use strangers so hardly after our manner. The boord being taken up, another little Table was brought with three feet, whereupon they set a bowle of copper full of wine, and two silver cups of a pottle a piece, and certaine other few silver pots besides: so every man dranke what they list'd, and no man was forced to drinke more then he would. Furthermore, there was no sport, nor any pleasant song sung to make the company merry, for it needed not. For Cleomenes selfe would entertaine them with some pretty question or pleasant tale: whereby, as his talke was not severe and without pleasure, so was it also pleasant without infolency. For he was of opinion, that to win men by gifts or money, as other Kings and Princes did, was but base and clowne-like: but to seek their good wills by courteous meanes and pleasantnesse, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought most fit and honourable for a Prince. For this was his minde, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling, but that the one is won with Money, and the other with civility and good entertainment. The first therefore that received King Cleomenes into their City, were the MANTINEANS, who opened him the Gates in the night, and helping him to drive out the Garrison of the ACHAIANS, they yeilded themselves unto him. But he referring them to the use and government of their owne Laws and liberty, departed from thence the same day, and went unto the City of TEGEA. Shortly after he compassed about ARCADIA, and came unto PHERES in ARCADIA, determining one of the two, either to give the ACHAIANS Battell, or to bring Aratus out of favour with the People, for that he had suffered him to spoile and destroy their Countrey. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, but Aratus did beare all the sway and authority. Then the ACHAIANS coming into the Field with all their People

People armed, and encamping by the City of DYMES, neare unto the Temple of Hecatombaum, Cleomenes going thither, lay betwixt the City of DYMES that was against him, and the Campe of his Enemies; which men thought a very unwise part of him. Howbeit, valiantly provoking the ACHAIANS, he procured them to the Battell, overthrew them, made them flee, and slew a great number in the Field, and tooke many of them also prisoners. Departing from thence, he went and set upon the City of LANGON, and drave the Garrison of the ACHAIANS out of it, and restored the City againe unto the ELIANS. The ACHAIANS being then in very hard state, Aratus that of custome was wont to be their Generall (or at the least once in two yeares) refused now to take the charge, notwithstanding the ACHAIANS did specially pray and intreat him; the which was an ill act of him, to let another steere the rudder, in so dangerous a storme and tempest. Therefore the ACHAIANS sent Ambassadors unto Cleomenes to treat peace, unto whom it seemed he gave a very sharpe answer. After that, he sent unto them, and willed them onely to resigne the Seigniorie of GREECE unto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reasonably with them, and presently deliver them up their Townes and Prisoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The ACHAIANS being glad of peace with these conditions, wrote unto Cleomenes that he should come unto the City of LERNA, where the diet and generall assembly should be kept to consult thereon. It chanced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hot, dranke cold water, and fell on such a bleeding withall, that his voyce was taken from him, and he almost stifled. Wherefore he sent the ACHAIANS their chiefeest prisoners home againe, proroguing the Parliament till another time, and returned backe to LACEDÆMON. It is supposed certainly, that this lett of his coming to the diet, was the onely cause of the utter destruction of GREECE: the which otherwise was in good way to have risen againe, to have bene delivered from the present miseries, and extreme pride and covetousnesse of the MACEDONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he trusted not Cleomenes, or for that he was afraid of his power, or that he otherwise envied his honour and prosperity, to see him risen to such incredible greatnesse in so short a time; and thinking it also too great shame and dishonour to him, to suffer this young man in a moment to deprive him of his great honour and power, which he had possessed so long time, by the space of thirty yeares together, ruling all GREECE: first he sought by force to terrifie the ACHAIANS, and to make them breake off from this peace. But in fine, finding that they little regarded his threats, and that he could not prevail with them, for that they were afraid of Cleomenes valiantnesse and courage; whose request they thought unreasonable, for that he sought but to restore PELOPONNESUS unto her former ancient state againe: he fell then into a practise far unhoneest for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himselfe, but most dishonourable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GREECE, and in his age filled the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himselfe in his youth had driven thence, had taken from them the Castle of CORINTH, and had alwaies bene an enemy of the Kings: but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had spoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, saying that he tooke marvellous paines, and did put himselfe into many dangers, to deliver the City of ATHENS from the Garison of the MACEDONIANS. And yet notwithstanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his Countrey onely, but into his owne house, yea even into the Ladies chambers and closets: disdainning that the King of LACEDÆMON, descending of the blood-royall of Hercules (who setting up againe the ancient manner of life of his Countrey, did temper it as an instrument of musick out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient, and sober discipline, and DORICAN life instituted by Lycurgus) should be called and written King of the SYCYONIANS, and of the TRICCIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread, and with the plaine course caps of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefeest matter they did accuse Cleomenes for) and to provide for the poore, he went and put himselfe and all ACHAIAS unto the Crowne and Diadem, the purple robe, and proud imperious commandment of the MACEDONIANS, fearing lest men should thinke that Cleomenes could command him. Furthermore his folly was such, that having Garlands of Flowers on his head, he did sacrifice unto Antigonus, and sing Songs in praise of his honour, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man consumed away. This that we have written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, and a worthy GRECIAN) is not so much to accuse him, as to make us see the frailty and weaknesse of mans nature: the which, though it have never so excellent vertues, cannot yet bring forth such perfect fruit, but that it hath ever some maim and blemish. Now when the ACHAIANS were met againe in the City of ARGOS, to hold the Session of their Parliament before prorogued, and Cleomenes also being come from TEGEA, to be at that Parliament, every man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before on the chiefeest Articles of the Capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by faire words or force would grant the People to bring that he desired, sent to let him understand, that he should but come himselfe alone into the City, and for safety of his person, they would give him three hundred Hostages: or otherwise, if he would not leave his Army, that then they would give audience without the City, in the places of exercises, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their Answer, he told them they had done him great wrong: for they should have advertised him of it before he had taken his journey, and not now when he was almost hard at their Gates, to send him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereupon he wrote a Letter unto the Councill of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints against Aratus. On the other side also, Aratus in his Oration to the Councill, inveighed with bitter words against Cleomenes.

The Victory of Cleomenes against the Achæians.

There-

Thereupon Cleomenes departing with speed, sent an Herald to proclaim Wars against the ACHAÏANS, not in the City of ARGOS, but in the City of ÆGION (as Aratus writeth) meaning to let upon them being unprovided. Hereupon all ACHAÏA was in an uprore: for divers Cities did presently revolt against the ACHAÏANS, because the common People hoped after the division of Lands, and discharging of their debts. The Noblemen also in many places were offended with Aratus, because he practised to bring the MACEDONIANS into the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all these respects, brought his Army into ACHAÏA, and at his first coming tooke the City of PALLENA, and drave out the Garison of the ACHAÏANS: and after that, won also the Cities of PHENEUM and PENTELIUM. Now the ACHAÏANS fearing some treason in CORINTH and SICYONE, sent certaine Horsemen out of the City of ARGOS, to keep those Cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the Feast at the Games Nemea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to ARGOS, he should finde the City full of People that were come to see the Feasts and Games, and that assailing them upon the sudden, he should put them in a marvellous feare: brought his Army in the night hard to the walls of the City of ARGOS, and at his first coming was a place they call Aspis, a very strong place about the Theater, and ill to come unto. The ARGIVES were so amazed at it, that no man would take upon him to defend the City, but received Cleomenes Garison, and gave him twenty Hostages, promising thenceforth to be true Confederates unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, under his charge and conduct. The which doubtlesse was him great fame, and increased his power: for that the ancient Kings of LACEDÆMON, could never before with any policy or device, win the City of ARGOS. For King Pyrrhus one of the most valiantest and warlikest Princes that ever was, entering the City of ARGOS by force, could not keepe it, but was slaine there, and the most part of his Army: whereby every man wondered greatly at the diligence and counsell of Cleomenes. And where every man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes said that he would follow Solon and Lycurgus, in making the Citizens Goods common, and discharging all debts: they were then clearly perswaded, that he onely was the cause and meane of that great change which they saw in the courage of the SPARTANS, who were before so weake and out of heart, that they having no courage to defend themselves, the ÆTOLIANS entering LACONIA with an Army, tooke away at one time fifty thousand Slaves. Whereupon an old man of SPARTA pleasantly said at that time, that their Enemies had done them a great pleasure, to rid their Countrey of LACONIA of such a rabble of rascals. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former ancient Discipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus selfe had bene alive to have trained them unto it, they shewed themselves very valiant, and obedient also unto their Magistrates; whereby they recovered againe the commandement of all GREECE, and the Countrey also of PELOPONNESUS. After Cleomenes had taken the City of ARGOS, the Cities also of CLEONES and PHLIUNTH, did yeeld themselves unto him. Aratus in the meane time remained at CORINTH, and there did busily accuse them which were suspected to favour the LACEDÆMONIANS. But when newes was brought him that ARGOS was taken, and that he perceived also the City of CORINTH did leane unto Cleomenes part, and drave away the ACHAÏANS, he then calling the People to Councell in CORINTH, secretly stole to one of the Gates of the City, and causing his Horse to be brought unto him, tooke his backe, and galloped for life unto the City of SICYONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they tooke their Horse backs also, striving who should be there soonest, and posted in such haste unto Cleomenes at the City of ARGOS, that many of them (as Aratus writeth) killed their Horses by the way: howbeit Cleomenes was very much offended with them, for that they had let him scape their hands. But Aratus faith further, that Magistonus came to him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great summe of Money to deliver him the Castle of CORINTH, wherein there was a great Garison of the ACHAÏANS. But he answered againe, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was subject to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the City of ARGOS, overcame the TROEZONIANS, the EPIDAU-RIANS, and the HERMIONIANS. After that he came unto CORINTH, and presently intrenched the Castle there round about, and sending for Aratus friends and factors, commanded them to keep his house and goods carefully for him; and sent Trytimallus MESSINIAN againe unto him, to pray him to be contented that the Castle might be kept indifferently betwixt the ACHAÏANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, promising him privately to double the Pension that King Ptolomy gave him. But Aratus refusing it, sent his Sonne unto Antigonus with other Hostages, and perswaded the ACHAÏANS to deliver up the Castle of CORINTH into Antigonus hands. Cleomenes understanding it, entred with his Army into the Countrey of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus Goods and Money of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by Decree. Now Antigonus in the meane time being passed the Isthmus or the Straight of PELOPONNESUS, but the Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the Isthmus or the Straight of PELOPONNESUS, but the MOUNTAINES of the Mountaines of ONIENES; determining to keepe every one of them against the MACEDONIANS, with intent to consume them rather by time, then to fight a Battell with an Army to good Souldiers, and well trained as they were. Cleomenes following this determination, did put Antigonus to great trouble, because he had not in time provided for Corne, and could not win the passage by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with such Guard and Souldiers. Then Antigonus stealing secretly into the Haven of LEBCHÆUM, he was stoutly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereupon Cleomenes and his men being couragious for this Victory, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on the other side fell into despaire, to see him brought by necessity into such hard tearmes. Wherefore

The force of Lycurgus Laws

Wherefore he determined to go to the Temple of Juno, and from thence to passe his Army by Sea into the City of SICYONE, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the same night there came some of Aratus friends of the ARGIVES, who coming from ARGOS by Sea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practiser of this rebellion was one Aristoteles, who easily brought the People unto it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promised to passe a Law for the clearing of debts, but performed it not according to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thousand and five hundred men which Antigonus gave him, went by Sea unto EPIDAUROM. Howbeit Aristoteles tarried not his coming, but taking them of the City with him, went and besieged the Garison of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the Castle, being aided by Timosthenus, with the ACHAÏANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiving advertisement hereof, about the second Watch of the night, left for Megistonus in basse, and commanded him in anger speedily to go and aide their men that were in the City of ARGOS. For it was Megistonus himselfe that promised Cleomenes the fidelity of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driving them out of the City, which he suspected. So sending him away forthwith with two thousand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the CORINTHIANS the best he could: advertising them that it was but a little mutiny of a few, that chanced in the City of ARGOS. Megistonus being come to ARGOS, and slaine in Battell, fighting for the LACEDÆMONIANS in Garison there (who being in great distresse, and scant able to keepe the Castle against the Enemies) sent sundry Messengers unto Cleomenes, to pray him to send them immediate aide. Cleomenes then being afraid that the Enemies having taken ARGOS, would stop his way to returne backe into his Countrey, who having opportunity safely to spoile LACONIA, and also to besiege the City selfe of SPARTA that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his Army from CORINTH. Immediately after came Antigonus and tooke it from him, and put a strong Garison into it. When Cleomenes came before the City of ARGOS, he scaled the Walls, and breaking the Vaults and Arches of the place called Aspis, entred into the City, and joyned with his Garison there, which yet resisted the ACHAÏANS: and taking other parts of the same also, assaulted the Walls, and cleared the streetes in such sort, that not an Enemy durst be seene, for feare of the Archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he saw Antigonus as farre off, coming downe the hills into the Valley with his Footmen, and that his Horsemen also came upon the spur into the City, despairing then that he could any longer keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and safely going downe by the Walls, retired without losse of any man. So, when in short time he had conquered much, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESUS, in shorter space also he lost all againe. For, of the Confederates that were in his Campe, some did presently forsake him, others also immediately after surrendered up the Townes unto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppressed with the fortune of Warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his Army, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieved him as much as the losse of all his Conquests: for he was advertised of the death of his Wife Agis, whom he loved so dearly, that in the midst of his chiefest prosperity and Victories, he made often journeys to SPARTA to see her. It could not be but a marvellous griefe unto Cleomenes, who being a young man, had lost so vertuous and faire a young Lady, so dearly beloved of him; and yet he gave not place to his sorrow, neither did griefe overcome his noble courage, but he used the selfe same voice, apparell, and countenance that he did before. Then taking order with his private Captaines about his Affaires, and having provided also for the safety of the TEGEANS, he went the next morning by breake of day unto SPARTA. After he had privately lamented and sorrowed for his Wives death, with his Mother and Children, he presently bent his minde againe to publicke Causes. Now Cleomenes had sent unto Ptolomy King of EGYPT, who had promised him aide, but upon demand, to have his Mother and Children in pledge. So he was long time before he would for shame make his Mother privie unto it, and went oftentimes of purpose to let her understand it: but when he came, he had not the heart to breake it to her. She first suspecting the thing, asked Cleomenes friends, if her Sonne had not somewhat to say unto her, that he durst not utter. Whereupon, in fine he gave the venture, and brake the matter to her. When she heard it, she fell a laughing, and told him: Why, how cometh it to passe, that thou hast kept it thus long, and wouldst not tell me? Come, come, said she, put me straight into a Ship, and send me whither thou wilt, that this body of mine may do some good unto my Countrey, before trooked age consume my life without profit. Then all things being prepared for their journey, they went by Land, accompanied with the Army, unto the head of Tanarus: where Crasidela being ready to imbarque, she tooke Cleomenes aside into the Temple of Neptune, and imbrating and kissing him, perceiving that his heart yearned for sorrow of her departure, she said unto him: O King of LACEDÆMON, let no man see for shame when we come out of the Temple, that we have wept and dishonoured SPARTA: for that onely is in our power; as for the rest, as it pleaseth the gods so let it be. When she had spoken these words, and fashioned her countenance againe, she went then to take her Shippe with a little Sonne of Cleomenes, and commanded the Master of the Shippe to hoist a flagge. Now when she was arrived in EGYPT, and undertook that King Ptolomy received Cleomenes being requested by the ACHAÏANS to make Peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and end that Warre, without King Ptolomy consent, and because of his Mother: she wrote unto him, that he should not spare to do any thing that should be expedient for the honour of SPARTA, without without feare of displeasing Proton, or for regard of an old woman, and a young boy: Such was the noble minde of this worthy Lady in her Sonne Cleomenes adversity. Furthermore, Antigonus having taken the City of TAGEA, and sacked the other Cities of ORCHOMENE and MANTINEA, Cleomenes seeing himselfe brought to defend the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumitt all the LOTES (which were the Slaves of LACEDÆMON) paying five Attica Mina's a man. With that Money he made the summe of five hundred Talents, and armed two thousand of these freed Slaves after the MACEDONIAN fashion, to fight against the LEUCASPIDES (to wit, the white Shields of Antigonus;) and then there fell into his hands a marvellous great enterprize, unlooked for of every man. The City of MEGALIPOLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, and having the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand (whom the ACHAIANS as it seemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALIPOLITANS) Cleomenes determining to sacke this City, and knowing that to bring it to passe, nothing was more requisite then celerity, he commanded his Souldiers to victual themselves for five daies: and marching with the choice of all his Army towards SELACIA, as though he had meant to have spoiled the ARGIVES, suddenly turning from thence, he invaded the Countrey of the MEGALIPOLITANS; and supping by ROETUM, went straight by ELICUNTA unto the City. When he was come neare unto it, he sent Panteas before with speed, with two Bands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commanded him to take a certaine piece of the Wall betwene two Towers, which he knew was not kept nor guarded; and he followed him also with the rest of his Army, coming on faire and softly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the Wall without Guard or Watch which Cleomenes had told him of, but also the most part of that side without defence, he tooke some part of the Wall at his first coming, and manned it: and overthrew another place of it also, putting them all to the Sword that did defend it: and then came Cleomenes, and was within the City with his Army, before the MEGALIPOLITANS knew of his coming. At length, the Citizens understanding that the City was taken, some fled in haste, conveying such light things as came to hand, in so great a feare: and the others also arming themselves, ran together to resist the Enemies: but though they valiantly fought to repulse them out of the City, and yet prevailed not, they gave the rest leisure thereby to flie and save themselves, so that there remained not behinde above five thousand men: for all the rest were fled with their Wives and Children, into the City of MESSINA. The most part of them also that fought with the Enemies, saved themselves, and very few were taken, the chiefest whereof were Lysandridas and Thearidas, the noblest persons that were amongst the MEGALIPOLITANS; wherefore when the Souldiers had taken them, they brought them unto Cleomenes. Lysandridas when he saw Cleomenes a good way off, cried out aloud unto him: O King of LACEDÆMON, this day thou hast an occasion offered thee to do a more famous Princely act, then that which thou hast already done, and that will make thy Name also more glorious. Cleomenes musing what he would request: Well (quoth he) what is that thou requirest? One thing I will tell thee before-hand, thou shalt not make me restore your City to you againe. Yet, quoth Lysandridas, let me request thus much then, that ye do not destroy it, but rather replenish it with friends and confederates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you do, giving the MEGALIPOLITANS their City againe, and preserving such a number of People as have forsaken it. Cleomenes pausing a while, answered, It was a hard thing to believe that: but yet, quoth he, let Honour take place with us before profit. After that he sent an Herald straight unto MESSINA, unto them that were fled thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their City againe, so that they would become good friends and confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, forsaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopemen would by no means suffer the MEGALIPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leave their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he meant not to give them their City againe, but to take them also with their City: and therefore drave Thearidas and Lysandridas out of MESSINA, that moved this practice. It was that Philopemen that afterwards was the chiefest man of the ACHAIANS, and that wanne such Fame and honour amongst the GRECIANS, as we have particularly declared in his Life. This word being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the City from spoiling untill that time, he was then so thoroughly offended, that he gave the Goods in prey to the Souldiers, sent away their goodly Tables, Images, and Pictures unto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefest parts of the City, and then returned home againe, being afraid of Antigonus and the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they stirred not, because of the Parliament that was kept at that time in the City of ÆGIUM; where Aratus being in the Pulpit for Orations, and holding his Gowne a long time before his face, the People marvelling at it, willed him to tell what he ailed: he answered them: MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and razed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the suddennesse of this great losse, straight brake off their Parliament and Assembly. But Antigonus thinking to aide them, sent presently for all his Garisons, who being long a coming, he willed them to stay where they were, and he himselfe taking a few Souldiers with him, went unto the City of ARGOS. Therefore the second enterprize of Cleomenes seemeth at the first fight a very rash and desperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wisdom and policy. For Cleomenes understanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in Garisons in divers places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the City of ARGOS, with a certaine number of Footmen that were strangers, he invaded the Countrey of the ARGIVES with his Army, perswading himselfe, that either Antigonus would for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he should put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which indeed came so to passe.

Cleomenes was the City of Megalopolis.

Cleomenes noble saying.

Cleomenes razed the City of Megalopolis.

Cleomenes stratagem.

The ARGIVES seeing their Countrey spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a marvellous rage, and gathering together at Antigonus Lodging, they cried out unto him, either to go into the Field and fight with the Enemy: or else if he were afraid, to resigne his Office of Generall of GREECE unto others that were valianter then himselfe. But Antigonus like a wife and excellent Captaine, thinking it a dishonour to him, rashly to put himselfe in danger, and his friends also, though he were provoked with many injuries and opprobrious words, would not go into the Field, but stood constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes having brought his Army hard to the Walls of the City of ARGOS, and spoiled and destroyed the Countrey round about, without lett or danger he safely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes being advertised that Antigonus was come unto TAGEA, with intent to invade the Countrey of LACONIA, he going another way with his Army (unwitting to his Enemies) they wondered when they saw him in the morning by the City of ARGOS, spoiling their Countrey, and cutting downe their Corne, not with Sickles or Swords, as others do use, but with long Poles in forme of Sithes, wherewith the Souldiers as they went sporting-wise, overthrew and spoiled it. But when they came to the place of Exercises in the Suburbs, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the Souldiers going about to have set it on fire, Cleomenes would not suffer them; and told them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestly done. Now Antigonus presently returned backe againe, being minded first to have gone directly to the City of ARGOS, but suddenly altering his minde, did campe upon the top of Hills and Mountains. Cleomenes seeming not to be afraid of him, sent Heraulds to him to desire the keyes of the Temple of Juno, and then after he had done Sacrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had sacrificed unto the goddesse, under the Temple that was shut up, he sent his Army unto PHLIUNTA; and having driven away the Garison out of OLOGUNTA, he came unto the City of ORCHOMENE, having not onely encouraged his Citizens, but gotten even amongst the Enemies themselves, a fame also to be a noble Captaine, and worthy to manage great affaires. For every man judged him to be a skilfull Souldier, and a valiant Captaine, that with the power of one onely City, did maintaine Warre against the Kingdome of MACEDON, against all the People of PELOPONNESUS, and against the Treasure of so great a King: and withall, not onely to keepe his owne Countrey of LACONIA unfoiled, but far otherwise to hurt his Enemies Countreys, and to take so many great Cities of theirs. But he that first said, that Money was the finew of all things, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the Warres. Demades the Oratour said on a time, when the ATHENIANS commanded certaine Gallies should be put out of the Arsenall into the Sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked Money: He that rules the Prowe, must first see before him: meaning, Munition and Victuals must be provided, before the Ships be set out. And it is reported also, that the ancient Archidamus, when the Confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS at the beginning of the Warre of PELOPONNESUS required, that they might be sessed at a certaine rate, answered: The charges of Warre have no certaine stint. For like as Wrestlers that exercise their bodies continually in Games, are better able to Wrestle, and overthrow them with time, that have no strength but onely art and sleight: even so King Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his Kingdome defrayed the charge of this Warre, did weary and overcome Cleomenes at the length, because he lacked Money, both to pay the strangers that served him, and also to maintaine his owne Citizens. For otherwise doubtlesse the time served his turne well, because the troubles that fell upon Antigonus in his Realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous People his Neighbour, in his absence did spoile and destroy the Realme of MACEDON, and specially the ILLYRIANS of the high Countrey, that came downe then with a great Army: whereupon the MACEDONIANS being spoiled and harried on all sides by them, they sent post unto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these Letters had bene brought him but a little before the Battell, as they came afterwards, Antigonus had gone his way, and left the ACHAIANS. But Fortune that alwaies striketh the stroke in all weightiest Causes, gave such speed and favour unto him, that immediately after the Battell was fought at SELASTIA (where Cleomenes lost his Army and City) the very Messengers arrived that came for Antigonus to come home: the which made the overthrow of King Cleomenes so much more lamentable. For if he had delayed Battell but two daies longer, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might have made what Peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of Money, he was driven (as Polybius writeth) to give Battell with twenty thousand men against thirty thousand: where he shewed himselfe an excellent, and skilfull Captaine, and where his Citizens also fought like valiant men; and the strangers in like case did shew themselves good Souldiers. But his onely overthrow was by the manner of his Enemies Weapons, and the force of their Battell of Footmen. But Phylarchus writeth, that Treason was the cause of his overthrow. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS, which he had in his Army, to scale upon the Wing of his Enemies Army, where Eucidas, King Cleomenes Brother was, to compass him in behinde, whilst he did set the rest of his men in Battell. When Cleomenes was got up upon some hill to looke about him, to see the countenance of the Enemy, and seeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS, he was then afraid of Antigonus, that he went about some stratagem of Warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heed of Scratagens and secret Ambushes, and commanded him to looke to the Rere-ward of his Army, and to be very circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with Money, told him that all was cleare in the Rere-ward, and bade him looke to overthrow his Enemies before him. Cleomenes trusting this report, set forward against against Antigonus, and in the end, his Citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gave such a fierce Charge upon the Squadron of the MACEDONIAN Footmen, that they drave them backe five Furlongs off. But in the meane time, Euclidas his Brother, in the other Wing of his Army, being compassed in behinde, Cleomenes turning him backe, and seeing the overthrow, cried out aloud: "Alas good Brother, thou art but slaine, yet thou diest valiantly, and honestly, and thy death shall be a worthy example unto all posterity, and shall be sung by the praises of the women of SPARTA. So Euclidas and his men being slaine, the Enemies came straight to set upon Cleomenes Wing. Cleomenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer resist the Enemies, fled, and saved himselfe. Many of the strangers also that served him, were slaine at this Battell: and of sixe thousand SPARTANS, there were left alive but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned unto SPARTA, the Citizens coming to see him, he gave them counsell to yeeld themselves unto Antigonus the Conquerour: and for himselfe, if either alive or dead he could do any thing for the honour and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly do it. The Women of the City also coming unto them that flying had escaped with him, when he saw them unarme the men, and bring them drinke to refresh them with, he also went home to his owne house. Then a Maid of the House, which he had taken in the City of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertaigned ever since the death of his Wife) came unto him as her manner was, to refresh him coming hot from the Battell: howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame dry, nor sit being very weary, but armed as he was, laid his arme across upon a pillar, and leaning his head upon it, reposed himselfe a litle: and casting in his minde all the waies that were to be thought of, he tooke his friends with him, and went to the Haven of Gythium, and there having his Ships which he had appointed for the purpose, he hoisted saile, and departed his way. Immediately after his departure, came Antigonus into the City of SPARTA, and courteously entreated the Citizens and Inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly despise the ancient Honour and Dignity of SPARTA, but referring them to their owne Lawes and Government: when he had sacrificed to the gods for his Victory, he departed from thence the third day, newes being brought him that the Warre was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous People did spoile his Countrey. Now a disease tooke him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared a Tifick, mixt with a fore Catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his Disease, and bare it out, that fighting for his Countrey, and obtaining a famous Victory, with great slaughter of the barbarous People, he might yet die honourably; as indeed he did, by Philarchus testimony, who saith, that with the force of his voice fiercely crying out in the midst of his fight, he tare his lungs and lights, worse then they were before. Yet in the Schooles it is said, that after he had wonne the Battell, he was so joyfull of it, that crying out: O blessed day, he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great Feaver tooke him withall, that he died of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Ile of CYTHERA, went and cast Anker in another Island, called EGYPTIA. Then determining to saile over to the City of CYRENA, Therjcion, one of Cleomenes friends (a man that in Warres shewed himselfe very valiant, but a boaster besides of his owne doings) tooke Cleomenes aside, and said thus unto him: "Truly, O King, we have lost an honourable occasion to die in Battell, though every man hath heard us vaunt and say, that Antigonus should never overcome the King of SPARTA alive, but dead. A second occasion yet is afforded us to die, with much lesse honour and fame notwithstanding then the first. Whether do we saile to no purpose? Why do we flee the death at hand, and seeke it so far off? If it be no shame nor dishonour for the Posterity and Race of Hercules to serve the Successors of Philip and Alexander, let us save then our labour, and long dangerous sailing, and go yeeld our selves unto Antigonus: who in likelihood will better use us then Protemy, because the MACEDONIANS are far more noble persons then the EGYPTIANS. And if we disdain to be commanded by them which have overcome us in Battell, why then will we make him Lord of us that hath not overcome us: in stead of one, to make us inferiour unto both, flying Antigonus, and serving King Protemy? Can we say that we go into EGYPT, in respect to see your Mother there? A joyfull sight no doubt, when we shall shew King Protemy Wives her Sonne, that before was a King, a Prisoner, and Fugitive now. Were it not better for us, that having yet LACONIA our Countrey in sight, and our Swords besides in our owne hands, to deliver us from this great misery, and so doing to excuse our selves with them that are slaine at SELASIA for defence of SPARTA: then cowardly losing our time in EGYPT, to enquire whom Antigonus left his Lieutenant and Governour in LACEDAMON? Therjcion ending his Oration, Cleomenes answered him thus: "Doe'st thou thinke it a glory to thee to seeke death, which is the easiest matter, and the presentest unto any man, that can be: and yet wretch that thou art, thou fliest now more cowardly and shamefully then from the Battell. For divers valiant men, and far better then our selves, have often yeelded unto their Enemies, either by some misfortune, or compelled by greater number, and multitude of men: but he, say I, that submitteth himselfe unto paine and misery, or to reproach and praise of men, he cannot but confesse that he is overcome by his owne unhappinesse. For when a man will willingly kill himselfe, he must not do it to be rid of paines and labour, but it must have an honourable respect and action. For to live or die for his owne respect, that cannot but be dishonourable: the which now thou persuadest me unto, to make me flee this present misery we are in, without any honour or profit in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we should not yet cast off the hope, we have to serve our Countrey in time to come: but when all hope faileth us, then we may easily make our selves away when we list. Thereunto Therjcion gave no answer, but as soon as he found opportunity to slip from Cleomenes, he went to the Sea side, and flew himselfe. Cleomenes hoisting saile from the Ile of EGYPTIA, went into AFRICKE, and was brought by the Kings Servants unto the City of ALEXANDRIA. King Protemy at his first coming, gave Cleomenes no speciall good, but indifferent intertainment: but after that he had shewed himselfe to be of great wisdom and judgement, and that Protemy saw the simplicity of his LACONIAN life, he had also a noble disposition and courage, nothing degenerating from the Princely Race and Bloud of Hercules, and that he yeelded not to his adversity, he tooke more delight in his company then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly that he had made no more account of him before, but had suffered him to be overthrown by Antigonus, who through this Victory of him, had marvellously enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honour as could be, promised that he would send him with Ships and Money into GREECE, and put him againe into his Kingdome: and further, gave him an annual Pension in the meane time, of foure and twenty Talents, with the which he simply and soberly entertained himselfe and his men about him: and bestowed all the rest upon his Countrey men that came out of GREECE into EGYPT. But now old King Protemy deceassing before he could performe the promise he made unto Cleomenes, to send him into GREECE, the Realme falling then into great lasciviousnesse, drunkennesse, and into the Government of Women, his case and misery was cleane forgotten. For the young King his Son was so given over to Women and Wine, that when he was most sober and in his best wits, he most disposed himselfe to make Feasts and Sacrifices, and to have the Taber playing in his Court, to gather People together, like a Stage-player or Jugler; whilst one Agathocles his Lemman, and her Mother, and Oenanthes a Baud, did rule all the Affaires of the State. But when he came to be King, it appeared he had need of Cleomenes: because he was afraid of his Brother Magas, who by his Mothers meanes, was very well esteemed of among Souldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his Privy-Councell, where he devised by practise, which way to kill his Brother. All other his friends that were of counsell with him, did counsell him to do it: but Cleomenes onely vehemently dissuaded him from it, and told him, that if it were possible, rather more Brethren should be begotten unto the King for the safety of his Person, and for dividing of the Affaires of the Kingdome between them. Amongst the Kings Familiars that were chiefest about him, there was one Sosibius that said unto Cleomenes: So long as his Brother Magas lived, the Souldiers that be strangers whom the King entertained, would never be true to him. Cleomenes answered him for that matter there was no danger: for, saith he, of those hired strangers, there are three thousand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knew at the twinkling of an eye would be at his commandement, to come with their Armour and Weapons where he would appoint them. These words of Cleomenes at that time shewed his faith and good-will he bare unto the King, and the force he was of besides. But afterwards, Protemy tearfullnesse increasing his mistrust, (as it commonly happeneth, that they that lack wit, thinke it the best safety to be fearefull of every wagging of a straw, and to mistrust every man) the remembrance of Cleomenes words made him much suspected of the Courtiers, understanding that he could doe so much with the Souldiers that were strangers: in somuch as some of them said: See (meaning Cleomenes) there is a Lyon amongst Sheepe. Indeed considering his fashions and behaviour, they might well say so of him: for he would looke through his fingers as though he saw nothing, and yet saw all what they did. In fine, he required an Army and Ships of the King: and understanding also that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIANS and ETOLIANS were at great Warres together, and that the Affaires of his Countrey did call him home, all PELOPONNESUS being in armes and uproare, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But never a man would give care unto him, and the King also heard nothing of it, because he was continually entertained among Ladies, with Banquets, Dancing, and Maskes. But Sosibius that ruled all the Realm, thought, that to keepe Cleomenes against his will, were a hard thing, and also dangerous: and to let him go also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a stirring minde, and one that knew the Vices and Imperfections of their Government, he thought that also no safe way, with no Gifts nor Presents that could be offered him, could soften him. For as the holy Bull (which they call in EGYPT, Apis) that is full fed in goodly Pasture, doth yet desire to follow his naturall course and liberty, to runne and leape at his pleasure, and plainly sheweth, that it is a griefe to him to be kept still by the Priest: even so the courtly pleasures did nothing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

When Martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked best.

Now Cleomenes standing in these termes, there arrived in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras MESSENIAN, who maliced Cleomenes in his heart, but yet shewed as though he loved him. This Nicagoras on a time had sold Cleomenes certaine Land, but was not paid for it, either because he had no present Money, or else by occasion of the Warres which gave him no leisure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chance walking upon the Sands, he saw Nicagoras landing out of his Ship, being newly arrived; and knowing him, he courteously welcomed him, and asked what winde had brought him into EGYPT. Nicagoras gently saluting him againe, told him, that he had brought the King excellent Horses of Service. Cleomenes smiling, told him, Thou hadst been better have brought him some Curtizans and Dancers, for they would have pleased the King better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his answer, but within few daies after he did put him in remembrance of the Land he sold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to Money, telling him that he would not have preit him for it, but that he had sustained losse by Merchandise. Cleomenes answered him, that all his Pension was spent he had of the King. Nicagoras being offended with this answer, he went and told Sofibius of the mocke Cleomenes gave the King. Sofibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the King offended with Cleomenes, he perswaded Nicagoras to write a Letter to the King against Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the City of CYRENA, if the King had given him Ships, Money, and men of Warre. When Nicagoras had written this Letter, he took Ship, and hoised saile. Foure daies after his departure, Sofibius brought his Letter to the King, as though he had but newly received it. The King upon sight of it, was so offended with Cleomenes, that he gave present order he should be shut up in a great house, where he should have his ordinary diet allowed him, howbeit that he should keep his house. This grieved Cleomenes much, but yet he was worse afraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the Son of Chryfermus, one of the Kings familiars, who had oftentimes before been very converfent and familiar with Cleomenes, and did frankly talke together in all matters, Cleomenes one day sent for him, to pray him to come unto him. Ptolomy came at his request, and familiarly discourfing together, went about to dissuade him from all the fufpitions he had, and excused the King also for that he had done unto him: so taking his leave he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the Gate; where he sharply took up the Souldiers, saying that they were very negligent and carelesse in looking to such a fearefull beast as he was, and so ill to be taken if he once icaped their hands. Cleomenes heard what he said, and went to his lodging again, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very words again unto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS converting their good hope into anger, determined to be revenged of the injury Ptolomy had done them, and to die like noble SPARTANS, not tarrying till they should be brought to the shambles like fat Weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonour unto Cleomenes, having refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and Warriour, to tarry the Kings pleasure till he had left his drunkenness and dancing, and then to come and put him to death. They being full resolved hereof, as you have heard, King Ptolomy by chance went unto the City of CANOBUS, and first they gave out in ALEXANDRIA, that the King minded to set Cleomenes at liberty. Then Cleomenes friends observing the custome of the Kings of EGYPT, when they meant to set a Prisoner at liberty (which was, to fend the Prisoners meat, and Presents before to their Supper) did fend unto him such manner of Presents and so deceived the Souldiers that had the keeping of him, saying, that they brought those Presents from the King. For Cleomenes himselfe did sacrifice unto the gods, and sent unto the Souldiers that kept him, part of those Presents that were sent unto him, and supping with his friends that night, made merry with them, every man being crowned with Garlands. Some say, that he made the more haft to execute his Enterprife sooner then he would have done, by meanes of one of his men that was privy unto his conspiracy: who went every night to lie with a Woman he kept, and therefore was afraid lest he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noon, perceiving the Souldiers had taken in their Cups, and that they were asleep, he put on his Coate, and unripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his Sword drawn in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that sort, which were thirty in all. Amongst them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very lively out with them at the first: but when he saw they went faire and softly because of him, he prayed them to kill him, because they should not hinder their Enterprife for a lame man, that could do them no service. Notwithstanding, by chance they met wit a Towns-man a horse-backe, that came hard by their doore, whom they pluckt from his Horse, and cast Hippotas upon him: and then ran through the City, and cried to the People, Liberty, liberty. Now the People had no other courage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondered at his valiantness: but otherwise to follow him, or to further his Enterprife, not a man of them had any heart in them. Thus running up and down the Town, they met with Ptolomy (the same whom we said before was the Son of Chryfermus) as he came out of the Court: whereupon three of them setting on him, slew him presently. There was also another Ptolomy that was Governour and Lieutenant of the City of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumour of this stir, came unto them in his Coach. They went and met him, and first having driven away his Guard and Souldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his Coach, and slew him also. After that they went towards the Castle, with intent to set all the Prisoners there at liberty to take their part. Howbeit the Jaylors that kept them had so strongly locked up the Prison doores, that Cleomenes was repulst and put by his purpose. Thus wandering up and downe the City, no man neither came to joyne with him, nor to resist him, for every man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going up and down, he turned him to his friends, and said unto them: It is no marvell though Women command such a cowardly People, that fly in this sort from their liberty. Thereupon he prayed them all to die like men, and like those that were brought up with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his so noble deeds. Then the first man that made himselfe be slaine, was Hippotas, who died of a wound one of the young men of his company gave him with a Sword at his request. After him every man slew themselves, one after another, without any feare at all, saving Panteas, who was the first man that entred the City of MEGALY-POLIS. He was a faire young man, and had been very well brought up in the LACONIAN Discipline, and better then any of his yeares. Cleomenes did love him dearely, and commanded him that when he should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill himselfe last of all. Now they all being laid on the ground, he searched them one after another with the point point of his Sword, to see if there were any of them yet left alive: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongst others, and saw that he did yet knit his browes, he kissed him, and fate down by him. Then perceiving that he had yeelded up the ghost, embracing him when he was dead, he also slew himselfe, and fell upon him. Thus Cleomenes having reigned King of SPARTA sixteen yeares, being the same manner of man we have described him to be, he ended his daies in this sort as ye hear. Now his death being presently bruited through the City, Cratesiclea his Mother, though otherwise she had a noble minde, did notwithstanding a little forget her greatnesse, through the extreme sorrow she felt for the death of her Son: and so embracing Cleomenes Sons, she fell to bitter lamentation. But the Eldest of his Sons (no man mistrusting any such matter) found meanes to get out of her hands, and running up to the top of the house, cast himselfe headlong down to the ground, that his head was all broken and splitted; yet died not, but was taken up crying, and angry with them, that they would not suffer him to die. This newes being brought to King Ptolomy, he commanded they should first flea Cleomenes, and then hang up his Body, and also that they should put his Children, his Mother, and all her Women waiting on her to death, among the which was Panteas Wife, one of the fairest and courtesoulest Women in her time. They had not been long married before, when these mischiefs lighted upon them, at what what time their love was then in greatest force. Her Parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her Husband, but had locked her up, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit, shortly after she found the meanes to get her a Horse, and some Money, and stole away in the night, and galloped towards the Haven of Tarnarus; where finding a Ship ready bound for EGYPT, she imbarked and went to seeke her Husband, with whom she gladly and lovingly led her life, forsaking her own Countrey, to live in a strange Realm. Now when the Sergeants came to take Cratesiclea to put her to death, Panteas Wife led her by the arme, carrying up her traine, and did comfort her; although Cratesiclea otherwise was not afraid to die, but onely asked this favour, that she might die before her little Children. This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the Hangman first slew her Children before her eyes, and then her selfe afterwards, who in such great grief and sorrow, said no more but thus: Alas my poor Children, what is become of you? And Panteas Wife also, being a mighty tall Woman, girding her cloathes to her, tooke up the slaine bodies one after another, and wrapped them up in such things as she could get, speaking never a word, nor shewing any signe or token of griefe. And in fine, having prepared her selfe to die, and plucked off her Attire her selfe, without suffering any other to come near her, or to see her, but the Hangman that was appointed to strike off her head, in this sort she died as constantly, as the stoutest man living could have done; and had so covered her Body, that no man needed after her death to touch her, so carefull was she to her end, to keep her honesty, which she had alwaies kept in her life: and in her death was mindfull of her honour, wherewith she decked her Body in her life time. Thus these LACEDÆMONIAN Ladies playing their parts in this pitifull Tragedy, contending at the time of death, even with the courage of the slain SPARTANS their Countreyemen, which of them should die most constantly, left a manifest proof and testimony, that fortune hath no power over fortitude and courage. Shortly after, those that were appointed to keepe the Body of King Cleomenes that hung upon the Crosse, they spied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that covered all his face, inso much as no ravening Fowl durst come near him to eate of it: whereupon the King fell into a superstitious fear, being afraid that he had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his Court began to make many Sacrifices of purification, for the clearing of this sinne: perswading themselves, that they had put a man to death beloved of the gods, and that he had something more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRIANS thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers unto Cleomenes, as unto a demy-god, calling him the Son of the gods: untill that the Learned-men brought them from that error, declaring unto them, that like as of Oxen being dead and rotten there breed Bees, and of Horse also come Waspes, and of Asses likewise Bettels: even so mens Bodies when the marrow melteth and gathereth together, do bring forth Serpents. The which coming to the knowledge of the Ancients in old time, of all other Beasts they did consecrate the Dragon to Kings and Princes, as proper unto Man.

NOW that we have declared unto you the History of the Lives of these two GRECIANS, Agis and Cleomenes aforesaid, we must also write the History of two ROMANES; the which is no lesse lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced unto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the Sonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He having been twice Consull, and once Censor, and having had the Honour of two Triumphes; had notwithstanding more Honour and Fame onely for his Valiantnesse, for the which he was thought worthy to marry with Cornelia, the Daughter of Scipio, who overcame Hannibal after the death of his Father: though while he lived he was never his Friend, but rather his Enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a time found two Snakes in his Bed, and that the Soothsayers and Wifards having considered the signification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and also to let them both escape, but one onely: assuring him that if he killed the Male he should not live long after; and if he killed the Female, that then his Wife Cornelia should die. Tiberius then loving his Wife dearly, thinking it meet for him also, that he being the elder of both, and she yet a young Woman, should die before her, he slew the Male, and let the Female escape; howbeit he died soon after, leaving twelve Children alive, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her Husband, taking upon her the rule of her House and Children, led such a chaste life, was so good to her Children, and of so noble a minde, that every man thought Tiberius a wife man for that he died, and left her behinde him. She remaining Widow, King Ptolemy made suite unto her, and would have made her his Wife and Queene: but she refused, and in her Widow-hood lost all her Children, but one Daughter (whom she bestowed upon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whose Lives we presently write. Those she carefully brought up, that they being become more civill, and better conditioned then any other ROMANES in their time, every man judged, that Education prevailed more in them then Nature. For, as in the favours and Pictures of Castor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference discerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for Wrestling, and the other for Running; even so between these two young Brethren, amongst other the great likeness between them, being both happily borne to be Valiant, to be Temperate, to be Liberal, to be Learned, and to be Nobly-minded, there grew notwithstanding great difference in their actions and doings in the Common-wealth, the which I thinke convenient to declare, before I proceed any further. First of all, for the favour of the Face, the looke and moving of the Body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Caius more hot and earnest. For the first in his Orations was very modest, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMANES was the first that in his Oration jetted up and down the Pulpit, and that plucked his Gown over his shoulders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the first of all Oratours that opened his Gowne, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his Oration. Furthermore, Caius words, and the vehemency of his perswasion, were terrible and full of passion; but Tiberius words in contrary manner, were mild, moved men more to compassion, being very proper, and excellently applied; where Caius words were full of fineness and curiosity. The like difference rence also was between them in their Fare and Diet. For Tiberius alwaies kept a convenient Ordinary: and Caius also in respect of other ROMANES, lived very temperately; but in respect of his Brothers Fare, curiously and superfluously. Inasmuch as Drusus on a time reproved him, because he had bought certaine Dolphins of Silver, to the value of a thousand two hundred and fifty Drachmaes for every Pound weight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall disposition of them both agreeing with the diversity of their Tongues, the one being mild and plausible, and the other hot and cholerick: inasmuch that otherwhile forgetting himselfe in his Oration, against his will he would be very earnest and straine his voice beyond his compasse, and so with great uncomeliness confound his words. Yet finding his own fault, he devised this remedy. He had a Servant called Lucinius, a goodwife man, who with an Instrument of Musick he had, by the which they teach men to rise and fall in their Tunes, when he was in his Oration, he ever stood behinde him; and when he perceived that his Masters Voice was a little too loud, and that through choler he exceeded his ordinary speech, he played a soft stop behind him, at the sound whereof Caius immediately fell from his extremitie, and easily came to himselfe againe. And here was the diversity between them. Otherwise, for their hardnesse against their Enemies, justice unto their Tenants, the care and paines in their Offices of Charge, and also their continency against voluptuousnesse, in all these they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nine yeares, by reason whereof their severall authority and doings in the Common-wealth fell out at sundry times. And this was one of the chiefest causes why their doings prospered not, because they had not both authority in one self-time, neither could they joyne their power together: the which if it had met at one self-time, had been of great force, and peradventure invincible. Wherefore we must write particularly of them both, but first of all we must begin with the Elder. He, when he came to mans state, had such a name and estimation, that immediately they made him fellow in the Colledge of the Priests, which at ROMA are called Augures (being those that have the charge to consider of Signes and Preditions of things to come) more for his Valiantnesse then for Nobility. The same doth Appian Clodius witnesse unto us, one that hath been both Consull and Censor, and also Praesident of the Senate, and of greater authority then any man in his time. This Appian at a Supper when all the Augures were together; after he had saluted Tiberius, and made very much of him, he offered him his Daughter in marriage: Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and therewithall the marriage was presently concluded between them. Thereupon Appian coming home to his house, at the threshold of his Door he called aloud for his Wife, and told her: Antistia, I have bestowed our Daughter Clodia. She wondering at it, O gods said she, and what needed all this haste? what couldst thou have done more, if thou haddest gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her Husband? I know that some refer this History unto Tiberius, Father of these men we write of, and unto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the most part of Writers agree with that we write at this present. And Polybius himselfe also writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friends being met together, they chose Tiberius before all the other young men of the City to marry him unto Cornelia, being free, and unpromised, or bestowed upon any man by her Father. Now Tiberius the younger being in the Warres in AFRICA under Scipio the second, who had married his Sister; lying in the Tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble Gifts of Nature; to allure mens hearts to desire to follow his valiantnesse. So in a short time he did excell all the young men of his time, as well in obedience, as in the valiantnesse of his Person: inasmuch that he was the first man that scaled the Walls of the Enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who saith that he scaled the Walls with him, and did helpe him in that valiant Enterprize. So that being present, all the Campe were in love with him; and when he was absent, every man wished for him againe. After this Warre was ended, he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his chance to go against the NUMANTINES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Consuls, who was an honest man, but yet had the worst luck of any Captaine the ROMANES had. Notwithstanding, Tiberius with dome and valiantnesse, in this extreme ill lucke of his Captaine, did not onely appeare with great glory to him, but also most wonderful, by the great obedience and reverence he bare unto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did so trouble and grieve him, that he could not tell himselfe whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was overthrowne in great foughten Fields, he departed in the night, and left his Campe. The NUMANTINES hearing of it, first took his Campe, and then ran after them that fled; and setting upon the rereward, slew them, and environed all his Army. So that they were driven into straight and narrow places, where out they could by no means escape. Thereupon Mancinus despairing that he could get out by force, he sent a Herald to the Enemies to treat of peace. The NUMANTINES made answer that they would trust no man but Tiberius onely, that therefore they willed he should be sent unto them. They desired that, partly for the love they bare unto the Vertues of the young man, because there was no talke of any other in all this Warre but of him: and partly also, as remembering his Father Tiberius, who making Warres in SPAIN, and having there subdued many Nations, he granted the NUMANTINES peace, the which he caused the ROMANES afterwards to confirme and ratifie. Hereupon Tiberius was sent to speake with them, and partly obtaining that he desired, and partly also granted them that they required, he concluded peace with them, whereby assuredly he saved the lives of twenty thousand ROMANE Citizens, besides Slaves and other stragglers that willingly followed the Campe. This notwithstanding, the NUMANTINES tooke the spoile of all the goods they found in the ROMANES Campe, among the which they found Tiberius Booke of accompt touching the Money disbursed of the Treasurie in his Charge. Tiberius being marvellous desirous to have his Booke againe, returned backe to NUMANTIA with two or three of his friends onely, though the Army of the ROMANS were gone far on their way. So coming to the Towne, he spake unto the Governours of the City, and prayed them to re-deliver him his Bookes of account, because his malicious Enemies should not accuse him, calling him to account for his doings. The NUMANTINES were very glad of this good hap, and prayed him to come into the Towne. He standing still in doubt with himselfe what to do, whether he should go into the Towne, or not: the Governours of the City came to him, and taking him by the hand prayed he would thinke they were not his Enemies, but good Friends, and that he would trust them. Whereupon Tiberius thought best to yeeld to their perswasion, being desirous also to have his Bookes againe, and the rather, for fear of offending the NUMANTINES, if he should have denied and mistrusted them. When he was brought into the City, they provided his Dinner, and were very earnest with him, intreating him to dine with them. Then they gave him his Bookes againe, and offered him moreover to take what he would of all the Spoiles they had gotten in the Campe of the ROMANS. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but Frankinsence, which he used, when he did any Sacrifice for his Country: and then taking his leave of them, with thanks he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was utterly misliked, as dishonourable to the majesty of the Empire of ROME. Yet the Parents and Friends of them that had served in this Warre, making the greatest part of the People, they gathered about Tiberius, saying, that what faults were committed in this Service, they were to impute it unto the Consul Mancinus, and not unto Tiberius, who had saved such a number of ROMANS lives. Notwithstanding, they that were offended with this dishonourable peace, would that therein they should follow the example of their Fore-fathers in the like case. For they sent backe their Captaines naked unto their Enemies, because they were contented the SAMNITES should spoile them of that they had, to escape with life. Moreover, they did not only send them the Captaines and Consuls, but all those also that bare any Office in the Field, and had consented unto that condition: to the end they might lay all the perjury and breach of peace upon them. Herein therefore did manifestly appeare, the love and good-will the People did beare unto Tiberius: for they gave order, that the Consul Mancinus should be sent naked and bound unto the NUMANTINES, and for Tiberius sake they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio, who bare great sway at that time in ROME, and was a man of greatest account, did helpe him at a pinch, who notwithstanding was ill thought of, because he did not also save the Consul Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NUMANTINES, considering it was made by Tiberius his Friend and Kinsman. But these mislikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius Friends, and certaine men, which stirred him up against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice between them, neither followed there any hurt upon it. And surely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had been present, when he passed those things he preferred. But Scipio was then in Warres at the Siege of NUMANTIA, when Tiberius upon this occasion passed these Laws. When the ROMANS in old time had overcome any of their neighbours, for ransom they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their Land from them, part whereof they sold by the Crier, for the benefit of the Common-wealth; and part also they reserved to their State as a demaine, which afterwards was let out to Farme for a small Rent yearly, to the poor Citizens that had no Lands. Howbeit the rich men inhauced the Rents; and so began to thrust out the poor men. Thereupon was an Ordinance made, that no Citizen of ROME should have above five hundred Acres of Land. This Law for a time did bridle the covetousness of the rich men, and did ease the poor also that dwelt in the Countrey, upon the Farmes they had taken up of the Common-wealth, and so lived with their own, or with that their Acellours had from the beginning. But in proesse of time, their rich neighbours, by Names of other men, got their Farmes over their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly seen in it in their own Names. Whereupon, the poor People being thus turned out of all, went with faint courage afterwards to the Warre, nor cared any more for bringing up their Children. So that in short time, the Free-men left ITALY, and Slaves and barbarous People did replenish it, whom the rich men made to Plough those Lands which they had taken from the ROMANS. Caius Lelius, one of Scipio's friends, gave an attempt to reforme this abuse: but because the chieft of the City were against him, fearing it would breake out to some uproare, he desisted from his purpose, and therefore he was called Lelius the wise. But Tiberius being chosen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforesaid being allured unto it (as divers Writers report) by Diophanes the Oratour, and Blossius the Philosopher: of the which, Diophanes was banished from the City of MITYLENE, and Blossius the ITALIAN from the City of CAME; who was Schollar and familiar unto Antipater of TARSUS at ROME, by whom he was honoured for certaine Works of Philosophy he dedicated unto him. And some also do accuse their Mother Cornelia, who did twit her Sons in the teeth, that the ROMANS did yet call her Scipio's Mother-in-law, and not the Mother of the Gracchi. Other say it was Spurius Posthumus, a Companion of Tiberius, and one that contended with him in Eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the Warres, and finding him far beyond him in fame reputation, and well beloved of every one, he sought to excell him by attempting this noble Enterprife, and of so great expectation. His own Brother Caius in a certaine Booke, wrote, that as he went to the Warres of NUMANTIA, passing through THUSCAN, he found the Countrey in manner uninhabited: and they that did follow the Plough, or keepe Feasts were the most of them Slaves, and barbarous People, come out of a strange Countrey. Whereupon ever after it ran in his minde to bring this Enterprife to passe: which brought great troubles to their house. But in fine, it was the People onely that most set his heart on fire to covet honour, and that hastened his determination:

The peace broken with the NUMANTINES.

Why Caius Lelius was called the wise, Tiberius Gracchus chosen Tribune of the people.

nation: first bringing him to is by Bills set up on every Wall, in every Porch, and upon the Tombs, praying him by them to cause the poor Citizens of ROME to have their Lands restored, which were belonging to the Common-wealth. This notwithstanding he himselfe made not the Law alone of his own head, but did it by the counsell and advice of the chieft men of ROME, for vertue and estimation: among the which, Craffus the high Bishop was one, and Mutius Scavola the Lawyer, that then was Consul, and Appius Claudius his Father-in-law. And truly it seemeth, that never Law was made with greater favour, then that which he preferred against so great injustice and avarice. For those that should have been punished for transgressing the Law, and should have had the Lands taken from them by force, which they unjustly kept against the Law of ROME, and that should also have been amerced for it, he ordained that they should be payed by the Common-wealth to the value of the Lands, which they held unjustly: and so should leave them to the poor Citizens againe that had no Land, and lacked helpe and relief. Now, though the reformation established by this Law, was done with such great favour, the People notwithstanding were contented, and would forget all that was past, to that they might have no more wrong offered them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great Possessions, hated the Law for their avarice; and for spite and self-will (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly feud with the Lawyer that had preferred the Law, and sought by all device they could to disswade the People from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this Law Agraria againe, to disturbe the Common-wealth, and to make some alteration in the State. But they prevailed not: for Tiberius defending the matter, which of it selfe was good and just, with such Eloquence as might have justified an evill cause, was invincible: and no man was able to argue against him to confute him, when speaking in the behalfe of the poor Citizens of ROME (the People being gathered round about the Pulpit for Orations) he told them, that the wild Beasts through ITALY had their Dens and Caves of abode, and that the men that fought, and were flaine for their Countrey, had nothing else but ayre and light; and so were compelled to wander up and down with their Wives and Children, having no resting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their Souldiers, when they encourage them in Battell to fight valiantly for the Graves, the Temples, their own Houses, and their Predecessours. For, said he, of such a number of poor Citizens as there be, there cannot a man of them shew any ancient House or Tombe of their Ancestors: because the poor men do go to the Warres, and be flaine for the rich mens pleasures and wealth: besides, they fallily call them Lords of the Earth, where they have not a handfull of Ground that is theirs. These and such other like words being uttered before all the People with such vehemency and troth, did so move the common People withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no Adversary of his able to withstand him. Therefore, leaving to contrary and deny the Law by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octavius, Colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in Office, who was a grave and wise young man, and Tiberius's very familiar friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the confirmation of this Law, he prayed them to hold him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled unto it through the great number of the rich men that were importunate with him, he did withstand Tiberius Law, the which was enough to overthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against it, though all the other passe with it, he overthroweth it: because they all can do nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first favourable Law, but in a rage preferred another more grateful to the common People, as also more extreame against the rich. In that Law he ordained, that whosoever had any Lands contrary to the ancient Lawes of ROME, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fell out continuall brawls in the Pulpit for Orations, against Octavius: in the which though they were very earnest and vellement one against another, yet there passed no foule words from them (how hot soever they were one with another) that should shame his Companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought up, breedeth such a stay and knowledge in a man, not onely in things of pleasure to make him regard his credit, both in word and deed, but in passion and anger also, and in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this Law among others touched Octavius, because he joyed a great deale of Land that was the Common-wealths, he prayed him secretly to contend no more against him, promising him to give him of his own, the value of those Lands which he should be driven to forsake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he saw Octavius would not be perswaded, he then preferred a Law that all Magistrates and Officers should cease their Authority, till the Law was either, past or rejected, by voices of the People: and thereupon he set his own Seale upon the Doores of the Temple of Saturnus, where the Coffers of the Treasure lay, because the Treasurers themselves during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, upon great Penalties to be forfeited by the Prators or any other Magistrate of authority that should breake this Order. Hereupon, all the Magistrates fearing this Penalty, did leave to exercise their Office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great Livings, changed their Apparell, and walked very sadly up and down the Marker-place, and layed secret waite to take Tiberius having hired men to kill him: which caused Tiberius himselfe, openly before them all, to wear a short Dagger under his long Gown, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that his Law should be established, Tiberius called the People to give their voices: and the rich men on the other side, they tooke away the Pots by force, wherein the Papers of mens voices were throwne, so that there was like to fall out a fire upon it. For the Faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of People that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not been for Mutius, and

and Fulvius, both the which had been Consuls; who went unto him, and besought him with the teares in their eyes, and holding up their hands, that he would let the Law alone. Tiberius thereupon, foreseeing the instant danger of some great mischief, as also for the reverence he bare unto two such noble Persons, he stayed a little, and asked them what they would have him to do. They made answer, that they were not able to counsell him in a matter of so great weight, but they prayed him notwithstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the judgement of the Senate. Thereupon he granted them presently. But afterwards perceiving that the Senate fate upon it, and had determined nothing, because the rich men were of too great authority, he entred into another device that was neither honest nor meet; which was to deprive Othavium of his Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to passe the Law. But before he tooke that course, he openly intreated him in the face of the People with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to stand no more against him; and to do the People this pleasure, which required a matter just and reasonable, and onely requested this small recompence for the great paines they tooke in service abroad for their Countrey. Othavium denied him plainly. Then said Tiberius openly, that both of them being Brethren in one selfe place and authority, and contrary one to another in a matter of so great weight, this contention could not be possibly ended, without civill Warre: and that he could see no way to remedy it, unless one of them two were depofed from their Office. Thereupon he bad Othavium begin first with him, and he would rise from the bench with a good will, and become a private man, if the People were so contented. Othavium would do nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his minde, upon a better breath and consideration: and so dismissed the Assembly for that day. The next morning the People being againe assembled, Tiberius going up to his Seate, attempted againe to perswade Othavium to leave off. In fine, finding him still a man unremoveable, he referred the matter to the voices of the People, whether they were contented Othavium should be depofed from his Office. Now there were five and thirty Tribes of the People, of the which seventeen of them had already passed their voices against Othavium, so that there remained but one Tribe more to put him out of his Office. Then Tiberius made them stay for proceeding any further, and prayed Othavium againe, embracing him before all the People, with all the intreaty possible, that for self-will sake he would not suffer such an open shame to be done unto him, as to be put out of his Office, neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of so pitifull a deed. They say that Othavium at this last intreaty was somewhat moved and won by his perswasions, and that weeping, he stayed a long time, and made no answer. But when he looked upon the rich men that stood in a great company together he was ashamed (I think) to have their ill wils, and rather betooke himselfe to the losse of his Office, and so bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being deprived by voices of the People, Tiberius commanded one of his infranchised bondmen to pull him out of the Pulpit for Orations: for he used his infranchised bondmen instead of Sergeants. This made the sight so much more lamentable, to see Othavium thus shamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common People would have runne upon him, but the rich men came to rescue him, and would not suffer them to doe him further hurt. So Othavium saved himselfe running away alone, after he had been rescued thus from the fury of the People. Moreover, there was a faithfull Servant of Othavium, who stepping before his Master to save him from hurt, had his eyes pulled out against Tiberius minde, who ranne to the rescue with all speed when he heard the noise. After that, the Law Agraria passed for division of Lands, and three Commissioners were appointed to make inquiry and distribution thereof. The Commissioners appointed were these: Tiberius himselfe, Appius Clodius his Father-in-law, and Caius Gracchus his Brother, who were not at that time in Rome, but in the Campe with Scipio Africanus, at the Siege of the City of Numantia. Thus Tiberius very quietly passed over these matters, and no man durst withstand him: and furthermore, he substituted in Othavium place no man of quality, but onely one of his followers, called Antius. For which cause the Noble-men were sore offended with him, and fearing the increase of his greatnesse, they being in the Senate-house did what they could possible to do him despite and shame. For when Tiberius demanded a Tent at the charge of the Common-wealth, when he should go abroad to make division of these Lands, as they usually granted unto others, that many times went in farr meaner Commissions, they flatly denied him; and through the procurement of P. Nafica (who being a great landed man in his Countrey, shewed himselfe in this Action his mortall Enemy, taking it grievously to be compelled to depart from his Land) onely granted him nine of their Oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the People on the other side were all in an uproare against the rich. Infomuch as one of Tiberius friends being dead upon the suddaine, upon whose body being dead there appeared very ill Signes, the common People ranne suddainly to his Buriall, and cried out, that he was poysoned. And so taking up the Bier whereon his Body lay upon their shoulders, they were present at the fire of his Funerals, where immediately appeared certaine Signes to make them suspect, that indeed there was vehement cause of presumption: he was poysoned. For his Belly burst, whereout there issued such abundance of corrupt humours, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetch another, the which also they could not make to burne, untill that they were compelled to carry the Body into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much adoe to make it burne. Tiberius seeing that, to make the common People mutiny the more, he put on mourning Apparell, and brought his Sonnes before them, and besought the People to be good unto them and their Mother, as one that despaired of his health and safety. About that time died Attalus surnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his Will to Rome, in the which he made the People of Rome his Heire. Wherefore Tiberius, still to increase the good will of the common People towards him, preferred a Law immediately, that the ready Money that came by the Inheritance of this King, should be distributed among the poor Citizens, on whose Lot it should fall to have any part of the division of the Lands of the Common-wealth to furnish them towards house, and to set up their Tillage. Furthermore, he said, that concerning the Towns and Cities of the Kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to do to take any order with them, but that the People were to dispose of them, and that he himselfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, infomuch as there was one Pompey a Senator, that standing up, said, that he was next neighbour unto Tiberius, and that by reason of his neighbour-hood he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had given him one of King Attalus Royall Bands, with a purple Gown besides, for a token that he should one day be King of Rome. And Quintus Metellus also reproved him, for that his Father being Censor, the ROMANES having supped in the Town, and repairing every man home to his house, they did put out their Torches and Lights, because men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they carried too long in company banqueting: and that in contrary manner, the seditious and needy rabble of the common People did light his Sonne home, and accompany him all night long up and down the Town. At that time there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodnesse nor honesty in him, howbeit taken for a great reasoner, and for a subtill Questioner and Answerer. He provoked Tiberius to answer him, whether he had not committed a shamefull Fact against his Companion and Brother Tribune, to defame him that by the Lawes of Rome should have been holy and untouched. The People tooke this provocation very angrily, and Tiberius also coming out, and having assembled the People, commanded them to bring this Annius before him, that he might be ended in the Market-place. But he finding himselfe farre inferiour unto Tiberius both in Dignity and Eloquence, ranne to his fine subtill questions, to take a man at his word: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceed to his Accusation, that he would first answer him to a question he would aske him. Tiberius bad him say what he would. So silence being made, Annius asked him: If thou wouldest defame me, and offer me injury, and that I called one of thy Companions to helpe me, and he should rise to take my part, and anger thee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his Office? It is reported Tiberius was so gravelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his Orations of any man, yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the Assembly. Afterwards, understanding that of all the things he did, the depofing of Othavium from his Office was thought (not onely of the Nobility, but of the common People also) as foule and wilfull a part as ever he played, for that thereby he had imbased and utterly overthrowne the Dignity of the Tribunes, the which was alwaies had in great veneration untill that present time: to excuse himselfe therefore, he made an excellent Oration to the People, whereof we will set down some speciall Points, that you may the better discern thereby the force and effect of his Eloquence. "The Tribuneship (said he) indeed was a Holy and Sacred thing, as particularly consecrated to the People, and established for their benefit and safety: where contrariwise, if the Tribune do offer the People any wrong, he thereby minisheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wils by voices; besides that he doth also imbase his owne authority, leaving to do the thing for the which his Authority was first given him. Or otherwise we could not chuse, not suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him, to overthrow the Capitoll, or to set fire on the Arsenall; and yet notwithstanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the People still, though a leud Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authority and power of the People, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list, may take a Consul, and commit him to Prison? and that the People should not withstand the Authority of the Tribune, who gave him the same, when he would use his authority to the prejudice of the People? for the People are they that do chuse both Consul and Tribune. Furthermore, the Kingly Dignity (because in the same is contained the absolute authority and power of all other kinds of Magistrates and Offices together) is consecrated with very great and holy Ceremonies, drawing very near unto the god-head: and yet the People expelled King Tarquinius, because he used his authority with cruelty; and for the injury he offered one man onely, the most ancient rule and government (by the which the foundation of Rome was first laid) was utterly abolished. And who is there in all the City of Rome to be reckoned so holy as the Vestall Nuns, which have the custody and keeping of the everlasting Fire? and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, she is buried alive for her offence: for when they are not holy to the gods, they lose the liberty they have, in respect of serving the gods. Even so also it is unmeet, that the Tribune if he offend the People, should for the Peoples sake be revered any more, seeing that through his own folly he had deprived himselfe of that authority they gave him. And if it be so that he was chosen Tribune by the most part of the Tribes of the People, then by reason is he justly deprived that by all the whole Tribes together is forsaken and depofed. There is nothing more holy nor inviolate then things offered up unto the gods: and yet it was never seen that any man did forbid the People to take them, to remove and transport them from place to place, as they thought good. Even so, they may as lawfully transferr the Office of the Tribune unto any other, as any other Offering consecrated to the gods. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or Magistrate may lawfully depofe himselfe: for it hath been often seen, that men in Office have de-

"prived themselves, or otherwise sued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberius Purgation. Now his friends perceiving the threats the rich and Noblemen gave out against him, they wished him for the safety of his Person, to make suite to be Tribune againe the next year. Whereupon he began to flatter the common People again afresh, by new Lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares prescribed, when every Citizen of Rome was bound to go to the Warres being called, and his Name Billed. He made it lawfull also for men to appeale from sentence of the Judges unto the People, and thrust in also amongst the Senatours (which then had absolute authority to judge among themselves) a like number of the ROMANE Knights, and by this meanes sought to weaken and imbase the authority of the Senate, increasing also the power of the People, more of malice then any reason, or for any justice or benefit to the Common-wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voices of the People for the confirmation of his new Lawes, finding that his Enemies were the stronger in the Assembly, because all the People were not yet come together, he fell a quarrelling with his Brethren the Tribunes, alwaies to winne them; and yet in the end brake up the Assembly, commanding them to returne the next morning. There he would be the first man in the Market-place, apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, and looking heavily upon the matter, praying the People assembled to have compassion upon him, saying, that he was afraid lest his Enemies would come in the night, and overthrow his house to kill him. Thereupon the People were so moved withall, that many of them came and brought their Tents, and lay about his house to watch it. At the breake of the day, the Keeper of the Chickens (by signes of the which they do divine of things to come) brought them unto him, and cast them down Meate before them. None of them would come out of the Cage but one onely, and yet with much ado, shaking the Cage: and when it came out, it would eate no Meate, but onely lift up her left Wing, and put forth her Legge, and so ranne into the Cage againe. This signe made Tiberius remember another he had had before. He had a marvellous faire Helmet and very rich, which he wore in the Warres: under it were crept two Snakes unawares to any, and layed Egges, and hatche them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, because of the ill signes of the Chickens: notwithstanding, he went out of his house when he heard that the People were assembled in the Capitoll; but as he went out, he hit his foot such a blow against a Stone at the threshold of the Doore, that he brake the naile of his great Toe, which fell in such a bleeding that it bled through his Shoe. Againe, he had not gone farr, but he saw upon the top of a house on his left hand, a couple of Ravens fighting together: and notwithstanding that there past a great number of People by, yet a stone which one of these Ravens cast from them, came and fell hard at Tiberius foot. The fall thereof staied the stoutest man he had about him. But Blossius the Philosopher of CUMES that did accompany him, told him it were a great shame for him, and enough to kill the hearts of all his followers, that Tiberius being the Sonne of Gracchus, and Nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN; and the chiefe man besides of all the Peoples side, for feare of a Raven, should not obey his Citizens that called him: and how that his Enemies and ill-willers would not make a laughing sport of it, but would plainly tell the People, that this was a trick of a Tyrant that reigned indeed, and that for pride and disdaine did abuse the Peoples good wils. Furthermore, divers Messengers came unto him, and said, that his friends that were in the Capitoll, sent to pray him to make haste, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably received: for the People seeing him coming, cried out for joy to welcome him; and when he was gotten up to his Seate, they shewed themselves both carefull and loving towards him, looking warily that none came neare him, but such as they knew well. When Mutius began againe to call the Tribes of the People to give their voices, he could not proceed according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noise the hindmost People made, thrusting forward, and being driven backe, and one mingling with another. In the meane time Flavius Flaccus, one of the Senatours, got up into a place where all the People might see him, and when he saw that his voice could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a signe with his hand that he had some matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius straight bad them make a lane through the presse. So, with much ado, Flavius came at length unto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Consull to their wils, determined themselves to come and kill him, having a great number of their friends and bond-men armed for the purpose. Tiberius immediatly declared this conspiracy unto his friends and followers, who straight girt their long Gownes unto them, and brake the Sergeants Javelins which they carried in their hands to make room among the People, and tooke the truncheons of the same to resist those that would set upon them. The People also that stood furthest off, marvelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a signe to tell them the danger he was in, laid both his hands on his head, because they could not hear his voice for the great noise they made. His Enemies seeing the signe he gave, ranne presently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a Royall Band or Diademe of the People, and that it was an evident signe, because they saw him clappe his hands upon his head. This Tale troubled all the company. Whereupon Nasica befought the Consull, chiefe of the Senate, to helpe the Common-wealth, and to take away this Tyrant. The Consull gently answered againe, that he would use no force, neither put any Citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as also he would not receive Tiberius, nor protect him, if the People by his perswasion or commandement should commit any Act contrary to the Law. Nasica then rising in anger, Sith the matter is so (said he) that the Consull regardeth not the Common-wealth, all you then that will defend the Authority of the Law, follow me. Thereupon he cast the

Skirt of his Gown over his head, and went straight to the Capitoll. They that followed him also tooke their Gownes and wrapped them about their armes, and laied at as many as they might, to make them give way: and yet very few of the People durst meet with such States as they were to stay them, because they were the chiefe men of the City; but every man flying from them, they fell one on anothers neck for haste. They that followed them, had brought from home great Leavers and Clubs, and as they went they tooke up feete of Treffles and Chaires which the People had overthrowne and broken, running away, and hid them apace to meet with Tiberius, striking at them that stood in their way: so that in short space they had disperfed all the common People, and many were slaine flying. Tiberius seeing that, betooke him to his legges to save himselfe; but as he was flying, one tooke him by the Gowne and stayed him: but he leaving his Gown behind him, ranne in his Coate, and running fell upon them that were down before. So, as he was rising up againe, the first man that strake him, and that was plainly seene strike him, was one of the Tribunes his Brethren, called Publius Saturnius, who gave him a great rap on the head with the foot of a Chaire; and the second blow he had, was given him by Lucius Rufus that boasted of it, as if he had done a notable Act. In this tumult, there were slaine above three hundred men, and were all killed with Staves and Stones, and not one man hurt with any Iron. This was the first sedition among the Citizens of Rome, that fell out with murther and bloodshed, since the expulsion of the Kings. But for all other former dissensions (which were no trifles) they were easily pacified, either Party giving place to other: the Senate for feare of the Commoners, and the People for reverence they bare to the Senate. And it seemeth that Tiberius himselfe would easily have yeelded also, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perswasion, so they had meant good faith, and would have killed no man: for at that time he had not in all above three thousand men of the People about him. But surely it seemes this conspiracy was executed against him, more for very spite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparent cause they presupposed against him. For proof hereof may be alledged, the barbarous cruelty they used to his Body being dead. For they would not suffer his own Brother to have his Body to bury it by night, who made earnest suite unto them for it; but they threw him amongst the other Bodies into the River, and yet this was not the worst. For, some of his friends they banished without forme of Law, and others they put to death which they could meet withall. Among the which they slew Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Bilius, whom they inclosed in a Pipe among Snakes and Serpents, and put him to death in this sort. Blossius also the Philosopher of CUMES, was brought before the Consuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confessed unto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commanded him. When Nasica did aske him, And what if he had commanded thee to set fire on the Capitoll? He made him answer, that Tiberius would never have given him any such commandement. And when divers others also were still in hand with him about that question: But if he had commanded thee? I would fire have done it: said he: for he would never have commanded me to have done it, if it had not been for the commodity of the People. Thus he escaped at that time, and afterwards fled into ASIA unto Arifoniciu, whom misfortune having overthrowne, he flew himselfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the People at that present time did no more withstand the Law Agaria, for division of the Lands of the Common-wealth, but suffered the People to appoint another Commissioner for that purpose in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Crassus was chosen, being allied unto Tiberius, for Caius Gracchus (Tiberius Brother) had married his Daughter Licina. Yet Cornelius Nepos saith, that it was not Crassus Daughter Caius married, but the Daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the LUSITANIANS. Howbeit the best Writers and authority agree with that we write. But whatsoever was done, the People were marvellously offended with his death; and men might easily perceive that they looked but for time and opportunity to be revenged, and did presently threaten Nasica to accuse him. Whereupon the Senate fearing some trouble towards him, devised a way (upon no occasion) to send him into ASIA. For the common People did not dissemble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were very round with him, and called him Tyrant, and Murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the blood of the holy Tribune, and within the most sacred Temple of all the City. So in the end he was enforced to forsake Rome, though by his Office he was bound to solemnize all the greatest Sacrifices, because he was then chiefe Bishop of Rome. Thus travelling out of his Country like a meane man, and troubled in his minde, he died shortly after, not far from the City of PERGAMUS. Truly, it is not greatly to be wondered at, though the People so much hated Nasica, considering that Scipio the AFRICAN himselfe (whom the People of Rome for juster Causes had loved better then any man else whatsoever) was like to have lost all the Peoples good will they bare him, because that being at the Siege of NUMANTIA, when newes was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this Verse of Homer

Which in such doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the assembly of the People, by Caius and Fulvius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he answered them, that he did not like his doings. After that the People handled them very churlishly, and did ever breake off his Oration, which they never did before: and he himselfe also would revile the People even in the Assembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the first because he feared the Enemies of his dead Brother, or otherwise, for that he sought meanes to make them more hated of the People, he absented himselfe for a time out of the common Assembly, and kept at home, and medled not, as a man contented to live meanly, without buyng busying himselfe in the Common-wealth: inſomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did utterly miſlike thoſe matters which his Brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares younger then his Brother Tiberius, who was not thirty yeares old when he was ſlaine. But in proceſſe of time, he made his manners and conditions (by little and little) appeare, who hated ſloth and curioſity, and was leaſt of all given unto any covetous minde of getting: for he gave himſelfe to be Eloquent, as preparing him Wings afterwards to pra-ctiſe in the Common-wealth. So that it appeared plainly, that when time came, he would not ſtand ſtill and looke on. When one Vellius a friend of his was ſued, he tooke upon him to defend his Cauſe in Court. The people that were preſent, and heard him ſpeake, they leaped for joy to ſee him: for he had ſuch an Eloquent Tongue, that all the Oratours beſides were but Children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be afraid againe, and wiſpered among themſelves, that it behoved them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chanced ſo that he was choſen Treafurer and it was his fortune to go into the Iſle of SARDINIA, with the Conſull Oreſtes. His Enemies were glad of that, and he himſelfe was not ſorry for it. For he was a Martiall man, and as ſkillfull in Armes as he was elſe an excellent Oratour: but yet he was afraid to come into the Pulpit for Orations, and miſliked to deale in matters of State, albeit he could not altogether deny the People, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cauſe therefore he was very glad of this Voyage, that he might abſent himſelfe for a time out of ROME: though divers were of Opinion, that he was more Popular, and deſirous of the common Peoples good will and favour, then his Brother had been before him. But indeed he was cleane contrary: for it appeared that at the firſt he was drawn rather againſt his will, then of any ſpeciall deſire he had to deale in the Common-wealth. Cicero the Oratour alſo ſaith, that Caius was bent altogether to ſlie from Office in the Common-wealth, and to live quietly as a private man. But Tiberius (Caius Brother) appeared to him in his ſleepe, and calling him by his Name, ſaid unto him: Brother, why doeſt thou prolong time, for thou canſt not poſſibly eſcape? For we were both predeſtinated to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefit of the People. Now when Caius arrived in SARDINIA, he ſhewed all the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the young men of his age in hardineſſe againſt his Enemies, in juſtice to his Inferiours, and in love and obedience towards the Conſull his Captaine: but in Temperance, Sobriety, and in Painfullneſſe, he excelled all them were elder then he. The Winter by chance fell out very ſharpe, and full of ſickeſſe in SARDINIA: whereupon the Conſull ſent unto the Cities to helpe his Souldiers with ſome cloathes: but the Townes ſent in poſt to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be diſcharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reaſonable, whereupon they wrote to the Conſull to finde ſome other meanes to cloathe his People. The Conſull could make no other ſhift for them, and ſo the poor Souldiers in the meane time ſmarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went himſelfe unto the Cities, and ſo perſwaded them, that they of themſelves ſent to the ROMANE Campe ſuch things as they lacked. This being carried to ROME, it was thought ſtraight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the Peoples favour, and indeed it made the Senate alſo afraid. In the necke of that, there arrived Ambaſſadours of AFRICKE at ROME, ſent from King Micipsa, who told the Senate that the King their Maſter, for Caius Gracchus ſake, had ſent their Army Corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were ſo offended withall, that they thruſt the Ambaſſadours out of the Senate, and ſo gave order that other Souldiers ſhould be ſent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Oreſtes ſhould ſtill remaine Conſull there, meaning alſo to continue Caius their Treafurer. But when he heard of it, he ſtraight tooke Sea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men ſaw Caius returned to ROME unlooked for, he was reprov'd for it, not onely by his Enemies, but by the common People alſo, who thought his returne very ſtrange before his Captaine, under whom he was Treafurer. He being accuſed hereof before the Cenſors, prayed he might be heard. So, anſwering his Accuſation, he ſo turned the Peoples mindes that heard him, that they all ſaid, he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had ſerved twelve yeares in the Warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeares: and that he had continued Treafurer under his Captaine the ſpace of three yeares, where the Law gave him liberty to returne at the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men elſe that had been in the Warres, had caried his Purſe full, and brought it home empty; where others having drunke the Wine which they caried thither in Veſſels, had afterwards brought them home full of Gold and Silver. Afterwards they went about to accuſe him as acceſſary to a conſpiracy that was revealed in the City of FREGELLE, But having cleared all that ſuſpition, and being diſcharged, he preſently made ſuite to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of quality his ſworne Enemies. On the other ſide alſo he had ſo great favour of the common People, that there came men out of all parts of ITALY to be at his Election, and that ſuch a number of them, as their was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the Field of Mars not being large enough to hold ſuch a multitude of People, there were that gave their voices upon the top of houſes. Now the Noblemen could no otherwiſe let the People of their will, nor prevent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the firſt Tribune, he was onely pronounced the fourth. But when he was once poſſeſſed Officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, becauſe he was as Eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occaſion of clariſmity offered him: which made him bold to ſpeake, bewailing the death of his Brother. For what matters ſoever he ſpoke of, he alwaies fell in talke of that, remembering them what matters had paſſed, and laying before them the examples of their Anceſtours, who in old time had made Warre with the PHALISCS, by meanes of one Genutius Tribune of the People, unto whom they
